"The unexplainable depths of the existence, by being depths of the good, they do not oppose God to the human being, neither they impede God-the Word to make His own humanity as His Hypostasis, nor they impede God to live the sweetness of His kindness as God through the humanity assumed by Him, and the humanity too, it is created for good and as capable for rejoicing of good. Even the fact that the Christ's godhead know itself as given as gift, to such an extent, to the humanity, it makes His godhead to live this sweetness which is thirsty for, and to manifest it also in the self-giving as gift to the godhead too. We are unable to experience the whole sweetness of the godlike kindness, lived by Christ as man, but we can experience it partially. That's why, we cannot know either the whole richness of meanings of the Godhead as known by Christ's humanity, for we are far away from the knowledge and from the understanding that He has, as man, about Himself, as God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 183)

Grace of God

“The image of God in man is seen as participation to the Holy Trinity and, just by that, as being related to the mental and rational soul of the man, and the grace is seen as uncreated energy of the Holy Ghost or as active communion with God.” (2003: 408)

“The breath of God seeds within man not so much the biological life, for this belongs also to animals which do not receive an instilling from God, but the life of the understanding and of the communion with God, namely the spiritual life. The more the understanding is developed, the more the communion is developed, and vice versa. In this is the image in its entirety. By the instilling from God and by the communion started through God, a communion that is one with His grace, it sprouts out the man’s communion with God. That’s why in East the grace was always placed in tight connection with the man’s nature, especially with the man’s soul. Even after falling, by remaining with a soul, the man remains with some grace of God, or in some aspiration towards God, and therefore the man remains in a relation with God.” (2003: 409)

“God has made also of this battle the devil fights us with, an occasion for us to strengthen ourselves in good, with the help of the godlike grace.” (2003: 480)

“The general work of salvation, done by the Ghost within Church, is being done through the godlike grace, or it is the godlike grace itself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“According to the teaching of the Holy Scripture, the godlike grace isn’t good by itself, namely detached from God. This teaching has reached the clearest expression in the formulation of Saint Gregory Palamas, namely that the grace is an uncreated energy, springing out of the godlike being of the Three Hypostases and it is inseparable from Them. The Greek term “ἐνέργεια” is translated in Romanian language as “work”. This highlights that within grace as work it is present the Subject Himself Who does the work. This is for there isn’t work without a worker. That’s why we can use the term “energy” too, in the sense that in the work it is shown the energy of the one who works. But this energy is being always imprinted in the ones for whom the work is being done. That’s why, by understanding the grace as godlike “energy”, we understand it, on one hand, with the meaning of energy which is imprinted in the work within whom work the Holy Ghost, making that one capable of working too, or making him capable of co-working with the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“Speaking about grace, we must equally accentuate its quality of inexhaustible power coming out of the infinite godhead dwelling within Christ’s humanity, and the perspective of light the grace it opens to us, in the infinity of the communion with the Person of Christ or with the Holy Trinity, for the Holy Trinity has opened to us in Christ, out of love. The grace is the window opened towards the infinity of God as Person, or as Trinitarian communion of Persons, once God has placed us, by grace, in relation with Himself. The grace un-limits the life of our existence and by this it satisfies the thirst of our existence for the transcendent infinite of God as Person. As such, the grace gives us the possibility to be fulfilled as “image of God”, or it helps us to advance in the likeness with God, or in the infinity of the loving relation with Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“In a way, the grace of the Holy Ghost, imprinted as power and as the infinite horizon within the man’s being, it is felt by the man as presence and as work of the Holy Ghost Himself. But this is not always, because one needs in order to do that a sharper looking within his self. On the other hand, this increased feeling of power and of light, from himself, he won’t always put it in working. When he puts it in working, he immediately feels that in the same time with him there works also the Ghost of Christ. There are, somehow, two forms of degrees of grace’s presence within man: an imprinting of the grace within man, as power, though this presence too is a work of the Holy Ghost; and there is also a presence fully assimilated and felt by man, as work through his own work.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“The Holy Ghost is active also in the many gifts He gives us, as equally powers. But, at the basis of all the gifts stay the grace of the Mysteries. The grace is the fundamental works committed by the Ghost within people for their salvation, works imprinted within the people as powers. Through these powers, the Holy Ghost unites the man fundamentally with Christ, by endowing the man with some power which elevate him above the powers strictly belonging to the man’s nature, or by placing the man in a relation of co-working with Christ Himself through the actualization of these powers in works.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“At the beginning of all the gifts it stays a gift received through a Mystery. Out of the man’s collaboration with the grace there emerge diverse gifts, corresponding to the man’s natural capacities. The grace granted through Mysteries it supposes also a preparation, but the significance of that preparation is stays rather in ensuring a future collaboration form the man’s side.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“The grace staying at the beginning of the beginning, it is that granted through the Baptism’s Mystery. Even this one supposes the man’s preparation, or at least the lack of refusal, an opening as basis of the man’s future collaboration with the grace. This condition is fulfilled by children too. And, in their case, the condition of the collaboration with the work of the Holy Ghost, started since Baptism, it is ensured even more, given the Christian ambience of the family, under whose influence stays rather the child than the adult, to which the child is always almost totally open.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“The Mystery’s grace it generally means the beginning of the work of the Holy Ghost within a man, or the beginning of a new kind of work, which is being imprinted as a new kind of power, but based on the work started at Baptism. And the work of the Ghost, by persisting, produces within man an even greater power, or a permanent state, which fructifies in good deeds, in avoiding the sins, in a state of purity, of firmer faith, and more alive. In all of these there is the grace, as work of the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“That’s why one can speak about a state of grace too, or about the grace that dresses up the man. (...) Gradually, the man will be totally transformed by grace, or by the work of the Ghost, if he collaborates with Him; the man will wear in the whole of his being the active seal of the grace, as seal of Christ, as an increasingly luminous vestment, as a transparent light overflowing out of his interior that is full of Christ, and it dresses up the whole man’s exterior countenance. The grace produces an ontological, spiritual state too, that can be experienced and expressed as such; of course, this will be as long as the work of the Holy Ghost or of Christ will last within man and as long as the man will collaborate too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“The grace as continuous state it is therefore a state of continuous and active presence of Christ Himself in front of the man and of the man in front of Christ, it is a state of dynamic, living, and unmediated dialogical relation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

“The grace, together with all the gifts, they belong not only to the Ghost, but also to Christ. Properly-said, the grace has been made possible and accessible to us through Christ, for Christ has elevated our nature assumed by Him, to the state of lack of sin, of total giving to God through the sacrifice on the cross, to the state of incorruptibility through Resurrection, and to the state of culminant spiritualization through Ascent. Before the Christ’s embodiment, our nature was closed to the work of God within it, to the penetration of the infinity of the life and of the love of God in it, namely it was closed to the grace, in the sense that it could refuse any collaboration with the grace.” (Stăniloae 2006: 126-127)

“The grace and all the gifts aren’t something else but only the bringing of the goods comprised in our deified into Christ nature, within ourselves, through the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 127)

“The grace and the gifts aren’t colorless and indeterminate godlike works. Of course, in such a case too, these works would have healed what it is evil within our nature and it would have strengthened our nature towards the good things, in a mode corresponding to the predispositions and to the special capacities or each person. But for the working Ghost irradiates out of Christ Who has been filled up with the Ghost as man too, the works of the Ghost bring us the state of our nature consummate in Christ, making us in the image of Christ, accomplished as consummate man. He helps us to walk the way Christ walked it as man, in order to deify and to fully accomplish our nature. The Ghost helps us to live a sinless life, without the egotistic narrowness, the Ghost helps us to die to ourselves, and to die towards everything that is contrary to God. In the same time, the Ghost puts into our soul the forces which will make it capable to resurrect his body, when these forces will be fully developed at the end of time, through the consummate irradiation of the Ghost, in an unmediated manner, out of Christ Who will show Himself into glory. There is no other way the believer to consummate himself in, than the one that Christ followed, and out of the Christ’s power, Who has assimilated within His humanity the endless divine energies, making these energies to belong to His human nature, but, in the same time, making these energies accessible to us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 127)

“About the necessity of the grace at the beginning of the salvation, Lord Jesus Christ says: “Nobody can come to Me, if the Father doesn’t draw him, the One Who has sent Me” (Jn. 6: 44). If the grace is the irradiation of the Person of Christ’s energy, in the ones who open themselves to Him through faith, so that the grace won’t be kidnapped as a personal entity. There must be an initiative of the Person of Christ, in order His savior relation to be established with a believer or with another. But Christ wants everybody to be saved. About this beginning of the salvation by grace, the Savior says also: “If somebody isn’t born out of water and Ghost, he won’t enter the Kingdom of God” (Jn. 3: 5). Firstly, God must voluntarily enter the man’s range of existence, to send His love towards this man, for this man to be able to take power of new life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

“About the necessity of the grace in continuation (after the beginning of the salvation, after Baptism, o. n.), Saint Apostle Paul said: “God is the One Who works within us both to want and to work for benevolence” (Phil. 2: 13; Ephes. 2: 8). Or: “For we have become partakers with Christ only if we will strongly keep to the end the beginning of our state in Him” (Hebr. 3: 14).” (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

“Getting out of the connection with God as Person, or out of His work within us, we fall down from the state of salvation and from our advancing in it, no matter the level we have reached on. Only in positive relation with God we are being saved, or, better said, only in such a relation with Christ, in Whose humanity it is made available to us the infinity of the godlike life, made our own through the Ghost, or through His grace.” (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

“The grace if given us freely, for we cannot force God as Person or to oblige Him to enter the relation with us. But Christ doesn’t refuse to us the communication of His life by grace, given He is the godlike Hypostasis staying at the basis of the entire mankind, and therefore he is the Hypostasis open to everybody. If any human hypostasis is characterized through openness towards other hypostases, by putting in communication his nature with other human persons’ nature, all the more is characterized by this the Word’s Hypostasis Who has made Himself Hypostasis of our human nature. The Son of God, bearer of the infinite godlike life, he entered through His body in virtual communicativeness with all the people. The work of the Ghost or His grace is directed out of Him towards all the people. And this is due to His pure love and not because some merit or for previous deeds which we have done. Of course, within man there have remained after falling some impulses towards good, towards breaking down the walls of his egotism and, if the man follows those impulses, he opens himself to the grace he is offered with, and this make the man receiving easier the savior grace of God. Thus, it must be understood cases as was the one of Cornelius the centurion. This part seeded by God, through which our being can resist the sins and can do the good, it has been well used by some people more than others, even before receiving the grace.” (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

“In the fullest mode this power was put in working by Saint Virgin Mary, by enjoying due to this, also a great help from God. Nicolae Kabasilas said that the Lord’s Mother, by putting this “power” in working “as nobody else”, “She moved God towards love for man” and “She attracted the dispassionate One and so He has made Himself man, for the Virgin, the One Who was disgusted with the man due to the man’s sin”. But the savior grace came even to the Virgin Mary only through the body the Son of God has assumed within Her, since the first moment He started to form His body within Her like on the human ontological plan. God the Word must really articulate Himself in the human community, in order to extend out of Him, as out of the central man, the state of salvation in all the people who believe.” (Stăniloae 2006: 129-130)

“The work of the Ghost or the grace of God, being offered to everybody through the Church, for Christ is dwelling with His body within the Church, it doesn’t force the man’s freedom, namely it doesn’t work irresistibly by forcing the man to receive the grace and to be saved forcedly, or without the man’s collaboration.” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

“The fact that not all the people are saved is due only to the lack of collaboration with the grace, of some of the people, and not to a predestination of some of them to salvation and of some of them to perdition, decided by God. Who isn’t saved he doesn’t accept, or he no longer accepts, his self to be united with the Self of the Ghost, and therefore with the Church’s self. By that, he has also broken himself from the relation with Christ as You. And if the human self is being fully accomplished in the Church’s self, this separation also means a weakening of his self, of his freedom, and of his reality as subject.” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

“The Holy Scripture clearly affirms both that God offers the grace to everybody and the man’s possibility of refusing it, or the fact that the grace isn’t irresistible. The first thing is affirmed by saying that God “wants all the people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (I Tim. 2: 4), that Christ “has given Himself as price of redemption for us” (I Tim. 2: 6), that “many are called, but few are chosen” (Mt. 20: 16). The second thing is said by the Scripture in all the places where it shows how some people, some cities, or the people of Israel, they resisted the work of the godlike grace, or the calling of God (Apoc. 3: 20; Acts 7: 51; Mt. 23: 37; Isa. 5: 4; 65: 2; Mt. 11: 21).” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

“The work of the Ghost as Person within us, it requires our free collaboration, being show also by this the importance God gives us as persons. The Ghost asks us for impropriating His work and for making it our own, by our will and through a work of our own. The Ghost doesn’t force us, namely he doesn’t annul our will, which He has given it to us, as God, by creation. The Ghost doesn’t annul our will for He is free of all passions, and therefore He is free of domination passion too. The freedom is the most characteristic feature of the Ghost, of the authentic supreme Spirit. “Where the Ghost of the Lord is, there is the liberty” (II Cor. 3: 17). The Ghost isn’t dominated by any will for mastery; he doesn’t want to mastery upon any person, but he wants to liberate the person of anything that narrows that person and that dominates that person, in order that person to be able to activate his own powers, advancing in the infinity of the godlike life, in free and loving dialogue with Christ. The Ghost wants the free agreement of the human persons in leading them in the infinity of the godlike life and in its eternal novelty. He wants to set the man free of the passions which enslave him and which keep him locked up in a monotonous repetition. The Ghost wants to make the man free for the love of God, which is an infinite spring of gifts. The Ghost helps us to reach the “liberty of the glory of the sons of God” (Rom. 8: 21; Gal. 5: 63). The Ghost makes us free in God for the eternally new love of other persons. Through “His freedom (of passions) Christ has made us free” and we need an effort “not to take again the slavery’s yoke” (Gal. 5: 1). Far from enslaving us, only because He makes us free, the work of the Ghost gives us the possibility to come closer to the free God, to be imprinted with His image increasingly deeper, and to become like Him (Ephes. 3: 12).” (Stăniloae 2006: 130-131)

“The collaboration with the grace all the more helps the human person to achieve his true liberty, as the grace is the energy of Christ, through which the human will has been really restored. The human person, by collaborating with the grace, it reestablished itself in its true humanity, in the likeness of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 132)

“The grace is the Person of Christ Himself Who stays in our intimacy, available with the whole His love, but Who waits for us to open ourselves too, to this love of His, in order to start a dialogue of love and to start being us filled up with his kindness.” (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

“On a first glance, one could believe that the multitude of the hierarchical angelic and churchly levels, presented by Dionysus the Areopagite as mediators of the divine light, they would make impossible the believer’s direct communication with Christ. At a more attentive look, though, we notice that the power working on all levels of the hierarchy it is the godlike grace of Jesus Christ, or there He is Himself crossing through His hierarchical organs and working through them the Mysteries they celebrate. If the created persons can be one within another, all the more Christ can be within all persons.” (Stăniloae 1992: 49)

“Palamas proved by using patristic places, that what is poured upon us, through the Son, it is not the Holy Ghost, but it is the godlike grace, which is therefore uncreated. The fact that it isn’t created it is show also in that that the Holy Fathers called it also “deification”, or as “the principle of the deification”, God being above it. That what is poured upon us it isn’t the Holy Ghost Himself it can be also see at Joel 2: 28, where the Lord promises: “I will pour upon you out of My Ghost” (and not: “I will pour My Ghost upon you”). If it isn’t the Ghost Himself, then what could it be else except the work and the grace of the Ghost? This grace, which deifies, it is uncreated and not-separated from the Holy Ghost. “The Life conveyed by the Ghost to another hypostasis it won’t be separated from the Ghost”, said Saint Basil the Great.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 66)

“The grace of the godhead is was above the human nature. The own strivings make the man receptive to the grace, but they aren’t the grace itself.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 70)

“Let’s see what Palamas demonstrated like, that the deifying grace is uncreated and eternal, but without being the God’s Being Himself, neither the Hypostasis of the Holy Ghost. We must notice that he occupied himself, in the followings, only with the Saints, whom the godlike is more obvious at. (...) It is rightly so, said Palamas, that the name grace it is applied to some created realities too: for instance, to a gift given by somebody, or to the beauty of a blessing. But the Holy Fathers called as grace the brightness of the godlike nature too, which is seen and experienced only by the Saints. This one is uncreated. This is a power and a work lighting the Saints and uniting them with God. If Christ had promised us and if He had given us only a created grace, what the proof that he is God will be like? Because, we too, we give to one another created wisdom, created virtue, and other useful gifts, created too.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 136)

“Palamas said that (...) if the grace from the saints had been only a natural aptitude, one wouldn’t have been saying about Saints that they are elevated above nature, that they are born out of God, that they become one Ghost with the Son, neither the Lord has given only to the people who believe in Him the right and the power of calling themselves as son of God. In such a case the Son’s coming into world it wouldn’t have brought anything new. Then, what we are baptizing ourselves for?” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 137-138)

“The natural things, the existence, the life, the knowledge, they are only the result of the godlike works, but they aren’t the works themselves. But the life and the godlike grace of the Saints, they are the godlike work and power which God unites Himself with the worthy ones with.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 138)

“The persons having within them the godlike grace and power, they do not have these only for themselves, but they share these to other people too, without diminishing it. Likewise, there are lighten and they lighten at their turn, the clouds which are lighten by the sun. Or, another comparison: a brick is imparted with the fire even after not being in contact with the fire; by the fact that is solidified, it is red. But that brick actually isn’t imparted only with the fire’s effects, which that brick cannot convey to others. But when the brick is in contact with the fire, it can convey those effects to others too; the brick burns and it warms up.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 138)

“Gregory of Nyssa wrote (...): “The grace comes, by flowing undividedly, from the Father through the Son and through the Ghost, over the worthy ones.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 162)

“The Law wasn’t able to escape the people from sin, because, while asking the people not to commit sins, the Law didn’t give them also the strength they needed to do that. That’s why, Christ has given the grace, or the power of the love lived in His sacrifice for the people, for, as He killed the death through a death endured for His love for the people, being Him innocent, He wants to communicate to the people too, this love of His, or His grace, which the people to kill the death through.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 98)

Guarding the Mind

“Taking vigil and closing the senses up it promotes the mind’s focusing on a meditation turned upon the mind itself. The first purpose of this gathering in itself it is that of noticing its own thoughts, in order to banish the evil though from the first moment they occur, and in order to associate the good thoughts, immediately they occur, to the thought at God, with the intention not to deviate towards evil. By this cleaning of ours of the passionate thought, we are elevated – according to Saint Maximos the Confessor – on the second level of the dispassion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 125)

Heart

“The Holy Fathers reckon that the passionate thoughts are arisen in our conscience mostly by satan, but by stirring up some passions which we have accustomed ourselves to. Diadochus of Photice, by interpreting the Lord’s word that: “out of heart proceed evil thoughts”, he showed that our heart, or our mind, it doesn’t conceive by its nature such thoughts, and that if sometimes out of our heart, or mind, there come evil thoughts too, this is due to a habit which he has achieved also under the influence of the evil ghost. But most often the evil thoughts are stirred up by the evil ghost by stirring up a passion of ours. But it seems that heart has two meanings. There is a heart as hidden center of the mind, as mind’s face turned towards God, namely this is what we called the supra-conscious or the trans-conscious. This heart remains closed to our conscience as long as we are living an inferior automatic life which is closed in the world’s seen horizon. About this heart said Mark the Ascetic that it is the inside part of the iconostasis, in which Christ has been dwelling since our Baptism, and that this heart can’t be opened except through God and through the understanding hope. From there, from the “hidden temple of the heart” the mind takes the good and beautiful urges from Christ Who is dwelling there” and it prolongs them into a virtuous living.

There is another heart too. This is the subconscious of the passions. We could say that this is the memory of our passionate vibration and deeds, a memory imprinted in our being, tied to our being’s biological side, as the supra-conscious would be the memory of the spiritualized acts and the potentiality of the superior energies. Both of them are called as heart because of being the hidden, central regions of our being, one of them belonging to the spirit, and the another belonging to the soul’s life tied to our biological side, and what dwells much within us, namely within them, that becomes characteristic and loved. The heart is what is more hidden and more affectionate within us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 125-126)

“We could say that in mind, or in conscience, there appear both good thoughts starting from the mind’s own supra-conscious, and also passionate thoughts stirred up by the passionate movements which have been memorized by our subconscious memory of the soul tied to the biological. Only for at the beginning, the good heart – that of God – it is known to us, we believe that everything comes out of only one heart, as the today’s psychology believes that all the thought, good and evil, they come out of the same subconscious. But as we turn back from the surface life to our real deeps, our true heart it opens to us and it becomes obvious to us that the good things come from where God is within us, and the evil thoughts do not come from the same place, but from an inferior area, which is called as heart only improperly. That’s why, on one hand, one can say about heart that is evil, while on the other hand, we say, though, that a man “is evil in his heart”; or, on one hand, that the evil thoughts come out of heart too and on the other hand, that the evil man is “heartless”. This is, when the good heart is closed up, namely put out of work; this is for as the work of the “passionate heart” increases, the good heart closes, and vice versa.” (Stăniloae 1992: 127)

“The whole our endeavor in order to clean up our thoughts, which is an important step towards dispassion, we must do it in connection with the good heart and with Christ who inhabits our good heart. Only by directing the good thoughts towards this good heart, thoughts which actually spring out from this heart, and only by relating the evil thoughts - from the first moment they occur - to this good heart, we can succeed in the work of our inward cleaning. By doing this we struggle for the predomination of the good heart, or of Christ who dwells in our good heart. This is for our conscience becomes a battle field between Christ and the evil ghost, through the good and evil thoughts they send through the two hearts. Each one tries to gain the adhesion of our conscience. By relating everything to the good heart, we help to the victory of Christ within us Who will clean the passionate “heart” too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 127)

“Through the good heart works God, through the evil heart work the evil ghosts. The man always has on his right hand the good angels and on the left hand the evil one, sometimes being one of them victorious, and some other times being victorious the another. Both hearts are called heart also for the fact that they both are carried away by an infinite aspiration. But the good heart looks at the infinite of light, being illuminated by that infinite; the evil “heart” looks at the infinite of darkness, being darkened by it. In front of each heart there is opened an abyss: in front of the good heart there is the abyss of life, in front of the other heart there is the black, negative abyss, the abyss of the emptiness, of the platitude, an abyss that also attracts us, but it does it in a passionate way, by deceiving us with the attraction of a false infinity; in the front of the good heart there is the abyss of the endless happiness; in the front of the evil heart there is the abyss of the short pleasures followed by the monotonous endless discontent. The fact that each of these hearts feels attracted by an infinite abyss it determined the German mystics to consider the man’s heart itself as an infinite abyss. But ontologically, the man cannot be infinite, but it only stays opened the infinite in front of him, as environment which the man can advance in, which the man can breathe in. In this sense, Christ Who dwells within our heart, He is the infinite of the life, not-separated from our deeps, for now as virtuality. Opposite to Him, there is the infinite of the emptiness which, by the will of God, it is eternally lived by us, because God no longer fills up with life the individuals created by Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 127-128)

“The dispassion would be a complete predominance of the good heart, open to the life’s infinite, for if the passionate heart is agitated and disordered, the good heart is calm, smooth, sweets, and spreading the resting, feeding itself out of the resting of the godlike infinite life.” (Stăniloae 1992: 128)

“Our heart has its depths too, as it would be the feeling of Christ dwelling within it, and it has its intensities too. We do not experience all the heart’s depths on its first moments of openness namely we do not fully feel Christ within our heart, at the beginning. There is a progress in this feeling. That’s why the mind or the cogitation that always brings its first thought at the heart’s door, it must try on each time to penetrate deeper in the heart, since the heart has opened to it and it is feeling the mind up with an ever greater more intense feeling of Christ’s godlike infinity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 131)

“There is a guarding of the mind by the mind itself. This has the purpose to defend the mind against scattering, to guard each mind’s thought against being kidnapped by the random or passionate associations. But because this guarding of the mind, which is the same with guarding the thoughts, it cannot succeed in its endeavor except by always bringing the thought at the door of the heart, this steadfast operation it is also called as guarding of the heart, not only in the sense of guarding the heart against something unclean but also in the sense of always being at its door with the offer of good thoughts, trying to penetrate ever deeper within heart. Standing guard at the heart’s door, the mind doesn’t do anything else but guarding itself not-strayed, for the heart isn’t else - in the last analysis - but the deeps of the mind.” (Stăniloae 1992: 131)

“That heart on whose door one knocks with defiled thoughts, with callous thought, it won’t open. That man no longer has a heart, he is “heartless”. His heart is so locked up that it has become a simple virtuality. By bringing the good thoughts towards heart, it isn’t being actualized only the heart, but those thoughts are being strengthened in good too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 131)

Heavens

“Between heavens and earth there is a direct connection. The angels mustn’t cross through the “sky” in order to come on earth, and the people from earth have Christ in them, so that they have somewhat impropriated the heavens themselves, as earnest, in the Persons of Christ and of the Holy Ghost. That’s why, these people can easily be taken after their death, to heavens where Christ is (Philip. 1: 23). The heavens, as dwelling place of the angels and of the righteous souls, who are in communion with Christ, they are the fullness of the existence, for in heavens they are imparted with the One Who truly is. The heavens have an endless stability and fullness of existence, so that the ones who are in heavens have also a stability and a fullness of existence, by “receiving a steadfast kingdom” (Hebr. 12: 28), for they are imparted with God, “the One Who truly is”, the One having an infinite depth Who is not deprived of life, for He is an infinite Person or, better said, for he is Trinity of Persons in consummate unity and love. The heavens are the irradiation of this limitless fullness of existence out of the Holy Trinity, the source of the perfect love. If the evil from the ones from hell is a minimum participation to the existence which is from God, the good from the ones who are in heavens it is the plenitude of the participation to God, the One infinitely existent, on the maximum measure, we could say endless, of the capacity of participation of the creatures endowed with spirit. “For to be it is not from us, but only from God” and “The evil is a lack in existence”. That’s why in God “find their resting the ones who believe in Him, while the others won’t enter this resting, namely they won’t enter any resting” (Hebr. 4: 1-11).” (Stăniloae 1997: 199)

Hell

“This will be a resurrection towards the eternal loneliness, and not towards communion, a resurrection of a person with his nature reduced to minimum, because it won’t be imparted with the godlike life of nature. If a minus in existence it can subsist in a hypostasis, as the Holy Fathers say, that minus will be able to have an eternal existence in him, in order the respective hypostasis to suffer of this minus in eternity. Such a hypostasis stays at the edge of the plenary existence, a plenary existence that subsists in the other hypostases. His torment is also some participation to existence, therefore some participation to others’ resurrection towards the eternal life, due to Christ’s resurrection. Without this external participation, he wouldn’t suffer the minus of his existence and he wouldn’t bring, even by this, homage to the plenary existence in communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 91-92)

“In hell takes place (...) an extreme tearing apart between soul and body, and even between the tendencies of the soul and of the body, as it is amongst people, and as it is between man and world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 177)

“It is the inferno that is closed in a monotonous composition and it deepens this composition in a tearing apart and in a “finite” complexity. It is like a road that is, on one hand, impossible to abolish, and on the other hand, this road is endlessly macerated.” (Stăniloae 2003: 176)

“The one using the time as road towards the eternity of the hell, instead of using it for increasingly surpassing on himself, her advances from the present state in order to gain a more accentuated state of domination. Through this he advances in death, because he doesn’t get out of himself in a real manner and, due to this cause, he doesn’t accept to launch himself in the interval that leads him towards the other subject and, finally, towards the divine Subject. He doesn’t live the time as a death toward himself and as a leap in eternity. That’s why he continuously fears the biological death. He uses the time for advancing in himself, in order to strengthen himself in his selfish ego, in order to deepen himself in time. This is the time that leads the being further, in death, in void. And it leaves the being in that emptiness. The one leaving only in time, by fighting only in this sense against advancing in the biological weakening, he is spiritually dead, and he won’t be able to resurrect out of death towards life. This time cannot be properly considered as time for life, because it is an interval between persons, between the human person and the divine Person. It already is, before ending in hell, an apparent time, or an apparent interval, because the person doesn’t really get out of himself and the person doesn’t gain any increasing of the life, nothing really new; because the person doesn’t move beyond himself, he doesn’t move in the temporal interval in order to overcome it through the self-giving towards the other one and, finally, towards God. That time that is only an interval between person and the things the persons want to grab and accumulate, or between person and the other persons regarded as things to be dominated and exploited, it isn't properly said a real interval, but it is an apparent interval, and advancing in the own desert, to the total death. To this self the succeeding moments aren't a grace of God, through which the man can advance in God, but a curse through which the man increasingly deepens himself in the definitive death. That man fears the time and he doesn't see the whole value of the time." (Stăniloae 2003: 196-197)

"As long as we preserve a spiritual mobility, the time persists with its double possibility, conform to the ambivalent capacity of our liberty: as an occasion of fallings and raisings up, as road to the luminous eternity or, a contrary, towards the darkened eternity. Our time will cease, in the same time with this capacity which is characteristic to the time, when God will reckon that he can give us the possibility that our answer to love to be simultaneously to the appeal made to us, or when we will be definitively and totally closed into our loneliness; when the request and the answer of the dialogue will fully cover each other, when there won't be either request of answer - when there won't be request because there won't be answer to it, and there won't take place an answer because the request for it will no longer be heard. A continuous refusal to answer the love and to offer oneself, it will fix the spiritual creature in a total helplessness of communicating. Then there will be no waiting for, and no hope." (Stăniloae 2003: 200)

"The time that has totally fallen off the range of the eternity, that time no longer has anything even out of the character of the time, being an eternity opposed to the true eternity. That time is no longer properly said time, because it no longer is a succession of always new states, states which are stimulated by the hope of reaching further into eternity, but it is an eternity of the monotony, of the void, within which the hope is no longer possible, neither the waiting for or the fulfilling. That is the time empty of substance or of the succession having a meaning, because there is nothing to waiting for, and there is nothing being done within that time; this is because such time is no longer attracted by eternity. That time is the unique endless state, lived as a curse, as a petrifying, or as a conscious death. That time is the impossibility of the darkened eternity of the hell, the outer darkness (of the existence), the absence of the lived life, but still a torment." (Stăniloae 2003: 201)

"The not-changeability of the hell it is the total void of the life. The ones who are in this state, they totally have broken themselves from the dialogue of love, which kept them hanging on eternity. Their life is no longer properly being an existence." (Stăniloae 2003: 201)

"The time coincides to the becoming, for it tends towards the full communion with God, it tends towards eternity. The becoming isn't within God, neither it is in hell. Admitting a becoming in God it means no longer seeing Him in the plenitude of the life and no longer recognizing the plenitude either in the Creator. The time will no longer exist either in heavens or in hell. There won't be a time in heavens because the ones from there they have God as plenitude; there won't be a time in hell because nobody being there could tend towards God any longer (Rev. 12: 12). But this won't be a resting. This is because the void without hope it is a torment. "Their worm won't ever rot" (Isa 66: 24; Mk. 9: 44, 46, 48). The time is a grace given for repentance (Rev. 2: 21) and a hope. But the ones from hell will no longer have this grace." (Stăniloae 2003: 201-202)

"But it can happen also the opposite: by overcoming the spatial distances, to be at insurmountable spiritual distances. It can happen that the people to convert the shrunk external distances, or the closeness imposed them against their will, in huge and insurmountable distances. And actually, the experience we are living today, it shows us as verisimilar the almost sure perspective of the shrinkage of the distances almost to be annulled, with the occurring of true precipices between people. There seems increasingly possible the perspective of a "petrified precipice" (Lk. 16: 26), that can no longer be removed from its place. The external distance between "here" and "there" it can become minimal or indifferent, but there can take place a petrification of the spiritual distances, a fact that no longer gives to a person the urge and the possibility to move himself towards another person. In such a case, God Himself with His uncreated energies, as being before a connection bridge, as longing and attraction amongst people, He withdrew. Thus, the loneliness will have a supra-temporal and supra-spatial character, in a bad way, or sub-temporal and sub-spatial. This loneliness was being prepared while the person still was on earth, by the fact that the egotist "had no time" for others, in order to overcome the space, and, through this, he neither had "longing" for others, because he didn't feel the need to cross over the distance towards them, or he crossed that distance not to reach somebody but to cross further. The egotistic speed overcomes the time and the space not in order to get closer to somebody, but to slide past him." (Stăniloae 2003: 213-214)

"According to the Christian faith, in hell the sinners are in the darkness from outside the real world." (Stăniloae: 2003: 499)

"The absence in hell of the life into God it is also an absence of the world's normality, a transformation of the world in a piling up of hallucinating shadows carried on by chaotic movements. It is a sinking in a nightmare, in the pseudo-reality of the self-detached from the consistent reality of the world, as transparent means of the plenitude of life of God. In heavens, all the things were beautiful for they were concretized gestured of the love of God perceived by Adam and Eva through their love. After falling, in existence appear also ugly, poisoning, monotonous features, or the sinner does them to be so. The creation, by and large, it loses the way of the good unmixed with the evil, the depths open to the infinite knowledge, and it brings into light, through the sinner, a way mixed with pains, with many failures, and with lack of fullness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 499-500)

“The Christendom relates to the sin, or to the breaking from the Ghost of God, the diminishing of the soul’s life, of the soul’s death, and therefore the illnesses, the corruption, and the physical death. Through the sin, of through the withdrawal of the godlike Ghost, the creation weakens in its vital resources. Our being itself, in the state of sin, it can advance to the egotism of the singularizing, so that it almost no longer knows that it really exists. This state, by becoming permanent in hell, it is the eternal death, after the death as separation of the soul from the decomposing body.” (Stăniloae 2003: 500)

“On the other hand, we mustn’t consider totally inappropriate either the word (from I Pt. 3: 18): “in order to herald to the ghosts from prison”, for Christ heralded their liberation and the future resurrection with the body and, by and large, He brought them the great news of the salvation He did. So, Christ fulfilled there also a teaching-propheying function, for as we said before, the three ministrations are never separated.” (Stăniloae 2006: 71)

“This act of victory is actually an active manifestation of Christ. Christ isn’t in hell in a purely passive state, out of which He is going to be risen by the Father, on Sunday. Properly said, Christ firstly overcomes the hell with His soul, for the Holy Ghost, being united with Christ’s godlike Hypostasis, the Ghost produces firstly the full deification and the spiritualization of Christ’s soul, after Christ endured all the way to the end the death for God and for people, by entering the consummate communion with God and by fully giving place to the Holy Ghost within Him. Out of the soul thus filled up with the Holy Ghost, it irradiated in the souls of the ones who hoped in Him, and who were in hell, the power which escaped them from the hell’s mastery.” (Stăniloae 2006: 71)

“The soul has been created for the eternal life, in order to be able to dwell in the made of light dwelling, which is Christ, or for Christ to dwell in the soul. But even if the soul remains empty of Christ, the soul will still exist forever, in order to know for what great worthiness he has been built, and in order to eternally regretting for missing it, and therefore to remain in an eternal sufferance for his separation from God, in Who he was, or Who was in him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 158)

“In a certain way, the human being remains as a spiritual basis or as an indestructible person even in sinners. The difference is only that the spiritual factor from within the believer, after it has strengthened here its functions in contact with the spiritual world, it will receive in the future life an unimaginable rich accomplishment. In the sinner though, the spiritual factor will bring with itself an atrophied, perverse state, which won't be at its turn without some agitation, some experience, and some variety. On one hand it will be helpless and emptied of all the pseudo-values which he believed in, while living on earth. But in the torment for this loss, there still be a human experience. He remains somehow in relation with God, even if only a negative relation. Thus, the righteous will be supra-awarded for the loss of the psychic-biological life through the abundance of the spiritual life, while the sinner, deserted by his psychic-biological life, he won't receive anything in exchange, but he will still keep a conscience tormented by this desertion, one not totally quenched out." (Stăniloae 1997: 161-162)

"If the man hasn't exercised all his spirit's functions, the loss of the empirical life won't be awarded to him by a revealing of the spiritual life. His crooked spirit, disrobed of the cover of the phenomena's life, it won't be able to soar to towards the spiritual life. From everything he has worked here he will remain with nothing else but a regret, which cannot repair anything, that he hasn't strengthened in himself the functions of the incorruptible spirit. The death burns in him everything, as a fire, without to appear anything on the burnt place (1 Cor. 3: 1-5). That one will have an existence empty of any content worthy of attention, and incapable of forming or of receiving such content." (Stăniloae 1997: 162)

"Therefore, the death is the crossing to a plus of life, not for the simple liberation of the spirit from the body, but for the fact that it is entering a fuller communion with Christ, to the one who cultivated this communion here on earth. That's why, to the one who didn't cultivate it, it is a crossing to a helplessness of maintaining any longer some connection with the world and with the other people. But the conscious existence still is something positive. The unrest of the one who is being tormented it still have a value, indicating the man as person, or as conscious individual." (Stăniloae 1997: 162)

"A totally different explanation – regarding the hell (o. n.) – is given us by Saint Maximos the Confessor and Saint John Damascene. They do not see the hell upheld by a positive act of condemnation of the ones who refuse Him, a condemnation coming from God, but as their refusal of loving Him. Saint Maximos affirms that the one from hell is loved by God and he cherishes God; but his unhappiness consists just in the fact that he is separated from God and he stays with the ones who hate God, and whom himself hates. And the most tormenting and dreadful thing it is to forever be with the ones who hate you and who are hated, even without torments, but more so with torments; and the hell means to be separated from the ones who loves you and whom you love (cherish). This is for God isn't hated by the judged ones as One Who judges rightly, for He is and He is called according to His nature: love, neither He hates the condemned ones, for He is, of course, free of any passion, according to His nature." (Stăniloae 1997: 173-174)

"By being a matter of communion, the God's judgment it receives a totally new meaning. The God's judgment, which some people will be made through as partakers to the eternal happiness, and other to the eternal unhappiness, it means that only God, open to any person created for communion, He ascertains with regret, that some person do not accept or they have become incapable of accepting this communion, and by this they remain in unhappiness by their freedom itself. In the fresco from the external wall of the Sucevița Monastery (from Romanian province of Moldavia), the souls climb some ladder towards Christ, Who waits for them at the upper end of the ladder, and the souls are watched from the superior right side by multitudes of angels, and from the left side by demons. Each step represents the trial of a certain passion of the soul. The soul, who is found as being dominated by a passion or another, he falls off the respective step, in the abyss agitated by demons, the soul not reaching thus the communion with Christ. This falling in the darkened precipice, corresponding to a certain passion, it starts since the life on earth, as a falling into the darkened loneliness of the lack of cohesion with Christ, out of Whose love it irradiates the light. It is a falling into the egotism's barren pit, out of which there is no light irradiating and out of which somebody can no longer come out, because of neither by his weakened will, accustomed to the illusion that the freedom consists of the existence by himself, he no longer wants to get out." (Stăniloae 1997: 175-176)

"The question remains: why, consecutive to God's judgment, the ones who leave this life without having faith in Him, and therefore without having openness towards the communion with Him and through Him with the other people, they must remain eternally in hell? Why the God's appreciation for those ones, or this state of their ascertained by God, after their death, it has as consequence that they are made permanent in this condition?" (Stăniloae 1997: 176)

"The question is: do the ones who leave from here in this situation fall in a state of unhappiness greater than the one they lived in here? Don't they have the possibility ever to enter the communion with God and therefore to be take out from hell? The teaching of the Church about the taking out from hell of some souls from there, between the particular and the universal judgment, it allows us to answer this question. According to this teaching, the ones who go in hell after their particular judgment by still having some faith, namely without having an attitude totally against God, they will possibly reach the situation that the virtuality of their capacity of communion, that is present within them, to be actualized. So, this hell, it implies two possibilities: the possibility of being eternal, for some souls, and the possibility of not being eternal, for the other souls from there. One cannot tell certainly who will be eternal and who won't, in principle there is the possibility for some of them to not be eternal. But the mystery of the freedom doesn't allow us to tell that the hell will cease for everybody to be eternal. The ones who won't be able to exit the hell until the universal judgment, they won't be ever able to exit it." (Stăniloae 1997: 176)

"What is based the affirmation on, that the ones who will be left in hell through the universal judgment they will eternally remain there, since God doesn't cease to be a loving God and since those will forever keep a certain freedom? It is based on the prescience of God, on the basis of which God knows for sure that those won't ever answer His offer of love, either because of not wanting, or because of having created through the total refusal of the communion from their life on earth and from the interval between the particular judgment and the universal judgment, such a condition, that they are no longer capable of accepting a communion with God. Saint John Damascene reckons that the lack of will of wanting God it is covered by the passionate "exchangeability" of the soul from hell. Properly-dais, after death the souls are "unchangeable": in good, the ones from paradise, and in evil the ones from hell." (Stăniloae 1997: 176-177)

"The mystery of the fact that some souls could be taken out from hell until the universal judgment, and some others couldn't get out forever but they will cross into the eternal hell, together with the ones who will cross there from life, on the moment of the world's end, it is a mystery of the human being's freedom, and as mystery of the human being's possibility to become callous in a negative freedom, one impossible to be overcome, and we cannot understand it. To our mind it is equally possible that the ones from hell to want getting out of it or to not want this. Only God can penetrate and know, from before, this mystery, and we have nothing else to do but to believe what He has told us through Revelation, and it remains to us to find out only at the final judgment which people will be sent in the eternal hell." (Stăniloae 1997: 177)

"Berdyayev admits a hell consisting of the refusal of the communion with God, but he thinks this is a subjective hell, and not an ontological one, and he declares that it is impossible the hell to last forever. But besides the fact that this means a rationalization of the human freedom, his affirmation doesn't take in account the fact that from a while there cannot be made a separation from subjective and ontological. A narrow manner of thinking, of feeling, of considering the things and the people, it creates in the human being's nature a certain ontological condition, it disfigures the profound spirit, and neither the Christendom says that hell is only an external tormenting circumstance, and not also a world of disfigured spirits, petrified in evil, in a twisted way of seeing the reality.” (Stăniloae 1997: 177)

“The contribution of the subjective – or even imaginative, phantasmagorical – factor to the upholding of the hell’s torments, it is indicated by Saint John Damascene when he says that the fire from there it consist of the lusts which no longer find the matter to be satisfied. This is for the unsatisfied lust it torments through the impossibility of giving the images of pleasure a real consistency and, on the measure the impossibility to be they given a reality is prolonged, they increase their charming appearances and, by doing so, they also increase their tormenting power, given the impossibility of finding the real corresponding hypostases. The lack of the matters which to satisfy the lusts it is the objective element of the torments from hell. And the phantasmagorical effervescence of the lust, maintained by this lack, it is the subjective element.” (Stăniloae 1997: 177)

“The souls ending in hell after death, they do not endure material torments, or even a material fire, as there it would be according to a teaching especially developed in the Catholic teaching. It is rather about the souls’ helplessness in directing their desire towards the communion with God as spiritually good, and thus they remain in a continuous regret because of they are no longer able to enjoy the material pleasures and the pride which they exclusively accustomed themselves with. They cannot receive the taste of the spiritual joys, which have as essence the communion with God, the personal reality, and the supreme (hypostatical) consistency.” (Stăniloae 1997: 177-178)

“The hell is a double-evil: the desire of committing the sin and the impossibility to commit it. It means attaching to the sin that can no longer be committed materially and therefore is a refusal of searching for the spiritual goods. Through helplessness the human being is take out even from the relation with the things, or from an egotistic, passing relation with another person. All his connections with the reality are cut off. He lives a phantasmagorical existence, one of nightmare. He is totally locked down in the loneliness’ pit. Only the demons and his lusts bite him like some snakes. One can say, by developing this idea further, that his monstrously grown subjectivity, it makes him no longer seeing the others’ reality. He can no longer have even passionate, fugitive contacts with the others. His subjective imagination covers even the reality of the objects, for he reckons them too modest for his imagination. He somehow falls down in the dream existence where everything becomes chaos in a senseless absurdity, without any consistence, without any searching for getting out from there, and without any hope for exiting.” (Stăniloae 1997: 178)

“One could ask: why God doesn’t show Himself to those ones in the whole His light, in order they to get out of darkness and of theirs attitude of refusal of the communion with Him? Why God let them “in darkness”? The presence of God isn’t an external reality, in order to impose itself as such, but He offers Himself as a loving You; and as such, He cannot be noticed but through the humble openness and full of longing for His love. But it happens the curious phenomenon that the ones who defends his autonomy he insists stubbornly in his refusal of accepting somebody who, through the love he offers himself with, it makes him realizing that on this offer, it depends his true existence. The one who is callous in pride cannot admit something like this, and this is because he cannot admit that somebody can love him while he cannot love anybody. He could admit the reality of one who depends on him, but he cannot admit somebody who unveils to himself, as the one who depends on him, through his endless love. But the one who he admits, with the pride that by admitting him he gives that one his existence, he no longer wants to give himself to that one. Thus, God cannot be perceived as loving person by the one who doesn’t want to receive Him in this quality. Only to the one who wants God’s love, God shows Himself as love. That’s why Saint Isaac the Syrian said that the hell is a punishment of love.” (Stăniloae 1997: 179-180)

“To the others God is present under the cover of the rigors occurring in a life deprives of love, under the painful consequences of such a life. Even the things which they want to find their pleasure in, those things lose their consistency, for those things too are a gift from God and they cannot be fully possessed except by the one who accepts God through love. Both this aspect are mentioned by Saint John Damascene: the ones who want God they have Him, and the ones from hell, who has become callous in not-wanting God and who want only the things which can offer them pleasures, they do not have either God or those things. They have fallen in a total void. That is something starting from the life on earth - at least in the form that the one who doesn’t have God - from a while he no longer feels any pleasure from things. Properly-said, who has God, he has everything, and he knows the depths of all things.” (Stăniloae 1997: 179-180)

“The existence is a gift from God. God manifests His love by eternally offering His love to the ones from hell. He shows in this too the indelible value of the human person. If he had kept only the ones from paradise, he wouldn’t have shown that He respects the human being even when he opposes Him; namely that He respects the human being’s freedom. God keeps the ones from hell too, through their existence, in a certain connection with Him. He allows in existence the ones who deny Him too. Through this He manifests a kenosis. On one hand, God doesn’t take them forcedly out of their callous condition, from a freedom denying Him – because of, in order to do than, He must deprive them of their freedom. On the other hand, God doesn't want to destroy them; this would be another despising of their existence and freedom. Between these two sides, which would manifest a reduced kindness of God and a despising of their human freedom, God chooses to maintain them in their refusal attitude towards Him. It was said that such a solution would introduce the sadness in the internal life of God; and that's why it was offered the solution of the universal salvation. But neither this one would be accomplished without disregarding the human freedom." (Stăniloae 1997: 180-181)

"The solution of maintaining the souls from hell in an eternal condition of incompleteness it cannot be worse than a salvation without communion in freedom. But it has the advantage that, by accepting it, God accepts not only the sadness of not seeing everybody in the happiness of the communion with Him, but he also manifests the greatness of His generosity by giving them an eternal existence in an eternal opposition to Him, and by showing them a respect of their freedom." (Stăniloae 1997: 181)

"The hell's eternity indicates the mysterious paradox of the freedom of the one who cannot find the true life in the communion's freedom, and that's why he doesn't even want to search for it. And the great mystery on God's side it is that God doesn't destroy the one who commits sin, even if God fore-knows that one's eternal lack of repentance, and God still respect him even such. This is an eternal keeping of the human being in relation with God. Neither the human being can totally forget about God, nor God want to forget the human being, no matter what the human being would be like." (Stăniloae 1997: 181-182)

"Even in the attitude of the man who doesn't want to know of God, and who still cannot totally forget about God, there is an excruciating sufferance, which the man detests it, but out of which, on the other hand, he cannot get out. If the man had totally forgotten of God, he wouldn't have suffered, but he wouldn't have been man too. The godlike image is disfigured in him, but not destroyed. It is in this too a depth which only the man can have it. The monotony, the extreme helplessness, and the eternal sadness, they too occasion endlessly various modes of the torments, for they are monotony, helplessness, and a sadness of the man. The existence which Saint John Damascene tells us about that it remains a gift from God even to the ones from hell it cannot be only an empty, neutral shell. Even if it was an empty shell, it would produce reflections in the conscience by the fact that it causes torments. No matter how petrified this sadness is, it still is like a struggling, it still is a conscious life, because of being lived by a person." (Stăniloae 1997: 182)

"The whole mystery of the sufferance in hell, or of the hell's content, which can have at its turn, even in its monotony, continuously various reflections in the man's conscience, it is not for us to understand during our life on earth, but we can only intuit it from some shadows which the hell projects in this life." (Stăniloae 1997: 184)

"The demons deepen the souls of the ones who died unrepentant, even more in this confusion united with the stubbornness, in the darkness of the pseudo-reality and of not knowing clearly about themselves, by making them to advance in the state of superficial scattering which they have been living in. The hell could be only the last accentuation of this inconsistent spiritual "sky", which is neither the real world, as leaning point for any serious and conscious action, nor is the "heaven" of the supreme values which the world must be elevated at. The demons cannot take these souls in "heavens", because of them not having either the permission to enter it. Their evilness and frivolity bring the ones who obeyed them during their life, to this pseudo-existence, by crossing them from an inconsistent and phantasmagorical plan on another, even more inconsistent, but into a continuity with it. These two plans appear as monotonously connected to one another, like are connected a finite act to an infinite act of some absurd, tormenting, and boring nightmares. But one cannot escape the hell's nightmares either by ascesis, or by suicide, because of the body's absence, namely because of an incorruptible body after resurrection. It is an incorruptibility of some nightmares which cannot be scattered away, because there is no possibility to go out in a consistent reality. If the hell is often called by the spiritual writings as darkened and tenebrous earth, as "earth of the eternal darkness", this might mean that it has become eternal the living in this chaotic kaleidoscope of inconsistent and meaningless images, which they have been accustomed to live in, the ones who go in hell, through their egotism from their life on earth, and which there is no possibility to get out of. In this sense it can be understood the belief that the moribund see in a lightening instant all the evil deeds they have done during their life on earth, a fact that disturbs them and frightens their sight, because of all these images become transparent to the ghosts which attracted the moribund to do the evil deeds. The hell would be the becoming permanent and the accentuation of this sight." (Stăniloae 1997: 197-198)

"The ones in hell, but not totally lacking the faith in Christ, they can be moved, at their turn, in the paradise of the communion with Christ until the final judgment, or they can be elevated from heavy torments to easier torments, through the prayers of the ones on earth, and of the saints asked for by the ones on earth, but maybe done out of own initiative too. Through the prayers of the ones on earth accompanied by the placing the pieces of the leavened bread, for the deceased ones, around the God's Lamb that has become the body of Christ, the ones who are in the unhappiness of the non-communion with Christ, they are maybe helped by the communion offered to them by Christ through His sacrifice, and by the communion offered to them by the ones who are praying for them, in order they to accept this communion, or to be mellowed by this communion, in case that they didn't passed away totally hostile to this communion, or dead to it." (Stăniloae 1997: 218)

"The ones reached in hell, but not totally lacking the faith in Christ, or not hostile to Him, and who through their smaller faith they didn't commit destroying deeds for the others' life and salvation and for their humanity, as killings, abortions, disordered sexuality outside marriage, depriving other of the necessary goods, urges, examples, teachings, and acts of violence, things which had taken the others' possibility of salvation with, or they repented for these things before dying, but not in a degree corresponding to their evil deeds and not with repairing within themselves and as much as possible in others' favor of the grave consequences of their deeds, they can be helped to reenter a sufficient communion with Christ and with the other people, since they manifested at the end of their life the desire of reestablishing this communion, a fact meaning that they even started restoring it. That's why the Church grants a great importance to the confession before death, meaning actually the real beginning of the reestablishing the communion with Christ and with the fellow humans, through the priest's person, they partially annulling through this deed of theirs, the dangerous influence they exercised upon other through their example and urge to estranging from Christ and through the tearing apart of others' humanity and of their own humanity." (Stăniloae 1997: 218-219)

"The one who remembers somebody, he helps him to remain alive. All the more, one is helped by being remembered by God. To the one who is totally or partially stricken by amnesia, all the persons or certain persons sink into nothingness. This means that the person stricken by amnesia no longer gives them any help to exist; the forgotten persons lose by this a support, they lose a purpose of their existence, a signification of this existence of theirs. And if the human person is stricken by amnesia relating to a person, that person will lose any purpose, any signification, and any interest in continuing to exist. That person will spiritually sink in some sort of tormenting desert. And since spiritually dead, his soul will have definitively entered this tormenting and meaningless desert. This effect is all the more conveyed by the forgetfulness from God, to a man who doesn't answer God's preoccupation with him. To this voluntary divine amnesia, it is added the partially voluntary amnesia of the human persons who have never received a positive answer from the respective person. That person, by falling from the dialogue with God and with the fellow humans, he has fallen from reality in the phantasmagorical void, without content and meaningless, which constitutes an untold torment." (Stăniloae 1997: 224)

“The sinners’ resurrected bodies by being incorruptible too, and lacking the need for consumption, they must have some kind of spiritual thinness. But it must be, in the same time, some darkness spirituality and, in the same time, it must be a much-accentuated expressivity of their soul’s evilness and loneliness, and tormented by demons. In the same time, the lack of communicativeness it gives them a certain petrification, they not having the desire of knowing the creation extended and rooted in the infinite depths of God. The material sphere which these souls will be placed in, it can be, in these conditions, constituted almost only out of the tenebrously spiritualized matter of their bodies, out of some sort of connections between them and demons, constituting together some sort of shadows world, real in a way and unreal in another, with rather hallucinating dimensions than real dimensions. This fact can cause the inhabitants of that world not to see the world of light and of supreme reality of the righteous, by reckoning it as unreal and by forgetting about the ones who are in that world, as also the righteous couldn’t see the subjectively hallucinating and somehow unreal world of the sinners, neither the sinners from within that world.” (Stăniloae 1997: 287)

“The sinners will know about the world only from their memory, but neither that memory will show them the world as it was. They will know about a world crooked and defiled by their lusts. They will see only a world darkened by their lust and hallucinations. They won’t see each other’s faces, as they are in reality, but they will see only the others’ masks partially adopted by those ones and partially projected by their viewers; they will only know that the others are tormented in the same darkness where they are too, or, better said, in the same torments corresponding to their special passions. Each one will have an individual own world. There won’t be a unitary world in order to uphold a unity amongst them. They will see one another rather as some shadows emptied of the real world’s content, not progressing in knowing it, neither in their common spiritual enriching and in contact with the real world. In the Holy Scripture the believe often asks God not to send him away from His face, of maximum and infinite existence, in connection with which it stays and it is illuminated the whole world; or to make him partaker to His face’s light, for in this world he will be partaker to all things (Ps. 4: 6; 26: 1; 35: 9; 44: 5; 104: 4; 15: 2, 5; 60: 19; Mic. 7: 8; Hab. 3: 4; Jn. 8: 12; Col. 1: 12; 1 Thess. 5: 5; 1 Tim. 6: 16; Apoc. 21: 24; 22: 5 ct.).” (Stăniloae 1997: 287-288)

“One can say about the sinners’ bodies that they will form a unity too, that the sinners’ will be at their turn a “universal body”. Amongst the evil ones as egotists, there isn’t the same unity like amongst the ones who love one another. Or, at least, the sinners won’t be united internally, but forcedly, each one feeling the effluvia of the others’ evilness, which on one hand kindred them, and on the other hand they keep them turned away from one another. Only through love the persons are really united and only in love it is fully accomplished the fullness of the existence.” (Stăniloae 1997: 288)

“Of course, that it is a not-understood by us mystery, the fact that on one hand the sinners’ bodies are influenced, at their turn, by the Resurrection of Christ, they resurrecting too, and on the other hand, they are not imparted with the glory of the resurrected body of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 288)

“According to Saint Maximos the Confessor, the one who loved the ugly things, the one who didn’t want to see the glory of God, while he lived in the world, that one will sink; such persons fell in the abyss because of loving the vanity of the pride, and not the humbleness knowing the high and truly existing things; they will cry who laughed at all the serious things, they will be munched in the deep of their soul by the non-sleeping worm the ones who hated their brothers, envied them, cheated them, gossiped them, and parted them from sharing the things necessary for life and from the way leading to the true life; they have crooked their heart who didn’t have within them the sincerity of the love.” (Stăniloae 1997: 292-293)

“From all sides everybody will bring out in sight, to the one who did evil deeds, and to the surface of his conscience all the evil deeds he did, all the refusals of the brotherly dialogues with the deed and the reasons why since now he will be left into a dreadful and definitive loneliness. Then will come this total and definitive forsaking by everybody; the eternal silence and loneliness will encompass him like an ocean; it will follow his exiting from any dialogue, from any communication, and forever. He won’t be able to appeal anybody, and he won’t have the occasion to answer anybody. He will sink in the outer darkness. The impossibility of the dialogue makes inutile the prayer for them too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 296)

“The mystery of the eternal torments is equal to the mystery of the irremediable sickness, of better said is equal to the eternal death of the ones who will be condemned to the eternal torments. It is the mystery of the extreme callousness of the creature in the traits of the evil, consequently to practicing the evil.” (Stăniloae 1997: 307)

“God and the fellow human aren’t lived any longer, by the people condemned to hell, as looking at them and as speaking to them, for they are no longer able to look at those ones, and in those ones, and they no longer can have a dialogue with those ones. The continuous non-will of communication it has become their total and definitive helplessness of communication, remaining in the same time a non-will. This state is in the same time a punishment and a wanted state.” (Stăniloae 1997: 307)

“Even if the condemned to hell one will find in time some sort of satisfaction in their locking up against communication, secretly, their ego still suffers in this exclusive self-affirming. It becomes utterly tormenting when endlessly prolonged. Even in time, if this rejection of the communication will be total and it will prolong for too long, it will equal death. In it the man loses his speaking; he will no longer be able to express himself and he won’t be able to find in this situation of total locking up, in himself, the word which to save him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 307)

“The falling from the righteous, revelator word of a true reality, and from the loving deed and, by this, the falling from the connection with Christ, the godlike and human loving Word, and from the connection with the Subject of the consummator of man deed – it is total in hell. And this means that in hell there is total the falling from the light of the meanings and of the communion, as also from the image of the authentic man – namely the man in the image of God. It is a falling from the connection with the Word Who compels the man to answers with the deed and with the word. And it is also a falling from the Rationality Who keeps in front of man’s rationality the meanings of the true reality. It is a totally estrangement from the face of the Word and of the Rationality. And this total falling from meanings it equals to insanity, to the refusal of the reality which the fallen man replaces for or crooks it with the products of his hallucination, and this is a source of endless torment. This is for simultaneously, the ones whom this thing happens they continuously fear a hallucinating crooked reality. We see too often people who have an ill susceptibility, upheld by an immeasurable vanity, making them to torment themselves in front of us with fears, with imagined suspicions, not accepting us in any attitude towards them: neither in lenience, nor in understanding, neither in indifference, not in attention, neither in speaking to them, nor in keeping our silence, being them reduced to a tormenting helplessness and they reducing us too, to be incapable of helping them, in this relentless self-munching of theirs. Their non-communion and the non-rationality isn’t an abolishment of the communion and of the rationality by muteness and darkness, but it is a perverting of them: their rationality serves them as torment, the nonsense of their life consists of chaotically disorganizing the meanings, hearing the others’ words is a motif of all sorts of suspicions, their non-communion consists of communicating without effect of this incurable meaninglessness and on clinging on others’ words and on their existence in order to torment themselves even more, by crooking everything that is communicated to them, and by reducing to evil effects all their connection with others.” (Stăniloae 1997: 309)

“The torments on earth of the people fallen from communion, they are only a part of the non-communion and of the non-rationality of the hell. In the cases on earth only one is insane and maybe he isn’t totally like that. The others are sane, but they are incapable of helping him, they still having mercy on him and at least partially being them wanting to communicate him a power. Bu in hell everybody are in a total lucid insanity, namely fully blind and fully deaf towards others, or having a perverse look and hearing, communicating their incapacity of communication, by crooking any communication in a communication lacking the real possibility of communicating, by crying and by gnashing their teeth desperately, each one next to deaf walls, which at their turn cry and gnash their teeth, walls constituted of the others' creatures; by crying and by gnashing their teeth for the impossibility of communication and for the evilness they still communicate by this, evilness which each one feels it in others as addressed to them, as hallucinating increases. This is for all of them see the satan's face. The torment which they are in, it is, due to this, an "unsleeping worm". (Stăniloae 1997: 309-310)

"Somehow, in hell there is not time too, because of nothing knew is experienced there, because of not being there either dialogue or hope, and therefore no history too. Bu t the eternity from there is an endless torment, is the eternity of the tragic without exit, there is the endless precipice of the despair, the eternity of the darkness, of the chaos of endless absurd interweaving of meaninglessness, the eternity of losing and being chained in this desperate state of a labyrinth without exit and without novelty." (Stăniloae 1997: 310)

"If the light of Christ's love it unites, with Him, all the ones who strived to clean themselves of their egotistic passions, the ones who were cultivating those passions they will be also, after the final judgment, more united to one another through their hatred, in the future life, in rejecting Christ as God and as light of the love. The hatred unites too, partially because of the need of the one who hates for thinking at the one whom he hates. The hatred is a torment also because being a need for communication of the one who is, from another point of view, in the torment of the isolation or of the non-communication. The love as the light covering the bodies of the ones who love each other, it makes them even closer, as the hatred too, makes more closer the hatred and the enmity of the ones who hate one another. The ones who see their faces as darkened, on one hand they feel far from one another, but on the other hand they feel as close to each other through their hatred; on one hand, they do not know one another and they do not love each other, but on the other hand they "know" on one another and they torment on each other." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 134-135)

"Maybe the hell is only the helplessness of doing for others, any longer, in present and in future, what we didn't do for them in the past, because us being accustomed to a sterile present and future. We will be in a torment for our past, which we can no longer repair it, or which we no longer want to repair it, because us have been accustomed to not repair it, and which, just because of that, it torments us. In the present material universe, we have others whom we can help to, by doing them the good that we didn't do, to the ones from the past. But in hell we won't have anyone. There is no longer a history which we could correct within, in the present time, what we did evil in the past, and there isn't too, a better future which we could advance in, towards a happy eternity. In hell, by not advancing towards some target, one no longer advances, through correction, towards eternity. There is an identical present with a tormenting, sterile, impossible to change eternity. The possibility of advancing in time it implies in itself the possibility of advancing towards a consummate target, that is one with the eternity. The movement in time, itself, it implies the fact that the time is made for advancing towards eternity." (Stăniloae 1995: 140)

"The hell's torment consists of a helplessness of any transcendence from the situation we will be in, it consists of a painful eternity of the motionlessness, because we got accustomed to it while in the life in the material universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 140)

"In hell, there is no hope for the future, neither the belief that we can repair something from the past. We no longer can transcend towards others, we no longer can transcend towards their real mystery, namely neither towards our and of the God in Trinity mystery. We have forgotten about God and God no longer helps us. We no longer can love others, and other no longer can love us. We no longer find anything worthy to be loved at others. And that will last forever. We are forever alone. And we know that we are alone forever. We are in a superficialness, in an eternally unchanged bluntness, in an opaqueness or in a darkness, even relatedly to our own being. Our existence is reduced to the eternal monotony of the locking up in superficialness and loneliness. We cannot communicate, on ourselves, to anybody, and nobody can communicate, on himself, to us, because no one trust anybody. We have nothing better to communicate, except our rebuking and our mistrust. We no longer see except evilness from around us and, actually, there isn't anything else except evilness. And because in hell we will be with our body too, the torment of the loneliness, of the lack of comforting, of the painful mistrust, it will be intensified at maximum within our body too, through everybody's coldness, carelessness, and mistrust." (Stăniloae 1995: 140)

"At the end of the present material universe, the ones who didn't work at all for preparing themselves in order to have a fully transparent body, they will be brought too, to the resurrection with the body, even if they didn't cross, through death, on to a more luminous level. This is for those ones will reach too, to an eternity with the body, for Christ, by resurrecting, He has made eternal the identity of all the human beings created by God, in their body and soul entirety. But their bodies will have an opaqueness brought to extreme, and they will feel the torments of the impossible to satisfy addictions, so that within their too, there will be no spiritualization movement, due to the extreme weakness which their soul will have reached at. The opaqueness which they will have reached in, it will be a tormenting rigidity in evil, equivalent to the extreme spiritual helplessness regarding the communication. This opaqueness, by not letting to be seen in their soul any movement towards good, towards light, neither for them, nor for others, it won't allow them any openness. Differing from those, there will be the ones who will have been insufficiently prepared for the resurrection's transparency. Although their souls pass, after their death, in a somehow dark state, it will be possible they to be helped, in order to reach a happy resurrection, by the prayers done for them by the human beings still living in the present material universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 196-197)

"The souls of the deceased ones, they feel their reciprocal presence, to the extent they were in a communication during the life in the material universe. They are in a state of reciprocal interiority, one even more accentuated than during their live into bodies, because then they were separated by their bodies. The ones who rejoiced for the good they received from others, they feel on those ones, by gratefully thinking at the good done by those ones, to them, during their lives. Only the ones from hell are totally alone, because they didn't do anything good in the life from here, and because they didn't cherish the good done to them by others. Their thoughts at the ones whom they wronged to, or at the ones who wronged them and whom they didn't forgive, or whose good deeds they didn't reckon as such, those thought keep them separated from others; in other words, they think at others with disgust." (Stăniloae 1995: 209)

"From the great and universal unity and communication, or all the persons with God Who will continuously enrich each person with every different aspect belonging to each one of them, there will absent the ones who petrified themselves in their isolating pride, so that they no longer wanted to be liberation from under their pride's mastery." (Stăniloae 1995: 214)

"While the spiritual life of the one who has God and his fellow humans a dialogue partners, and as contents of knowledge and of love, he always increases in fullness and in joy, the live of the one who doesn't know as worthy of cherishing except the perishable things and his own ego, it becomes a torment of the emptiness, of the meaningless, and of the absurd of the entire existence.

The last one permanently lives the sentiment of the one who would want to perish, but he cannot escape his existence, though. As he hasn't given his existence to himself, likewise he cannot kill himself. This is the eternally lives death, of the hell. That's why neither the image of God is totally erased in him, but it is crooked increasingly more, becoming even more hideous, from wonderful as it was. Even his body's death isn't a destruction of his soul, but it is rather a corruption of the soul, which corresponds to the body's corruption. It is maybe like some kind of corrupt body, and in continuous and endless corruption; and his resurrected body will be in such a condition." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16)

"Where this communication – through experience, through transcendence, through convergence - it weakens, the spiritual man's life weakens too, and, with this, it is installed too, the lack of joy and the meaningless. There it is installed the sad and helpless egotism, incapable of living the true life. This is the lived death or the sad living of the meaningless. This happens because the man no longer really communicates his life to his fellow human, or because he locks himself up to the communication coming from that fellow human of his. Such a man pulled, at the beginning willingly and then because of helplessness, upon his own being, the shutter pride, so that he despises the other. Such a man no longer sees the mystery of his fellow human and of the world, but both his fellow human and the world are seen only in their surface, as ultimate realities, only meant to be exploited as objects. Such a man is alone. He neither sees in himself except his body with its short moments of passing pleasures.

In reality, neither such a man totally dies, but he lives and he will live a lifeless existence, a meaningless existence, without a consistent and continuous joy. And when he will see that after the death of his body, he will still live, but in this incommunicable and meaningless mode, that existence of his, it will be to him, because of its eternity, the greatest torment." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 39)

"They cannot escape the immortality, neither the ones who have made themselves incapable of happy immortality by refusing the wide experience, the transcendence, and the convergence of the communion. This is because they also bear the seal of the conscience, imprinted upon them by the creator Word. But their eternal immortality is in the same time eternal death. They forever want to get haughty, to reciprocally despise one another, to experience other and other motives for separation and enmity amongst them. They will see that the human being cannot be reduced to a limited war, but it has in himself an unlimited thirst, even if that thirst is turned towards evil. But while to the ones who communicate themselves and who transcend themselves, the indefinite of their beings, of their connection with the existence's infinite source, it is given to them towards enrichment, towards life, and towards joy, while to the others it is given towards increasing in monotony, in disgust for themselves and for others, in endless torment. It is an eternal thirst for evil." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 39)

“The human being is a mystery for he is deepened in the luminous abyss of God’s existence. The sin has brought a depletion of the mystery of the person, for the person no longer has the consciousness of the full living in the abyss of the God’s existence. And the death weakens at maximum the rooting of the one having a being weakened by the sin of the egotism and of the pride in the abyss of the meanings of the divine being and the perceiving of their communication, by God, to him. And the torments from hell are caused to him by his life’s superficialness or depletion. By not finding within himself except the self-disgust, and by being in a loneliness that he prepared to himself, that one gives hallucinating proportions to the loneliness and to the impossibility of real communication which he accustomed himself to, during his life in the material body. That keeps him in a sort of schizophrenic state.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 72-73)

“The inferno is the tormented existence on the plan of the eternity. It is the deficiency of the spirit, the deformation, without a hope of atonement, of the spiritual life. It is the spiritual helplessness interweaved with the despair, caused by the conscience of the eternal perpetuation of this state. It is the incapacity to love, the incapacity for communion.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Where there aren’t transcendence and convergence, there isn’t only monotony, but there is both manifested and hidden enmity. And that doesn’t accentuate only the existence’s meaningless, but it also makes it painful. And if, as long as it is loved in this life, its painful character it can somehow be endured, through the hope that it will cease after death, in the future existence this characteristic is endlessly aggravating by the awareness that it won’t cease ever.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 39)

Heresy

“The Orthodoxy’s Sunday is the Seventh Day of the Church, its celebratory resting after the victory upon the spiritual chaos, through the laying down of the true grounds of the human existence. The Orthodoxy’s Sunday is thus, on each year, the holiday of the right-faith in its entirety, the holiday of the victory of the revealed truth against the liar distortions originating from man. That’s why on the Orthodoxy’s Sunday is read the list of all heretics and it is uttered the anathema upon them.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“As many of the heresies from the first centuries of the Early Church, likewise the iconoclasm represented an attempt of the philosophy to alter the religious character of the Gospel and of the Christian Revelation. The Church combated all of these in order to preserve the religious character of the Christendom: the report of love between God as Person and the people as persons, a report that is surely savior to the people, by ensuring them the eternal life in the love of God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 208)

“Palamas proved that it isn’t by any means an established dogma of the Church that only the godlike being is without beginning and without end. The Churches teaches that also the ones related to the godlike being are eternal. If only the godlike being had been eternal, then God wouldn’t have been always the Father. This is because this feature isn’t the being itself, but it is only related to the being. The Father’s inascibility is eternal too, without to be His being, but it is related to His being. This is because if Barlaam declared the inascibility as the itself being of God, he would teach as Eunomians and he would affirm about the Son that He is of another being. The characteristic of being born, of the Son, it is eternal too, without to be itself His being. This is because if the Son hadn’t had this feature as eternal, he wouldn’t have been from ever the Son of the Father and He wouldn’t be like that, forever, as the Sabellians teach; and if that feature had been itself the being of the Son, other it would have been the Son’s being and other it would have been the Father’s being, and the Son’s being would have been directly contrary to the Father’s being. Or, this is Arianism. The same thing can be said also regarding the characteristic as Person of the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 71-72)

“Negating the creation of the world and of the man by the Trinitarian God, it leads to pantheism which confounds the world to God and which leads to denying the character of God as Person, and the fact that He differs from the world. Even more than that, this pantheism cannot explain the existence as a superior force, because of not knowing an existence superior to some blind forces; by this, the pantheism is a ground of the absurd and tragical death, which always defeats the life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 10)

“Such a so-called divinity couldn’t bring the world and the man to existence, except through an emanation from himself, and such a deity wouldn’t be either almighty or free, and the human creatures wouldn’t have freedom either. The lack of almightiness of the so-called divinity would be shown in his need for a substance, a substance existing besides him, in order the divinity to organize that substance as world. The two kinds of existences would limit one another. Or, the evil from within man and the world’s insufficiencies would be necessarily produced by their own substance, so they couldn’t overcome the evil. The same reciprocal necessary limitation and the impossibility of overcoming the evil would be also in the case which the man and the world would emanate from a principle of the evil, different from the so-called divinity as principle of the good.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 11)

Holiness

“The holiness of God it expresses too, on one hand, a quality of God in Trinity, and on the other hand, it is manifested within world and it becomes a participated quality of the human beings. In the first aspect it is totally apophatic, indefinable; in the second case it is noticed, but in a way which is hard to rationally be defined, namely in a cataphatic-apophatic manner. In the first aspect we must call it rather supra-holiness; in the second aspect, as relation of God with the creatures, we must call it holiness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 265)

“By revealing Himself, by descending, God still shows something of what exceeds everything that is worldly, something that is of another rank. Is the holiness hadn’t been transcendent, it wouldn’t have given us the power to ceaselessly transcend ourselves; if the holiness hadn’t been descended, we wouldn’t have tried to gain it, because it would have been totally inaccessible to us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 266)

“Each time the divine transcendence shines to us, it imposes itself to us in this quality of the holiness descended to us, still difficult to be defined by concepts and words, but somehow experienced by us. The holiness itself is something transcendent to the world and therefore we experience the transcendence itself as being holy, though it is descended to us and it attracts us upwards. The holiness itself as present within world it is the proof of the existence of a transcendent order. Maybe nowhere it can be lived that “totally different” thing (das ganz Andere), that “mystery producing of fear” (mysterium tremendum) of the divine reality, like in the holiness His revealing is dressed up with. We almost identify the revealed Godhead to the holiness. One can say that is holiness it is reveals to us, in a concentrated manner, all the godlike features. The holiness is the active and luminous mystery of the divine presence. In holiness is concentrated everything that differs God from the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 266)

“The holiness isn’t the attribute of an impersonal mystery. The holiness is the attribute of the transcendence as person. This is because we fear, and we are ashamed by the holy mystery, as by a supreme conscience, as by a supreme forum, that holds us accountable. The holy transcendent is a person-transcendent, which potentiates our personal conscience, and it makes us thinking at our sinfulness. The holiness of God appears to be a greatness that produces an infinite humbleness within man. And this humbleness is one truly aware about itself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 266-267)

“The holiness fills us up with a shyness of another rank than any worldly shyness; it fills us up with a thrill that isn’t experienced in report with the realities from the world, mixed with the fear, with the dread, and with the shame for everything that is defiled within us. In front of this personal holiness, we feel like we are unveiled in the whole filth and nakedness of ours. But in the same time, this holiness attracts us. Dionysus the Areopagite identified the holiness of God to His all-purity, and he also identified our action of sanctification to the action of purifying (About the Heavenly Hierarchy). But this divine all-cleanness it has, in the same time, something transcendent in it; it has something godlike in it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 267)

“The ones who feel themselves clean before the Holy God, they receive a “daring”, and opening of the conscience, a sincerity of the communicability, which hasn’t anything temerarious or cynic in it, but it is like the daring” of the child who doesn’t know anything about sin, and having in addition the maturity of the conscience and the and the joy for it. That’s why, when we feel defiled, we beg the saints who have “daring” towards God to speak, to mediate to Him for us. Being the holiness communicated thus, God brings us back to the state of subject, by setting our soul again in an open condition. And He cannot do this except for the fact that he makes Himself to us as loving subject. He awakens the responsibility of our subject, by entering the relation with us as transcendent subject. Thus, the holiness isn’t the quality of an object, but it is the quality by excellence of the supreme and loving Subject, a Subject Who is, therefore, all-pure and claiming.” (Stăniloae 2003: 268)

“Only in the long perseverance in the conscience of the presence of God as loving Person, it is gained the “daring”, for it is gained the cleanness. Only because of that it becomes in saints a habituation. Immediately that the conscience of the presence of God is lost - therefore it is lost also the conscience of the self and of the own sinfulness - this “daring” is lost too, for it has been penetrated by the passions which defile it. Because of this motif, when the man wants again to come close to God, he does it with difficulty, or with fear.” (Stăniloae 2003: 268)

“The “daring” is a familiarity with God, a familiarity that doesn’t mean a weakening of the sensitiveness of this extraordinary fact of communicating with Him, for it is concomitant to a continuous conscience of His greatness and to a fear of not interrupting the communication with Him, by hiding Him something, or by being disloyal to Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 269)

“The Christendom has abolished, in a certain sense, the border between sacred and profane: this is because the Christendom has given everybody the possibility to become saints. In a certain degree this was already done by the Old Testament. The disappearance of this border it doesn’t mean the universal desecration, but the opening of the possibility for all the things to be sanctified.” (Stăniloae 2003: 269)

“All of us have access to holiness, for all of us can unite ourselves with Christ through the Holy ghost, since Christ is the Son of God Who has made Himself a man. Denying the possibility of the access of everybody to holiness, it means denying that Christ, the Son of God, by making Himself man, he has preserved active His Godhead in the humanity He has assumed, and also denying that He unites Himself with us in this quality of embodied God. In more common terms, all of us have access to holiness, for God the Subject of absolute purity, he has made Himself the human subject of culminant purity, sensitiveness, and communicability, helping us too, in this communication of His with us, to discover our subjective sensitiveness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 270)

“In Christendom our nature had been given back the experience of the mystery of its own existence as subject and, with this, a shyness towards the own person and towards the persons of others, and the obligation of taking care of the own cleanness and to work for the own eternity. And the experience of this mystery it has become possible by the fact that the supreme Subject has come close to the man in a human form, for the man entered in connection with the absolute Subject in human form, and the absolute Subject is saint by excellence. The Christendom has abolished, in principle, the border between sacred and profane and it has opened to everybody the access to holiness, for, though it affirms that the holiness comes from God, that where it is holiness there is God, though the Christendom has recognized within our being an aspiration towards holiness, or towards communication into purity and delicacy, between our subject and the absolute Subject; and then, for this access has been opened to us through the embodiment of the Son of God as man and through His dwelling in every person that wants to receive Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 270)

“The soul reaches the highest resemblance to God when praying. This is for, in the true prayer, the soul is united with God and is clean of any other thought. The presence of God in the soul that prays incessantly, it is incessant. This soul “shines” of the godlike presence. The transparency of the saint it is the transparency itself of God in that saint.” (Stăniloae 2003: 273)

“The one who transposes himself in the state of sacrifice, that one transposes himself in the state of holiness. (...) By the fact itself that the Christians give themselves to God or they sacrifice themselves to God, a fact that means their full giving as subjects to the divine Subject, they become saints, they are enveloped in the holiness or in the giving purity of God, and they open themselves to it. But they can sacrifice themselves cleanly or totally, only if they are imparted with the clean or total sacrifice of Christ, Who, by sacrificing Himself or by giving Himself as man in a total purity to the Father, He has sanctified Himself for us for us to be sanctified too, by uniting us with Him in state of sacrifice. Thus, the saints have entrance to God or to the communion into cleanness with the supreme Subject: 'And for them I sanctify Myself, for them to be also sanctified into truth' (Jn. 17: 19)." (Stăniloae 2003: 274-275)

"The holiness comes thus, out of the total surrender of the human subject to the absolute Person. You can surrender yourself only to such a Person. Only towards such a Person you can truly transcend yourself. In the impulse towards the purity and the inward delicacy it is implied also the impulse of simply being delicate in the relations with others, of surrender yourself and of opening yourself to them sincerely and totally. But the absolute surrender you cannot do it except in favor of an absolute person. And the power of absolute surrender you cannot receive it except by being united with an absolute Person who surrenders at His turn. Only by surrendering yourself to God, and only for we succeed to do this in union with the Son of God become man and surrendered as such to God, we can become saints, through our absolute surrender, a surrender that is helped by the absolute Person, a surrender through which we surrender ourselves thus to the absolute Person. The full communicability towards God it equals to the full surrender to Him. It is in the same time cleanness and transparency for God and for people. There is no thought contrary to God and to the people that makes the saint to hide himself, to try making himself impenetrable, to mask himself, or to play a theater part." (Stăniloae 2003: 275)

"The holiness comes from God, from the absolute as person; from the fully pure Person Who has no evil thought against us. But the holiness comes from Him also by the fact that we, as persons, we aspire to totally surrender ourselves to this absolute Person, a Person Who has an absolute benevolence towards us, as we accomplish this surrendering through the Son of God Who surrenders together with us, as man, with an absolute assertiveness. If you surrender with absolute assertiveness to a person who lacks the absolute and communicable character, you will make out of that person an idol, by attributing him the power of a communication of life he actually doesn't have it. As such, surrendering to an idol cannot be definitive, because of the fact you will very soon discover its relativity, for except that relativity you won't have within you the power of the absolute surrender, and you cannot have that power either for another person like you, who is as such lacking the power of the absolute benevolence and communication. The power of the total surrender comes to you out of the receiving of this surrender with the absolute love, and it comes to you from welcoming the absolute love of the person you are surrendering yourself to." (Stăniloae 2003: 275)

“If in paganism the sacred was a quality of the things, in the Old Testament the sacred became a quality of the absolute Person and in some measure of the whole people formed of persons, and in Christendom, even more than that, the sacred has become even the quality of a human person, on the measure that person is filled up by the Holy Ghost. And this is because the absolute Person has become in Christ also the person of the human, communicating His Holy Ghost to the ones who believe in Him, or by dwelling Himself, through the Holy Ghost, within them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 276)

“This surrendering to the absolute Person it is a sanctifying self-sacrificing, for it is a transcending above anything that is relative. Any human being that elevates himself above himself, towards the supreme Person and he gives himself to That Person, he renounces to himself, stepping over what is egotistic, petty, narrow interest, lust directed addictively towards a limited thing, and therefore he is sanctified by entering through That Person in a limits-removal and in a full freedom. He is sanctified for he forgets about himself, and he elevates himself above himself, in the truly free communication of his with the absolute Person and out of the power of the Absolute Person, a power that comes from the absolute Person to welcome him. But for this is accomplished in the most authentic manner, one can say that, from the point of view of our teaching, the holiness is the most characteristic accomplishment of the human, the unveiling and the putting in value of the most intimate sanctuary of his.” (Stăniloae 2003: 277)

“If the human person becomes sacred, for he gives and he consecrates himself to the supreme Person and to serving the clean good, the truth, and the justice the supreme Persons wants, the act of the “consecration” or of the “sacrificing” it is a priest act. All the ones who sacrifice or give themselves to the supreme Person, they are priests and they are sanctified by offering themselves to God. And by offering themselves to God, they offer Him the whole world they are tied to – therefore they sanctify the world. The one who sanctifies himself he helps everybody to be sanctified, by attracting them in a delicate, transparent, clean in feelings and in thought relationship.” (Stăniloae 2003: 277-278)

“The elements and the objects sanctified within Church, they receive a holiness at their turn, through the relation with these persons into God – but not exclusively for these objects -, a relationship which separates these elements and objects from the other elements of the world, as from a profane domain. They are sanctified for all the objects and for all the things from the world in a representative manner. The ones who give these objects to God, they behave delicately with them, for these objects are the presents given to God, the presents they turned back to Him, accompanied by thanks giving. But the delicacy of our behavior with them it gives us the possibility to achieve the same behavior with all the things, and it opens our eyes to see in all the things the gifts from God, gifts which we must use with shyness, with purity, and with gratitude. Through the bread, the water, the wine, the oil, the wheat, sanctified in the churches, are sanctified all the bread, the water, the wheat used by people in their life. The Orthodox believer, with shy, he marks the sign of the cross upon the bread before breaking it, for he is aware of the fact that that bread is a present from God. All the believers pray before sitting at the table. All the things are introduced in the believers' relation with God. The Orthodox Church has special religious services for sanctifying the water wells, the fields, the courtyards, the houses, and the animals. The Eucharistic bread projects an aura of holiness upon all bread. And the priests receive a sanctification in their quality of servants of the sanctification of all the things, as active points through which it is occasioned everybody's entering in the sanctifying communion with Christ, the divine-human Person, as factor of clean relations amongst all the people." (Stăniloae 2003: 278)

"In the saint there is nothing trivial, nothing gross, nothing despicable, nothing affected, and nothing insincere. In the saint there are actualized in a culminant degree: the delicacy, the sensitiveness, the transparency, the purity, the shyness, the attention towards the mystery of his fellow humans – that is so characteristic to the human –, for the saint brings all of these out of his communication with the supreme Person. The saint notices the soul's states of the others and he avoids everything that could vex those, though the saint doesn't avoid helping them to overcome their weaknesses. The saint reads even the least articulate need of theirs, and he fulfills that need promptly, but he also reads their hidden impurities no matter how cleverly would those be hidden, and the saint exercises a purifying action, just through the delicate power of his purity. Out of the saint continuously irradiates a ghost of giving, of sacrificing towards everybody - without taking any care of himself -, a ghost that leads the others and gives them the surety that they aren't alone. The saint is the innocent lamb ready for the conscious self-sacrifice, and the unshaken wall which offers a undeceiving support." (Stăniloae 2003: 279)

"There isn't somebody humbler, simpler, non-artificial, non-theatrical, non-pretending, more "natural" in his behavior, than the saint is, by accepting everything which is truly human, by creating an atmosphere of clean familiarity. The saint has overcome any duality in himself - as Saint Maximos the Confessor says. The saint has overcome the struggle between soul and body, the divergence between the good intentions and the wrong deeds, between the deceiving appearances and the hidden thoughts, between what he pretends to be and what he actually is. The saint has simplified himself thus, for he has wholly surrendered himself to God. That's why he can wholly surrender himself in the communication with others.” (Stăniloae 2003: 279)

“If the holiness is the pure, communicating transparency of a person to another person, the holiness has its ultimate source in the tri-personality of God. The subject of the holiness cannot be but a person in his pure relation with another person. The holiness is accomplished in the purity and in the delicacy of the consummate relation of a person with another person. This is for the purity and the delicacy are, in other words, the faithfulness, the transparency, and the total attention of a person towards other persons, namely the total self-transcending towards those persons. This faithfulness and self-transcending have their supreme degree, from eternity, amongst the divine Persons: The Ghost, as Ghost of the Father and of the Son, like the same Ghost in Both of Them, by expressing as person this consummate faithfulness between Both of Them, he is especially called as Saint.” (Stăniloae 2003: 282-283)

“There can be consecrated things too, in order to be faithfully used only for God. But the one who faithfully use those things is the man who believes. Through him it is manifested the total faithfulness of the man and his quality of being delegated by God to administrate the things towards the praise of God and towards the salvation of the fellow humans. This is because the one who is totally faithful to God, he becomes totally faithful to the people, by framing his faithfulness towards God as Christ did: “I am sanctifying Myself, for them”. The man can become totally faithful to God, out of the faithfulness of Christ towards them: “Be holy, as I, your God, I am holy”. That’s why the relation between man and God is likened to the relation between bride and bridegroom. And the Church is holy by the fact that it is the faithful bride of Christ. The people of Israel were defiling itself when forgetting about the faithfulness towards God, when was making not-transparent the presence of God within them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 283)

“This holiness the one that has filled up the Son of God, through embodiment and sacrifice, and it filled up the assumed human nature elevating it on the godlike throne, providing its life out of the godlike infinity and, with this, the eternity. By being with this nature within the Church too and by coming into the believers too, Christ conveys the holiness, the salvation, and the godlike life, and the eternal life to the believers too. The holiness is being conveyed out of Christ’s body, and through Christ’s Holy Ghost. Through the Christ’s spiritualized body His holiness is endlessly conveyed to us, within Church, and it is being conveyed to us His power to become increasingly holier, increasingly open to the cleanness and to the endless love of God, and freer of any egotism that opposes the holiness.” (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

“About this holiness Christ as man, one often speaks in the Holy Scripture. Christ calls Himself: “That One the Father has sanctified Him and has sent Him in the world” (Jn. 10: 36). And other places from the Holy Scripture say about Christ: “He has anointed Him in the Holy Ghost and in power” (Acts 10: 38); or: “Holy Your Son Jesus” (Acts 4: 27). He is “the Saint of God” (Mt. 1: 24) by excellence. Out of His holiness irradiates the Church’s holiness, the Church being His extended body, or in which Himself is with His sanctified body. For He has sanctified His body in order to sanctify the Church, by bringing His body as sacrifice. Actually, the self-sacrificing as surrendering to God, it means sanctification, given the fact that the ones who sacrifices himself he renounces to everything that separated him from God, and by doing so he unites himself with the holy God. Thus, the holiness can be equivalent too, to the full love for God, having its source in the holiness of God as unlimited love of God for us. The holiness is the perfect love consisting in a union of the persons as persons, without confounding them in an impersonal unity, but in a full respect through which they want to be maintained as such in eternity. In this sense, the holiness cannot come except from God. In this sense too, Christ has sanctified Himself as man, by filling Himself up with the consummate love for God out of the consummate love of God towards His humanity and, through it, towards all of us. “That’s why Jesus too, in order to sanctify the people with His blood, he suffered outside the gate” (Hebr. 13: 12).” (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

“The holiness, that has become through participation the feature of the Church and of the Church’s members, in consists, in the first place, in the cleaning of sins and in the power of maintaining oneself in it, and of advancing in a life of virtues, which isn’t but the positive and progressive expression of the cleanness and of love. The holiness is availability for communion with God, through prayer, and with the fellow human by praying for them and through reciprocal aid. All these aspects of the holiness belong to the Church and to its members.” (Stăniloae 2006: 114)

“Defining the holiness as loving relation with God, we accentuate the fact that the purity and all the virtues related to purity, they still aren’t the essence of the holiness. The holiness is, in the first place, a shininess from above nature, of God, through the ones who strive themselves in these virtues; the holiness is a bright transference of the godlike light. “The light of the Holy Trinity shines ever more” through them, said Saint Gregory of Nazianzus. The Saints wear the image of Christ, as the One Who, through His humanity, conveys us the holiness and the shininess of the Holy Trinity, or the perfect love from amongst the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 114)

“The possibility of movement freedom in the infinity of the love of God through Christ, regained by the will against the sin through the Ghost of Christ, it must be actualized in deeds not only by Christ, or by the Ghost dwelling in the baptized one, but by that one himself. The holiness is thus not only a gift, but it is also a mission, a duty of the Church's believers. The holiness implies in itself the eschatological tension, or the tension towards the consummation of the future life, as it is implied also by the unity of the Church with God and amongst the Church's members, the Church too tending towards the eschatological consummation of the unity." (Stăniloae 2006: 115)

"Saint Apostle Paul described this tension between holiness as gift and the holiness as mission, from an eschatological perspective: "So, we have buried ourselves with Him, in death, through Baptism; so that, like Christ resurrected from death, through the glory of the Father, likewise, we also to walk in the renewal of the life. This is for if we have made with Him a sole stalk, into the likeness of His death, we will be partakers to His resurrection, by well realizing that our former man has been together crucified with Him, in order to destroy the body of the sin, so that we will no longer be slaves of the sin. This is for, who has died, he is free of sin" (Rom. 6: 4-7). Through the advancing in the achieved holiness, we advance towards resurrection. Through resurrection, the Church is a pilgrim towards heaven, as its believers are too." (Stăniloae 2006: 115)

"The holiness has a dynamic character; the holiness isn't static. The one who believes in Christ, he is dead to the past. The believer is always oriented forwards, he doesn't live either the past or the present, but he lives the consummate eschatological future and that makes out of present a stage towards a more consummate future. But the believer still activates in the present and even in the best possible mode, because he won't be able to advance to the higher stages if he doesn't pass through each present stage in a mode which not to stop him at that stage, or to make him falling down to the stages he has passed through. The sacrifice of death with Christ, it is thus a permanent work in Him; and in order to help the believers to do this, Christ transposes Himself too in a state of permanent sacrifice, a dynamic and not a static one. The imprinting of Christ, through which He sacrifices and resurrects Himself within us, it is thus a dynamic imprinting at its turn." (Stăniloae 2006: 115)

"All the believers from the Church are mysteriously holy, ever since the moment of the Baptism. But the Church is holy too, for through the Church, by being frame within the Church, the believers become saints. But if their holiness had remained always hidden and not shown through deeds, the Church's holiness would have been remained hidden too. But the believers' holiness is show within Church, namely through the ulterior powers received from it, or within it. In this it is shown the Church's holiness too. The Church's holiness is thus active too. The Church is a giant ladder in movement, which elevates all the people and on which all the people climb up; on this ladder each individual is at another stage of the holiness, in another closeness to God, in another degree crossed by the light from God and by His love, on the measure of his strivings upheld by Christ's power manifested through the Church. The ones who are higher up, they highlight more the Church's holiness, or the Christ's holiness, for Christ sanctifies the Church. Not even the highest stage exhausts the holiness reserves and of sanctifying power the Church has, better said the reserves of Christ Who dwells within Church, the Church being the environment conveying the fire of the infinite holiness of God. Through all the believers are sanctified Christ and the Church, for through all the believers activates the holiness of the Christ's body." (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

"Without any doubt, this difference between stages doesn't create separations between the Church's members, it doesn't create separations in Christ, like the diverse stages and features the children have and the places they occupy in their mother's heart, they do not create separations within the mother's heart. On the opposite it keeps them in unity also amongst them. Christ is being built up through the thoughts, the feelings, and the good deeds of the ones who are united with Him, in the sense that Christ can actualize, as calling and as answer to these self-accomplishments of the believers, also other reserves out of the ocean of His power and love. In addition to that, the spiritual richness of the ones who are higher up, being richness into humbleness, it is beneficial also to the ones who are less elevated. No saint shows his holiness and makes out of it a barrier in the communion with the other believers. A contrary, on the measure of his holiness it increases also his openness towards them. The saints' holiness is so accentuated than they do not want even to know their own holiness, and by this they actually do not know it, but it is known only to God and to the ones who have clean eyes in order to see it and who gain out of it. The saints' holiness is so hidden that the other believers must make great efforts of own elevating in holiness in order to know it, without becoming envious. In addition to that, the believers who are more elevated spiritually, they are dominated by a love for people corresponding to their level, and this is shown in the prayer for others and in deeds of humble serving, which want to pass unnoticed, for the helped ones not to feel humiliated by those deeds." (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

"The ones who are on diverse stair of the ladder of holiness, they have reasons to be discontent with the stage they are in, because they are not consummate. From this point of view, it seems that no one has reached and no one reckons himself that he has reached the consummate holiness before his death, and that's why no one of them is given, before his death, the crown of the holiness officially recognized by Church. In many of the most advanced stages there still are imperfections, diminutions, mistakes, and small sins. It is so hard to tell where a living totally lacking such imperfection it starts, or whether it starts for someone of the Church's members such a living, as long as he hasn't surpassed yet the movement towards the Christ's infinity of love and holiness, and as long as he hasn't entered yet the resting from within that infinity of love and holiness." (Stăniloae 2006: 116-117)

"Not all the believers are the same within Church; this doesn't mean, given the helplessness of reaching the consummation in this world, that we must become indifferent towards the sin, or to believe that it is a futile effort because of not removing our sins at all, because of not elevating us to any degree of holiness, as the Protestantism affirms. This is one of the paradoxical meanings Saint Apostle John speaks about the state of the Christians, by declaring, on one hand, that "the blood of Christ cleans us up of all sins", and on the other hand, "if we say that we don't have sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth isn't within us" (I Jn. 1, 7-8)." (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

"The hierarchy of the three levels (deacon, priest, bishop, o. n.) whose has been entrusted the guiding of the believers, it is completed with a hierarchy of another order, unofficial, for some believers are on a higher level of participation to the divine goods than other believers, and the responsibility for the other it makes these advanced believers to help those to be elevated too. It is the hierarchy of the holiness, which doesn't disregard nor impedes in its work the hierarchy based on the celebration of the Mysteries and imposed by the seen organization of the Church." (Stăniloae 1992: 47)

Holy Ghost

“The action of extending the salvation plan it is being done by Christ also through the Holy Ghost: through the Holy Ghost Christ communicated the Revelation and he created and He sustained the community of the people of Israel in its non-full state. Also, through the Holy Ghost it is being maintained the ended Revelation in its continuous efficiency, by being created and maintained the superior and universal community of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 50)

The Ghost of Christ sensitizes us for Christ and unites us with Christ within Church, for the fire of the Ghost which propagates out of Christ it cannot be separated from the common human sensitiveness for Christ. The Holy Ghost manifests Himself as working through the fire of the working faith. This fire is the life in continuous consummation of the communion with Christ. The Ghost brings the life for He accomplishes the communion with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“But the Ghost Who produces the faith in the ones who hear them (the words of the Holy Scripture, o. n.), he is the Ghost of Christ. Christ is our ultimate meaning, or in him is fulfilled our ultimate meaning, through the sensitiveness produced and maintained within us by the Holy Ghost. Consequently, Christ Himself is the One Who works through His Ghost in the one who hears His words and who not opposes their content. Thus, the Scripture is not only one of the way the words of Christ are preserved in, not only in the words Christ uttered yore, but also in the words he addresses us continuously.” (Stăniloae 2003: 55)

“(…) the Ghost actualizes within the community of the Church the words of the scripture, Christ utters now too, into the Holy Ghost, His words, by highlighting others and other meanings of theirs, according to my level of spiritual understanding, but also according to the level of the time and of the churchly community.” (Stăniloae 2003: 57)

“All the other holy works of the Church are essentially framed in these two works: the calling and the descending of the Holy Ghost. And the moral and spiritual life, with the restraint, with the virtues, and with the repentance related to it, which are norms established by the canonical discipline of the Church, the compose the condition that makes the believers able to efficiently invoke and for a sensitive receiving of the Holy Ghost, as also for a fruition of His receiving in a life according to the image of the life of Christ, and for advancing in the likeness with Christ, towards a full communion with Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 63)

“The Scripture is finalized and it takes the shape of concrete living within Church and Through Tradition. But the Scripture is finalized within Church because the Church it has through the Holy Ghost, a continuous initiative through which the Church finalizes the Scripture, namely through Tradition. But it is also claimed by the Scripture.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“The Holy Ghost is active in Tradition because He is active within Church, where the Tradition is practiced, and by His activity within the Church that practices the Tradition, He makes the Scripture active too, or He makes the scripture to request for the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“(…) the descent of the Holy Ghost at the end of the savior plan of Christ, it inaugurates and it leads the new stage of applying this plan, or of the Revelation, to the end of the world. This is the stage of the Revelation working as Tradition. The subject of this efficiency of the Revelation is the Holy Ghost through the Church, or the Church through the Holy Ghost. Without the Holy Ghost the Church wouldn’t have been born and it wouldn’t have been continued, in its quality of environment the efficiency of the Revelation prolongs in. The Holy Ghost is the One Who led to the end of the Revelation, in what concerns the Revelation’s content, by giving existence to the Church with its essential structures as Body of Christ, and also the Holy Ghost continues to maintain the Revelation in efficiency within Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 68-69)

“Until the ascent of Christ, the revelation concretized in Christ in its fullness. In the bringing to existence of the Church, on Pentecost and after, the Holy Ghost makes Christ known to us in everything he comprises for us, and in the work of extending His good things within us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 69-70)

“The Holy Ghost continues, in this sense, the revelation of Christ, through the act of bringing the Church to existence and by practically organizing the Church’s structures, or by initially practicing these structures, and then by maintaining, still by Him, the Church in its quality of permanent environment of the efficiency of the Revelation that came to an end in Christ, and consummate in what regards its content and ways of applying it. By doing this, the Ghost maintains the Church in its faithfulness to the revelation ended in Christ, to towards Scripture and Tradition which present us Christ. And the Holy Ghost maintains these as parts of the same whole.” (Stăniloae 2003: 70)

“(…) the same Ghost of Christ, accompanied Christ during Revelation, or of Christ’s savior work, and he finalized the Revelation by bringing the Church to existence; the Holy Ghost of Christ inspired the fixing in writing of a part of the Revelation, and He continues to effect the union of Christ with the ones who believe, and their growing up in Christ; the Ghost of Christ continues to maintain the Church in Its quality as Body of Christ, to reinvigorate the Church in unaltered practicing the Revelation as Tradition, and to help the Church to deepen through knowledge and living, the content of the revelation and of the Scripture.” (Stăniloae 2003: 70)

“The Holy Ghost Who is together with Christ - Christ being the author of the revelation and the One Who brought the Church to existence and Who inspired the Scripture – He works within Church, helping the Church to understand and to practically appropriate the content of the Revelation, or Christ in the fullness of His gifts.” (Stăniloae 2003: 71)

“The Holy Ghost communicates, firstly, to the human nature, the power of receiving subsistence in the Person of the Word by defeating the laws of the repeating nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 89)

“(…) the Holy fills up Christ’s humanity, with godlike life, also after Christ’s birth.” (Stăniloae 2003: 89)

“The spirituality, the communion, and the power upon the repeating nature, they work together. The culminant spirituality is reached by the body through Resurrection. This is because in the body the godlike Ghost Who represents the fullness of the non-confounded unity of the divine Persons, He has produced His full effect upon Christ’s humanity, elevating Christ’s humanity to the participation, to the spirituality, and to the communion of the Trinity. But not only for Christ’s body to participate without an own hypostasis to the communion of Christ’s divine Hypostasis with the other Trinitarian Persons, but for through His body, Christ to be able to accomplish a full communion with the Person of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 91)

“(…) In this recapitulation work, the work of the Holy Ghost receives the main role, but still not separated from the Father and from the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 92)

“The Ghost creates the community amongst us for in Him there is the unmerged community of the entire Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 93)

“The Holy Ghost accomplishes the elevation of the creation at the state of Church. The Holy Ghost is always between God and a group of people who believe. Through Him, the Revelation, of Christ, it becomes effective within people, for the Holy Ghost produces the faith within people. Through the Holy Ghost, the Revelation is unveiled in the whole its evidence and efficiency, in an increasingly richer content. The Revelation came to an end in Christ, but the Revelation is unveiled to all the generations and they fructify it through the Ghost. Through the Ghost, the people are elevated to the increasingly higher participation to the endless good things placed in Christ, good things the people accept by the faith in Him. And the faith never is of a sole man, but of many. Where a man can communicate a faith and another man there, he receives that faith, there is the Holy Ghost working between those two people, for through the Ghost it is born the faith. But the faith it is born in several people and they are filled up with the impulse of transmitting the faith. That's why the Ghost descends in several fire tongues. The Church continues through the Holy Ghost, for through His continues to be transmitted the faith from person to person, from generation to generation, through a fire voice." (Stăniloae 2003: 93)

"The Church comes to existence on Pentecost, for that is when the Ghost descends, and he gives the Apostles the fire of the firm faith and of fiery preaching the faith and of understanding the whole treasure of good things placed in Christ." (Stăniloae 2003: 93)

"God is Ghost" (Jn. 4: 24). The godlike essence is spiritual essence. This doesn't mean only non-materiality, but it means also support for spiritual attributes: support for knowledge, support for righteousness, support for purity, and support for love." (Stăniloae 2003: 235)

"The attributes related to the divine existence they have a spiritual character, for the divine existence itself as supreme existence, it is a spiritual existence. But the directly spiritual attributes bring to light, in a special manner, the character of Ghost of the divine existence." (Stăniloae 2003: 235)

"Any human being upon whom it is projected a ray out of the transcendence of the divine Subject, due to the effort of responsible self-purification and of steadfastness of the conscience before God, that person becomes saint. "For holy You are, our God, and amongst saints You are resting Yourself", we say in the cult of the Orthodox Church. The "resting" of God within saints it is a permanent conscience fact to them. All Christians are called by Saint Apostle Paul as "saints", if they maintain in their conscience the fact of the dwelling of Christ within them, since their Baptism, and if they fight for cleaning themselves, with the help of the baptism and of the other Mysteries. But maintaining this fact in conscience, and maintaining this effort of self-cleaning, they are done through the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 2003: 269)

"This prayer the Ghost is bringing within us, He is bringing it to Himself on behalf of us, and in this prayer, we are involved too. The Ghost identified Himself to us by grace, in order us to identify to Him by grace. The Ghost eliminates by grace the distance between our self and His Self, by creating by grace between us and the Father the same relation He has is with the Father and with the Son. If in the embodied Son we have become sons by grace, in the Ghost we are achieving the conscience and the daring of sons." (Stăniloae 2003: 269)

“The name of the Holy Ghost is associated so much with the love, so that it becomes the symbol of the full love in God. Only the Third One implies the full liberation of the love from egotism. Through the Holy Ghost the love of the Trinity proves to be truly holy. Only for there is a third one, the two ones can simultaneously become one, not only through the reciprocity of the love between them, but also by their common forgetfulness in front of the third one. Only the existence of the third one in God it explains the creation of a numerous selves in the world, and their elevation on the level of deified partners of the father and of the Son in love, through the Holy Ghost Who is equal to Them. That’s why only through the Holy Ghost the divine love is being spread outside. The created selves aren’t shown and elevated for nothing on the level of dialogue partners with the Father and with the Son through the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost represents the possibility of stretching the love from between the Father and the Son to other subjects and, in the same time, the right of a third one to a loving dialogue of the two ones, a right he endows the other created subjects with.” (3002: 321-322)

“The Third one fulfills the role of ‘object’, or horizon, and Who provides to the Other Two the feeling of objectivity, by the fact He guards Them against confounding into a indistinct unity, through the exclusivism of the love between Them, an exclusivism that can be produced by the reckoning of Each of Them that there is nothing worthy of love outside the Other One. By existing a Third One having the same value, no one of the Two One Who love one another does forget about the worthiness to be loved of the Third One and through this They are retained from the confounding to One Another.” (2003: 323)

“For through the Ghost, as the Third One, it is proven the existence of God, He is also called the ‘Ghost of the life’ and for the creature that means the ‘life Giver’, and the ‘Comforter’, or the ‘Holy Ghost’ and the ‘Sanctifier’ (Jn. 17: 17, 19).”

“Actually, the expressions of some Catholic theologians are so ambiguous, so that it is difficult to say if they still consider Him a person or not. Others declare Him a Person but out of their speculations it results rather the conclusion that He isn’t a Person. All of them are led to this conclusion by the speculations through which they identify the birth of the Son and the proceeding of the Holy Ghost to the psychical acts, and especially the necessity of founding through these acts the proceeding of the Holy Ghost both from the Father and from the Son as from the same principle. This necessity urged the Catholic theology to identify the Son to the image the Father makes it on Himself through knowledge, and to identify the proceeding of the Holy Ghost to the love between the father and the Son. This love, by no longer keeping in existence two distinct persons, it is itself the common person of the Father and of the Son. Thus, the Father and the Son are merged, in this act, in a dual person, in an “us”, namely the actually cease to be two persons, and even this reality is merged, and therefore is impersonal, it is reckoned itself as the Holy Ghost.” (2003: 2326-327)

“The Holy Ghost specially occasions the ‘communion’ (2 Cor. 13: 13; Philip. 2: 1). The Ghost shuns us from the killing loneliness. That’s why He is the Comforter. The Ghost always offers you communion. In the Ghost everybody finds comforting. The Ghost always assists us. The Ghost reinvigorates our rejoicing of God. The Ghost is “the life-maker”. Into the Ghost we know and we glorify God and we rejoice of God. The Ghost bears witness, to our conscience, about God (1 Cor.: 2 and the followings). God is dwelling Himself within us through the “Ghost”, and this is a gift from God (1 Cor. 12: 3-9).”

“The Holy Ghost is the Saint and the Sanctifier, through the faithfulness he assists others with, through the faithfulness He maintains in others towards God and amongst them. It belongs to the Ghost to participate and to make Himself participated as Person. The Ghost is the expression of the generosity of God, of the forgetfulness of God about Himself in His ‘going out’ to creatures. The Ghost is the God’s rejoicing of creatures, and the creatures rejoicing of God.” (2003: 334)

“The work of the Holy Ghost isn’t, in case o Christ, only a life maker breath, as it was at the creation of the first man, when through this life maker breath, the man, as image of the Logos and as dialogue partner of Him, the man becomes subject through a strengthening of him, on the godlike ground of the existence, or in the godlike Word, a fact which, at the beginning, it had only the character of a grace, of an intimate connection with God, in which consisted also the power of his strengthening as person. This time, by the work of the Holy Ghost, the human nature is hypostatized in the Word of God Himself. In the case of the Adam’s descendants, the work of the Holy Ghost upon their birth and upon their life, it has as effect only their establishment and their strengthening as own persons, as partners of the dialogue with the Logos. In the case of Christ, the Son of God makes, on Himself, the subject of the human nature, by the work of the Holy Ghost. At the forming of Christ, the godlike Ghost as life breath is not communicated only with measure, but the Ghost is communicated wholly, and the Ghost doesn’t meet while establishing the soul or the whole man, as image of Christ, a human initiative, which bears in it also the stain of the voluptuousness. Now the Holy Ghost works alone and in the fullness of His work. That’s why this fullness of the Ghost, working out of God-the Word Who makes, on Himself, man, it has a much greater effect than the establishing and the strengthening of the man as own hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 35-36)

“The breath of the Ghost is hasn’t as effect, in case of Christ, only the establishing of a dialogue between man and the Word, as two subjects from on unequal plans, but Christ makes, on Himself, by remaining, in the same time, also the divine partner of this dialogue. Whether in the case of the other people the human nature it constitutes itself, as own hypostasis in a connection with the Hypostasis of the Word, in the case of Christ the human nature receives God-the Word as direct hypostatical ground, or as mode of its existence. The human nature isn’t only strengthened in a connection with the godlike Word as with a different hypostasis, but it is received in the hypostatical union of the godlike Word. The man’s dialogue with God it is taken by the Son of God Himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor said only that if the godlike breath which produces the soul in the other people it doesn’t give the soul the power to form the body from the first moment in its virtual complexity without the man’s seed, the incomparable more powerful breath which has produced the human soul of Christ, it has given to His soul the power of forming the body without the man’s seed, and even the power on imprinting the body with a total purity, for the presence of the voluptuousness wasn’t present. But this much more powerful breath of the Ghost is being dwelling in the Hypostasis of the Word. By this, the Hypostasis of the Word Himself forms, to Himself, together with the Holy Ghost, through the soul, His body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

“Leontius from Byzantium attributed to the Holy Ghost the forming itself of the body, but this doesn’t mean that this forming isn’t done also through the soul. Actually, like in the beginning, the Ghost who was hovering upon the waters, he gave a materialized form to the rationalities of the Word, or to their images, by bringing the things to existence, and not without the will and the together-working of the Word, and the soul as objective rationality tied to the objective rationality of the body is put by the Ghost to his work of forming the body, likewise is understandable that the Ghost, by His fuller work at the forming of Christ as man, by doing also the union of the Word’s Hypostasis with the soul and with the body, he accomplishes together with the Logos, the existence and the farming of the soul in the Hypostasis of the Logos, by granting the soul also, a role in forming the body. The Ghost is the last factor that forms the matter as materialization of the rationality, He organizes it in own unities, so that He does this also to the body and, in a full measure, He has done it with the body of Christ; and the Ghost too, He is the One Who increases the presence of the spirit within the body, and therefore He increases also His presence and His work, as Person, within the body of Christ. That’s why he has a decisive role also in the Resurrection of Christ, and in His full filling up by the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

“We have mentioned that Christ remains in a continuous connection with Adam’s descendants, and that’s why he hasn’t created His human nature out of nothing, as at the beginning of the creation, but out of Virgin Mary. Christ has assumed, thus, the nature of the Adam’s descendants, in order to renew it from within. By this, He has appreciated positively their way of coming to existence by birth. He hasn’t removed this birth of the other people, but, once they have come to existence, he purifies them of what has been added as sin to their birth. Jesus unites thus, through His mode of coming to existence like man, the mode of coming to existence by creation with the mode of coming to existence by birth. In a way, Adam’s descendants were uniting too, the mode of coming to existence by birth with the mode of coming to existence by creation. This was because all of them were being born on the ground of the creation of the proto-parents, and besides that, all of them received their souls as image of the Word, by the breath of life of God, namely through the communication of the Holy Ghost. And in the same time with the soul, they received also their putting in connection with God, in dialogical relation with God-the Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

“The power accompanying the word of Christ itself, in which is present Christ Himself, that power is the Ghost. The Word of God is the light, but out of the Word of God irradiates the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 52)

“Through the words of the Person irradiates, or lightens, the Person’s Ghost. And “by the Ghost, (Christ, t. n.) He lightens every man” (II Cor. 4: 6). The Son has the Ghost as a ray of His nature; the Son extends “the brightness of the Ghost”. The Ghost is the Christ’s mind. “For being the Ghost the Christ’s mind, He tells the disciples all the things about Christ and not things of the Ghost Himself which are in a will and in a work of the Ghost”. So, the Ghost like such a brightness extended out of the Son, He is in the same time “hypostatized existential work (or energy)”. Like the Son is the hypostatic Word, out of Whom spring all the words, without depriving the Father and the Ghost of Their quality as source of the words too, likewise the Ghost is the hypostatized energy that is in the Son, out of Who spring all the energies or the works. Through the energies the Ghost of Christ brings within us, which His words are full of, we are being increasingly made in the image of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“We are more fully given the Ghost out of Christ’s resurrected body, therefore through Mysteries, in which the Christ’s Person blows more fully the godlike work, through the Ghost, than through words.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“The Hypostatical Ghost descended in flame of fire upon all Apostles, showing thus the Christ’s will to extend the godlike power and the holiness of His human nature upon the whole human creation “in order to reconcile with Himself the whole divided world.” (Stăniloae 2006: 86)

“The descent of the Holy Ghost in flames of fire doesn’t show only the Christ’s will to comprise in the Church, namely in His love, the whole world unified in this love, but it shows also His will that in this unity to be maintained the identity of each person. (...) The Logos out of which derived the rationalities of all the people, He wanted to reconcile them not only in Himself as Unitary Rationality, but also into the Ghost as godlike love and power.” (Stăniloae 2006: 86)

If, constitutively, the Church consists of Christ-the Head and of the humanity-His body, the Holy Ghost is the One Who unites Christ with the people, or the people with Christ. The Holy Ghost is by this, the sanctifier power, of-life-maker and unifier within Church. The Holy Ghost descended at Pentecost and, by His descent itself, He has given the Church existence. The Holy Ghost determined the Church to be constituted, whose premise was laid down by Christ – through His savior deeds – in His body. But the Holy Ghost ceaselessly remains within Church, by relentlessly irradiating out of Christ. The Holy Ghost is the factor through Whom, once constituted, the Church is being upheld in existence; this is for the Holy Ghost brings new human limbs within Church, He seeds within them the Christ’s grace and gifts, and by this, the Holy Ghost unifies them into Christ, by sanctifying them and by giving them a new life, namely godlike life out of Christ’s life. Through the Holy Ghost flows and further grows up, the godlike life within Church – it grows up the Church itself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“Even though the work of the Holy Ghost within Church is no longer fulfilled through sensitive wonders, as when the Ghost descended on Pentecost, he maintains the godlike life within Church, namely he maintains the Church in continuation. Of course, the Ghost doesn’t do this without the collaboration of the human factor.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“The Holy Ghost, as Hypostasis, He is active within people in diverse ways and degrees, by producing within people diverse effects. But, through all these works the Holy Ghost unites the man with Christ, and by this He makes the man to be imparted with the infinite holiness and godhead which are in the body of Christ, or within Christ’s human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125)

“The Ghost hasn’t other role than to make these energies of Christ and the gifts which bring us together to the likeness of Christ, as our own. This is because, without appropriating these energies, we couldn’t, properly-said, consummate ourselves. Through the Ghost we enter a dialogue with Christ, which we are communicated His power and light in, a dialogue of gradually knowing the infinity of God which dwells in the Christ's humanity which we can have access to. We imitate and we receive the Ghost out of the Christ's things, in a free dialogue in endless progress. We become as many hypostases which the Hypostasis of the Ghost works and speaks through, or which become capable of speaking to Christ as partners adapted to Him and capable of receiving His things; or, the Ghost becomes interior to all the human subjects who receive Him, becoming thus partner-hypostases to Christ, in the dialogue with Him; by making them some kind of hypostases unity, for the same Ghost, as Hypostasis, He unifies them in their work and speaking, in their dialogue with Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 127)

"There starts a kenosis of the Ghost, Who descends on our level, in order to elevate us on the level as partners of Christ. The Holy Ghost isn't a human hypostasis with a special nature, and therefore He isn't embodied like Christ, and therefore nothing impedes the Holy Ghost to infuse Himself as Hypostasis within our hypostases, becoming thus some kind of Hypostasis of our persons. And this makes Him all the more intimate to us. Christ is always a model differing from us, our model we are speaking to, distinct from us as we are distinct to one another, and also tied to us and possible to be increasingly more tied, as we are tied to one another and possible to be increasingly more tied amongst us. Christ remains our partner we are speaking to, Whom he imitate, Whom we ask for our powers and from Whom the powers are coming to us in this dialogue, and Christ too becomes interior to us, but in another mode. The Ghost is the one through Whom we are doing all these things, covering Himself with us (putting us on Him, o. n.) but without annulling us, but also without appearing in front of us as a distinct from us partner of dialogue. There takes place a dialogue between us and Christ, partially on the historical plan and partially on the plan of the eternity, for we are accepted and elevated on the position of the Ghost, of the Ghost accepts our position on the ground of a supreme intimacy. Although, this doesn't annul us as persons, but it develops us as persons, likewise the sunlight that penetrates us and gives us the power of seeing it doesn't annul us as persons. That's why it was said that the Saints are the incorporations (embodiments, o. n.) of the Ghost, of course not in the sense that their human nature has the Ghost as Hypostasis in the same sense that Christ is the Hypostasis of the human nature; but in the sense that their subjects are accomplished in a supreme intimacy with the Ghost, and not only their knowing and speaking and willing subjects, but also their bodies, namely their whole being. This intimacy between the Ghost and the believer makes the spiritual man not to feel the Ghost as a You, but each time he says I, he hears the Ghost saying within him, Me. His own self has become the Ghost's Self; the Ghost's Self has become his self in a consummate union but without confusion. There are two interpenetrated selves: the Ghost's Self imprinted in the man's self in order to develop the man's self. The Ghost's powers, and through that, the Christ's powers have become the man's powers. The Ghost doesn't affirm Himself through the category of You, as Christ, but as I, in order to strengthen the man's self, but as a loving of Christ you. By descending on the "me-you" human level, the Ghost humbles Himself like the man, for the man to humble himself and thus to be the man elevated through humbleness." (Stăniloae 2006: 127-128)

"As Ghost of the man's communion with Christ and in Christ with all the believers, the Holy Ghost is especially an Me of the Church, and Me in which the Church's believers feel like being one, for each of them feels that his self is penetrated by the other's selves, for the same Me of the Ghost is present and He humbles in everybody, in their communion with Christ and with one another. Due to this fact, as also to the fact that the Ghost still is a godlike Me, I feel this Me as superior to me. It is a Me who elevates me; it is a Me in whom all of us gain an increasingly greater transparency and interpenetration, in whom we feel as being one, but not fallen into impersonal. This if for this common Me illuminates us increasingly more as a Me of the communion." (Stăniloae 2006: 128)

"Of course, Christ represents us in front of the Father as a human Me. But towards us Christ is a You, for He is from amongst us. The Ghost, though, does not represent us as a human Me differing from us, namely as our You. But, being helped by the Ghost Who is present in selves, we present ourselves to the Father, like the Son, on one hand as a multiplicity of selves, and on the other hand as a sole me, or like a multiple me."

"Through the Ghost, the Son makes us partakers to Himself, namely He actualizes the possibility He has given to us to be elevated on the level of the dialogue with Himself like God, like some partners equal to Him by grace, or by the Ghost, or like gods and sons of God by grace." (Stăniloae 2006: 128)

"The grace as work of the Ghost and of Christ, it moves within Church, since the Ghost moves within us as a common me of ours, for He strengthens our love towards Christ and amongst all of us who believe. Here appears also the paradox of the freedom. On one hand, within man there is the Ghost Who works, feels, and knows, and on the other hand the man himself works in a greater freedom than in the absence of the Ghost." (Stăniloae 2006: 128)

"The Ghost is in close connection with the Church. This is another characteristic of the Ghost. That's why we cannot speak about grace as about something from outside the Church, but only as about something related to the Church. Likewise, one cannot speak about Church without the grace, or without the Holy Ghost. Through the descent of the Holy Ghost it has been founded the Church. The remaining of the Holy Ghost it ceaselessly keeps the Church in existence, this remaining being too a refreshing of the Church. Within Church is being continued the work of the Ghost, namely the grace. The work of the Holy Ghost, or the grace, it is constitutive to the Church and the grace doesn't manifest except within the Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 128)

"If the Church is being born out of the dwelling of Christ, with His deified body – or spiritualized – within the ones who believe and if this dwelling has an active, efficient character, through the work of the Ghost or by grace, then the grace is constitutive to the Church and it cannot be but a work within Church. Christ cannot save the people except by imprinting Himself within them, in His entirety, through the Ghost, even if not everybody can assimilate Him through the same work of the Ghost or by the same grace in all of them. But this means that Christ cannot imprint Himself with one of His parts in a man, or in a group of people, and with other parts of His in other people or groups. He imprints Himself ads the same whole Christ, therefore through the same work of the Ghost or by the same grace in everybody." (Stăniloae 2006: 128)

"By Christ's imprinting within people it is being constituted, it is being perpetuated, it is being deepened, and it is being enriched the Church, in the endless life of Christ. If the word of Saint Irenaeus is true, that "where the Ghost is, there is the Church, and where is the Church there is the Ghost", equally true is that where is the grace or the work of the Holy Ghost there is the Church, and where the Church is there is the grace. And the Holy Ghost or His work is where is entirely imprinted Christ, with His deified body, with the endless reserve of godlike life that we can achieve, even if not all of us have Him, and not from the beginning, in all His actual depth, and even a believer develops himself more than others do, in faith, in holiness, and in knowledge, from the same Christ, through the same Ghost. Although each believer develops in a different measure, all of them develop on the basis of the common faith, and therefore of the connection with the same Christ, out of the same endless reserve of godlike life being in Christ, and communicated through the Ghost, or assimilate through the Ghost. The Holy Ghost is the same in everybody. The Holy Ghost is the same within the whole Church; in everybody there is the same Ghost of the integral Christ, or the same true work of the Ghost, or the same grace of His, even though in some people it is more actualized than in others." (Stăniloae 2006: 128-129)

"The Ghost of the integrally present Christ, he tends, through His common work to recapitulate all of us in Christ, in His endless godlike life. He doesn't cultivate, through this work, the divisions amongst Christians; He isn't driven by the desire of closing the circle of the ones who are imparted with Christ. The Holy Ghost creates, through his work within believers, the disposition of the unity. The one who is dominate by the tendency of division, he doesn't belong to the Ghost of Christ. The one who separated himself from the Church, he isn't in the grace of Christ, in the effluvium of the unitary life in Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 129)

"How they reconcile to one another: the presence and the work of the Holy Ghost as Hypostasis within Church and the partial gifts granted to diverse persons? This reconciliation can be understood if we pay take in account that the sharing of the fire tongues over all Apostles, and the multitude of various gifts it has, in addition to the signification that the Church is destined to all the nations, also the signification of the reciprocal completion between diverse gifts, and between the ones who receive those gifts, according to their natural features. Ant this always is in favor of Church's unity. If one person had received everything from the Holy Ghost, he wouldn't have searched for the unity with the others; likewise, if an Apostle had received the gift of speaking all the languages, he wouldn't have needed to be completed in his mission by the other Apostles." (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

"The Ghost as Hypostasis, He covers or He actualizes the Whole Church, like the soul covers or actualizes with the totality of its functions the totality of the body's functions, though, on the other hand, the soul is present, as whole, in each of body's organs and he keeps, by this, all the organs united. Likewise, the Ghost as Hypostasis, He keeps united all the Church's limbs. (...) But the Church's limbs enjoy all the gifts only due to the fact that they remain within Church or within the One body of Christ. Only by this, the differences amongst them to not lead to separation, but those differences keep them in union, for the Church's limbs need one another." (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

"The Ghost as Hypostasis He is a Ghost of the unification of the ones who have diverse gifts; He is "the communion's Ghost" (II Cor. 13: 13); He is "The Ghost of the unity" (Ephes. 4: 3). Only for we all are "in the same Ghost", but diverse amongst us, we all are into Christ and we have the approach, into Him, to the Father (Ephes. 2: 18)." (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

"Only together or in a synodal mode, the Apostles and their descendants, when taking decisions in the important matters of the faith, they could say: "It seemed to the Ghost and to us". They were many, but the Ghost was one and into the Ghost they had a unique cogitation. Better said, only in connection with the whole Church, within which there is the Holy Ghost, and in which, after the descent of the Ghost in the beginning, the Ghost comes in the same time from above, they could say that. Only in the body of the Church it is each limb imparted, through the mediation of the other limbs, with the totality of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and by this each limb is enriched in his humanity by the whole Ghost's holiness, which makes to irradiate within Church the entirety of the holiness and of the godhead of Christ's body. This help us to understand that the Ghost, as Hypostasis of the entire godhead imparted to the creature, he is given to the Church in its quality as unitary body. Of course, once present as Hypostasis within the Church, in its quality as a whole, the Ghost is working as Hypostases in each believer, but He is granted to a person or another for that person remains within Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

“Only for a person or another remains within Church, with that person’s special gift in connection with the totality of the persons from within Church and with their gifts, that person enjoys the plenitude of the Ghost as present and active as Hypostasis within Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

“The Ghost is the same Hypostasis in the gift granted to a person, by the fact that that gift is connected to the other gifts the Ghost has granted to other persons from within Church. A mother, when speaking to each of her children and helping him to develop his gifts, she is the same in the various speaking and urging addressed to each child, and by this she keeps them united to one another, for she won’t urge them to contradictory deeds. The Ghost is whole in each person from within Church, but only for that person maintains himself as Church’s limb, namely only for that person is within Church where the gifts of the Ghost are activated, as unitary and infinitely rich Hypostasis Who is the unifier factor of the shared gifts.” (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

“This is true for Christ too, for the work of the Ghost is itself the work of Christ, which has become, by the Ghost, characteristic to the human subject. That’s why they say also about Christ that “It is crumbles and it is shared the Lamb of God, That One Who isn’t crumbled and Who isn’t separated” (in The Liturgy of Saint John Chrysostom). Properly-said, each believer participates to the entire Ghost and Christ. Saint Gregory Palamas said: “Therefore, the Ghost is undividable, but according to the work..., after that the Ghost overflows and gives Himself and sends Himself, the One Who is everywhere and Who is steadfastly founded in the motionless identity, the Ghost is sharable to the worthy ones.”” (Stăniloae 2006: 133-134)

“The Ghost is present as unitary and as unifier Hypostasis within the whole Church, namely in each individual limb, as long as the respective limb remains within Church.” (Stăniloae 2006:135)

“Through each “gift” a person does a work not only for himself, but also for the whole, or a common work with the others, by uniting his gifts with the others’ (...). Properly-said, even the own work of each limb it is actually a common work, because it couldn’t be done without the common contribution of everybody, and without contributing by it to the others’ work and to sustaining and developing the whole. Thus, the Holy Ghost is whole present with His hypostatical unitary work, in the diverse gifts and works of the diverse persons within Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 135)

“The Holy Ghost is within Church some kind of connection and of dynamic common spring for all the gifts, some kind of water where sprout out and grow up the true gifts of all Church’s members, as equally numerous manifestation forms of the godlike life unite with the human life. Saint Basil the Great said: “The Holy Ghost is often called as the connection of the ones who are sanctified”, namely of those who overcome their limitation, one egotistic and contrary to the other people and to God – of those who sincerely and cleanly open themselves to the communication with the endless and most-clean love life, of Christ, and by this, they open to a relation of clean love with their fellow humans. The Holy Ghost opens one to the others, and makes them to communicate.” (Stăniloae 2006: 135)

“The Ghost is the “love connection” between each believer and God, and with his fellow humans, and the Ghost is the living spring out of which sprout and grow up, in unity, all the limbs’ gifts, as equally numerous forms which the believers can manifest their love for God in, and their love for one another, as equally numerous forms the human persons surpass themselves, namely they overcome their individualistic limitations, by realizing a continuous progress in the endless unity of the tightly connected to the holiness love. Thus, the Holy Ghost is a spring of the love and therefore He never ceases to renew and enrich us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 135).

“We can see how much diverse are gifts themselves, which the human persons have, they are the channels which the human persons communicate through, by maintaining and developing between one another a unity of the love. The Holy Fathers strongly highlighted the unifier work of the Ghost in this sense. Of course, as we have seen, this unifier work it doesn’t annul the persons. If this had been the case, the unity amongst persons wouldn’t have been accompanied by the sentiment of joy for giving and receiving.” (Stăniloae 2006: 135)

“The man’s spiritualization is though, as we’ve seen, also a matter of man’s decision and of persisting in the good things, and it receives a personal specificity. The Ghost develops each person in what he has as specific by creation, on the measure that person spiritualizes himself in, by developing himself, but that person develops himself or he is developed by the Ghost, as a limb of the whole. The Ghost develops that person also through that one’s effort of accomplishing himself as what himself is.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“The Holy Ghost is the One Who makes the common work - of the Son, of the Father, and His – to be characteristic to the Church in the totality of the work and to be characteristic to the human subjects in human forms which to fit their specificity as persons.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“The Holy Ghost is the One Who ensures the human person, in their distinct reality, an imperishable value. This is a value that grows up even more through our collaboration with the work of the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 137)

“If we hadn’t been helped by the work of the Holy Ghost, we would have hardly actualized the gifts of the Baptism, or we wouldn’t have actualized them at all; if the Ghost hadn’t communicated with us since we had been administered the Mystery of the Holy Chrism, we would have hardly been able to develop our life into God. Our dialogue, of deeds, with God, it implies the work of both partners, the active communication of both of them, into the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 45)

“Like the death of the former man through the birth of the new man at Baptism, it isn’t a static given, but it is a given full of interminable virtuality, likewise the descent of the Holy Ghost on Pentecost it is the beginning of His continuous descent for each man who enters the Church and who remains within Church. It is the setting and the maintaining in movement, through reciprocal communion, of those death and birth we have been imparted with, at baptism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 46)

“To the spiritual man, in the depths of the Scripture, of the nature, and of the creation’s unfolding in time, there is present and active the Same Ghost present and active in his deep too, upholding his efforts of purification and illuminating all the things from around him, in order the things to become symbols transparent to divinity. All the things give the spiritual man the awareness of the fact that “in God we live, we move, and we exist”, as Saint Apostle Paul said in Areopagite (Acts 17: 28).” (Stăniloae 1992: 188)

“To the people too, who receive the Baptism, the role of uniting them and making them aware of their union with the Word, it is played by the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost is the factor of the human being becoming aware of his elevation through Him, from the automatic and enslaved to the fallen nature life, to renewal, through the understanding (speaking) union with God-the Word born as man.” (Stăniloae 1995: 177)

“The Son shows His turning towards the Father, through love, not only by the fact that the Son doesn’t give Himself birth to another son, out of whom another son would be born and so on; the Son shows His love for the Father also by the fact that there is a Third Person, One not coming out of the Son, but One hypostatized as a loving breath of the Father towards the Son, and That Third Person, at His turn, it attracts the Son towards the Father. Thus, the Father has the Ghost as The One Who rejoices, together with the Father, of the Son, and the Son has the Ghost, as The One Who rejoices, together with the Son, of the Father. This is for the joy of the Two Persons needs to be shared by a Third Person, and Their joy is shown as consummate when They receive the Third Person to rejoice with Each of Them of the Another Person. And the third Person must be a unique Person too. If the Third Person had been diverse person, the Two Persons wouldn't have seen on Themselves in a full union with One Another. Through this, the Father and the Son, at Their turn, they rejoice too, together with the Ghost. But This Third One cannot come except out of the Father, and it cannot be directed except towards the Son, for the Son to receive the Ghost as The One Who rejoices of the Son, together with the Father, and Who rejoices of the Father, together with the Son. The Son cannot be the origin of a Person Whom the Son would have had out of the Son's initiative, the Son rejoicing, together with the Third Person, of the Father. The Son remains Son even in the full Ghost's rejoicing of Son's rejoicing of the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 16)

"The Son is called as the Father's Word or Wisdom, and by this too, it is shown the fact that the Son is the One revealing the Father. And the Father's rejoicing of the Son, communicated to a Third One, it is considered also as a breath of the Father's Life towards His Word. In comparison to the Word, as image of the Father in His thinking about Himself, the Ghost represents the loving overflowing of the Father as Live upon His image. The Father fully feels His life by rejoicing of His image. Both the image and the rejoicing of it, they express the fullness of the God's existence by being hypostases, namely Persons. The Father wouldn't have fully rejoiced of His cogitated image, if the Holy Ghost hadn't communicated, at His turn, with the Father. The Father is the Source of the image, and of His life and feeling, all Three Ones living, on One Another, as tightly united Hypostases. The cogitated image of the Father wouldn't have entirely shown the Father, of His Source, if He hadn't had the Father's Feeling too, though He is not confounded to that. Neither the Father's Feeling of Life wouldn't have been whole, if They hadn't been felt by the Father's Image, or if hadn't comprised in it the Father's image too. Each Person has in Himself, together with the Father, the Other Person too, together with the whole Father's kindness. But Each One live the whole fullness in His relation with the Other Two Persons. The Son lives the whole Trinity's kindness as Son, and just by that, He doesn't live the Trinity's kindness only with filial love, but also with the love that feels in it the love of the Father for the Son." (Stăniloae 1995: 17-18)

"The created universe, through its rationality or structure, is capable of being known as being in the image of the Father ("according" to the One Who is the "image of the Father"), and as full of accessibility, both in the natural plan and in the its plan elevated to Christ. God is not only cogitated in nature and into Christ, but God is also felt or lived as Life through the Ghost. Or, the Father will be felt through all the Ghost's breath, but as

Person. That's why, the Ghost is also called as "of-life-Maker". (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

"In the Three Persons is fully confirmed the 'truth' of the existence of God, which could only partially be confirmed in Two, and through One it would remain uncertain. That's why the Holy Ghost is specially called 'Ghost of the truth' (Jn. 15: 26; 16: 13) and he has the purpose to strengthen into truth. In the troparion at baptism it is said that: 'The Ghost in an image of a dove has proved the strengthening of the word' of the Father regarding the embodied Son." (Stăniloae 2003: 323)

"The Ghost and the Word have been working together from the beginning: the Ghost hasn't created a body in itself, but the body whose forming it has been worked it is the body the Word has been forming it too, to Himself, by imprinting, on Himself, in His body, as being that body's Hypostasis. The Ghost has given that body the life, the Word has given that body His specificity as His body, and He has given His body His identity as Person, by framing, on Himself, in His body, as Hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

"Through Anointing it starts the epiphany or the showing of Christ in the behavior of the baptized man, or of the light of the Ghost of Christ upon that man's being, showing that man as an active image of Christ and like a living dwelling place of Christ, for it helps the baptized one to actualize the image of Christ that is in a virtual manner in him. Thus, one could say that through Anointing with Chrism we are shown that not only with our power we are going to actualize the gifts we have received at Baptism, but we need the help of the Holy Ghost as well. This help starts immediately after Baptism." (Stăniloae 1997: 45)

Holy Mysteries

About the Church's Holy Mysteries - By and Large

“At the basis of the Orthodox Church’s conception about the Holy Mysteries, it stays the belief in the possibility of the work of the godlike man upon another man, through the mediation of the bodies and of the matter between them, in the ambience of the Church as mysterious body of Christ. It is the trust that the godlike Ghost can work through the mediation of the human spirit upon the cosmic matter by and large, and upon other persons specifically. Through the man’s hand flow spiritual powers upon another man, either directly through the body, or through other matter. This is for the human body is constituted out of senses, in which the spirit and the body are inseparable. The one who conveys this power that flows through the man’s hand he is the subject who thinks and wants, namely a subject having a spiritual basis; the power flowing through the body of the one who acts upon another person, it also reached the spirit of the last man. The two people, by meeting with one another through senses, they meet through spirit too. But the power that the man conveys it through his body it doesn’t belong only to his spirit and body, but there is also a far greater power crossing through the man’s body and spirit. It is about the power of the godlike Ghost, with Whom the man comes to an agreement, and Whom the man open himself through faith in the Church’s ambience. Within Mystery, one cannot draw a frontier between the movement of the man who works and the power of the godlike Ghost. And for the celebrant of the Mystery that he is, as priest, a representative of the Church, through him works the Holy Ghost Who breaths within the whole ambience of the Church, as mysterious body of Christ within which Christ works. And the receiver of the Mystery opens himself to the full action of the godlike power conveyed by the celebrant, through his faith, in the Church’s ambience, which is the field the Ghost of Christ works in.” (Stăniloae 1997: 4-5)

“The Christendom differs from paganism by the great news about the Son of God Who made Himself true man, forever and ever. God, in His limitless love for man, he grants the man so much value that He makes Himself man, by taking real man face, and showing Himself to the man both in the present age and in the age to come.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The responsibility becomes increasingly transparent - to each one through the other one - to the presence of God as Person, as factor that gives immeasurable value to his partner of marriage. On the measure the other one unveils his depth he becomes more transparent to Christ Who guarantees his eternal value like human being by the fact He has made Himself man. And this increases each one’s responsibility for the other one. Thus, each one is places in a direct relation with Christ, without his value and consistency to be diminished. Each of them lives Christ in a specific mode through the other one, as uniquely transparent. Both of them live Christ, the One Who appears through the other one, as through a transparent unique environment, of His complete revealing, and like the One Who imposes some special responsibilities related to the other one. Both of them live Christ as the One Who has given each of them to the other one, as special environment for revealing and developing the persons' communion, through reciprocal serving. By this each one unveils himself to the other one in his most profound and secret, and more conquering humanity. Neither of them could live Christ in an increasingly deeper manner and in a such accentuated responsibility and no other man or woman would reveal himself or herself so fully in his / her mystery and in the mystery of the communion as persons, continuously deepened, if he separated himself/herself from the other husband, if he did temporary unions with another man or with another woman. If this was the case, each union would be rather a bodily union, incapable of endlessly progressing in the union and in the reciprocal knowing of their profound spirituality in Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 126-127)

About "Although the Mysteries are officiated upon the persons as taken individually, the Mysteries are administrated to the persons who enter the Church and after they have entered the Church and they have become components of the Church. Through the Mysteries Christ works upon the persons who enter the Church or who have become Church's members, in order to strengthen their unity in Him, namely in order to strengthen the Church's unity. "Into Him every well composed building grows up, in order to reach a holy dwelling place consummated into the Lord" (Ephes. 2: 21). And within Church, the Lord has given some people as... preachers, other as shepherds, other as teachers, towards the consummation of the saints, in order to work the ministration towards building up the body of Christ, until all of us will have reached the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, the stature of the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ (Ephes. 4: 11-13)." (Stăniloae 1997: 14)

About "Being the grace the Christ's work, the unseen Committer of the Mysteries is Christ. The Mysteries' efficiency depends on the connection between soul and body, and of the fact that the soul is open to God, and into Christ this openness of the humanity towards God has reached its maximum level. Christ touches our body by His work, but these touches are being deepened within our soul. Christ Himself works through His full of power body, upon our body. But Christ communicates through His body not only the His clean human sensitiveness, but also His soul's clean sensitiveness and the power of the godhead from within Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 11)

"The modes which the people are united with God in, in stages, are called as Mysteries. Through Mysteries the people ascend in their transcendence up to the end, both towards God and amongst themselves, the human being aspiring to both of them. Through Mysteries one accomplished both the union with God and the union with the other people. But the end of the transcendence doesn't mean the motionless stopping in it. The human being never remains motionless in his transcendence towards God, and towards his fellow human. Forever, God, and the human being's fellow human, they remain mysteries whose endless communication the human being can ever-more penetrate in, and, since a certain point, without being possible to get out of them, but being eternally resting in them. The end of the transcendence only means a form of transcendence which hasn't any other transcendence upon." (Stăniloae 1995: 202-203)

"But for Christ to direct through Mysteries His work towards each person, it is necessary the person to personally believe in Him and in the decisive importance of the acts Christ has chosen as means of His savior grace, for the people to know at what specific moments He works upon them primarily. Through this faith, the respective person covers with his faith the decisive dimension of the act of the Mystery invisibly officiated by Christ Himself, or, in other words, that person opens himself to Christ. That's why in each Mystery the receiver is called by his name and he makes a confession of the faith (at Baptism, Eucharist, Repentance, Ordination), or he confesses his commitment (Wedding, Repentance, Ordination). For Christ to direct through Mysteries His action towards each person, it is necessary that person to manifest, through an act of his own, his will of accepting a decisive personal relation with Christ, Who is available, with His love or with His savior grace, to everybody; it is necessary the believer to totally open himself to Christ, to surrender his faith to Christ, for the savior wave out of the ocean of grace or of personal love of Christ, to enter the believer, through a special and savior attention. All the ones who believe, they enter by Baptism and they increase through the other Mysteries, the total personal relation with Christ, but with the same Christ Who is in relation with the other believers as well and, by this, they enter the relation with those ones and they increase in that relation, by being added to the Church as mysterious body of Christ. This is one of the meanings of the Baptism as death with Christ to the old life and as birth with Christ to a new life, exclusively out of Him. The same determination is required to the believer in the other Mysteries too." (Stăniloae 1997: 16-17)

"By maintaining in the believers' lives in Christ the believers' power of endlessly sacrificing themselves, the Holy Mysteries uphold within the believers the movement of convergence and of endless advancing." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"Christ enters our body with His body, or with the energy of His clean body, through the matters used when officiating the Mysteries, or through the priest's gestures, in order to place within our body as well the beginning of the sanctification, a sanctification that doesn't take place, though, if there doesn't take place an effort from the part of the receiver of the Mystery. One must accentuate with the whole seriousness the Christological realism of the Mysteries, the work of Christ done through His body, upon the human person, through the transfigured matters of the Mysteries and through the priest's gestures. If the person of the Logos is in all the creatures, which are materialized images of His rationalities, all the more can He be in the matters of the Mysteries sanctified through Church's special prayers, with His body present in the Church's ambience, a pneumatized body and therefore a body present in an invisible manner, but a still real and efficient one." (Stăniloae 1997: 13)

"If there hadn't been a human subject, who to represent Christ as Subject in a seen mode, He would have given Himself to us in an unseen manner. But this would have kept us without the possibility of escaping in the incertitude regarding the fact if Christ has given Himself as gift to us, or we are the slaves of some subjective illusions; and we wouldn't have had the living of Christ as another subject in the person of the priest who welcomes us in Christ's name. Anyway, this would have maintained an unsurpassable individualism which would have shredded any unity of faith, and therefore even the purpose and the surety of a real revelation, of a real fact of the salvation in Christ. That's why, on the priesthood it depends the Church and the salvation in Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 97)

"In a more special meaning, the Mysteries are invisible works of Christ done through visible acts, through which is constituted the Church and which are committed within Church. Christ and the Holy Trinity cannot be known in Their efficiency, except through the Church, but, on the other hand, They are known as Trinity for They are known in the sensitive reality of the Church." (Stăniloae 1997: 9)

"In our transcending towards the Holy Trinity and in The Holy Trinity's descending to us, we use not only the seen elements of the creation, but also the words and the symbolic gestures of the priest, which, being uttered and done in the name of Christ and in the name of the Holy Trinity, they communicate the working power of Christ and of the God in Trinity, by being themselves words and gestures of transcending towards God, and of His descent to us. This is for, by repeating us the words and by remembering the savior deeds of Christ, He recognizes those and He relives them as His own, and he relives in Himself the state of the sacrificed One and having the state of the resurrected One for His many brothers, and of the One sitting as man on the right hand of the Father, in order to elevate us too, nigh to Him or into Him, but without us to be confounded in this maximum union, to Him or amongst us. Besides, all the blessings we utter upon the God in Trinity, those blessings come upon us too, through words accompanied by the sign of the cross.” (Stăniloae 1995: 208)

“In the Holy Mysteries we are united with Christ, but through His Ghost Who gives us the feeling and the sensing as sons of the Father and, by this, as members of the loving Kingdom of the Holy trinity. So, we are united through the Son of God made man, with the Holy trinity. This is shown also by beginning the Holy Mysteries by blessing of the Kingdom of the Holy trinity, except in officiating the Confession and the Holy Unction, these two showing the man as weakened in his quality as member of the Kingdom of the Holy trinity. Thus, we are elevated in another sense, to being imparted with the loving power and with the absolute freedom of the Holy Trinity, as escaped from under the slavery of any egotistic addiction.” (Stăniloae 1995: 206)

“In the Holy Mysteries we transcend on ourselves in an ever-deeper communicative union with Christ, and together with Him, as Sons, towards the Father into the Holy Ghost, with the conscience that in itself this transcendence, which may appear to us as done by our own powers, it actually is from God’s power.” (Stăniloae 1995: 205-206)

About “In the patristic-biblical thinking, the grace being the actual work of Christ, in any Mystery work Christ Himself being within Church. Christ Himself extends and develops the Church’s life, through all the Mysteries, which are only visibly committed by the priest as representative of the Church, but invisibly they are committed by Christ Himself. While Rahner reckons that the Baptism, for instance, it is the Mystery of entering the Church and in this are implied all the other effects of it, or that in the Mystery of the Repentance the Church forgives the penitent, in the biblical-patristic thinking the one who is baptized he unites himself directly with Christ (Do you unite yourself with Christ? I unite myself with Christ.). And by this he becomes member of the Church; and the penitent is forgiven by our Lord and God Jesus Christ, with the gift and with His love for people and the seen committer is only the one who seconds Christ in this forgiveness, in his quality of unworthy priest and spiritual guide.” (Stăniloae 1997: 15)

“It is a great mystery how Son-the Word is spiritually into the Father, or of the Father, and towards the Father. We might have some analogy in the fact that the prophets had within them, spiritually, the words of God, words which they translated in sonorous words. The Father lives with some kind of words the loving feeling of His towards the Son and of the Son towards Him, as also the Son lives thus the loving feelings of the Father in Himself and of His as Son towards the Father. But the Word’s words can be used by people not only in order they to be illuminated, and towards life, but also towards darkness and death when the people refuse His words.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 40)

“Like in the created world all the parts and the movements have a mystery character, by participating to the all-comprising Mystery, likewise all the Church’s limbs and acts have a mystery character, for in all of them is present and works Christ, through the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 8)

About “More precisely speaking, the Church’s Mystery isn’t separated from the Christ’s Mystery, neither is separated Christ’s Mystery from the Church’s Mystery, since the Church isn’t but only the extension of the Mystery of Christ, and since the Mystery of Christ hasn’t come to existence but only in order to extend Himself in the Church’s Mystery. These two Mysteries can be discerned theoretically, but they cannot be separated in reality. Christ is the real Head, of the fundamental Hypostasis of the Church, which He constitutes and upholds by continuously imprinting His life in the Church, or in the Church’s limbs, which are kept united amongst them and with Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 8)

“Of course, we must collaborate with Christ Who dwells within us through the Holy Mysteries; otherwise, we won’t be saved. But the basis of our possibility for collaboration it is set up from above, where the Christ’s grace is.” (Stăniloae 1992: 43)

“On short, the Mysteries’ constitutive elements are: the material means which Christ Himself communicates His savior grace by, through the hand of the priest, through the priest’s prayer and ascertaining declaration, and by confessing the faith and by engaging the believers (at Baptism, this is done on behalf of the receiver, by this godfather). The Mystery takes place by the priest’s act, accompanied by the declaration ascertaining the work of Christ; the Mystery is done also by touching the receiver’s body, with the priest’s hand, directly or through a matter, on the basis of the believer’s confession of the faith which is accompanied by the ascertaining declaration of the priest, which is itself a confession of faith in what is being done. The Mystery is a whole that unites the receiver – through the priest’s hand or through the matter the priest uses and through the priest’s ascertaining declaration – with Christ, and by this, with the Church, after the previous confession of faith of the receiver and after the priest’s prayer.” (Stăniloae 1997: 21)

“Regarding the number of the Holy Mysteries, there are three of them of the full union with Christ and of the full entering within Church (The Baptism, the Anointing with the Holy Chrism, and the Eucharist); two of the Holy Mysteries belong to the strengthening again into Christ of the ones who are sick in their soul or in their body (the Repentance, the Holy Unction), and two of the Mysteries are means the receiver is granted the power of fulfilling the special mission of officiating the Mysteries, of preaching the word and of shepherding the churchly community (the Ordination), or the special duties related to marriage (the Wedding).” (Stăniloae 1997: 21-22)

“Right in the basis of the creation God works through cosmos and the man works through cosmos, by uniting his unity with God, sometimes more, and sometimes less. Through man it is especially accentuated the work of God upon creation, in order to spiritualize the creation and to transfigure it. This is the natural basis of the Church’s Mysteries, the basis of the fact that, a man can convey - for instance by water - to another man, the power of God. And the man who has become the environment, by excellence, of the power of God upon matter and upon the other human being, He is Christ. Out of Christ, through each Mystery, it is being extended the power of God upon all people, through gestures and through matter.” (Stăniloae 1997: 6)

“Sometimes, the receiver of the Mystery is put in contact with the priest’s hand, through a matter, sometimes without any matter. But the personal contact in faith, of the receiver of the Mystery with the committer priest, it is necessary in order to commit the Mystery. But always, through this contact, the receiver of the Mystery enters the direct connection, initial or increased, with Christ and with the Church’s community as body of Christ. That’s why the receiver of the Mystery he confesses his faith directly into Christ, and the priest who commits the Mystery, he represents Christ as being the One Who imparts His grace. Christ Himself used mud in order to heal the blind man, but sometimes He healed the sick by directly touching them with His hand. The direct connection the receiver of the Mystery is placed with Christ in, it is very clearly shown by the believer’s confession when receiving the Eucharist. In this confession the believer addresses himself directly to Christ, by showing his conviction that Christ Himself imparts him with His body. Through the priest’s words: “It is being imparted the servant of God (first name)”, the priest only ascertains this fact. The priest doesn’t interpose himself between Christ and the believer, but the priest only occasions their encounter. This ascertainment regarding the direct work of Christ is done also by the bishop when officiating the ordination and by the priest in the Mystery of the Repentance - though in the last case the priest adds his pardon as well. Therefore, we can admit that also at Baptism, through the word: “It is being baptized the servant of God (first name)”, or at Wedding, through the word: “It is being married the servant of God (first name), the priest doesn’t ascertain an impersonal fact but the direct work of Christ upon the receiver of the Mystery, or the personal encounter of the receiver of the Mystery with Christ. Out of all of these, it results the fact that the One Who officiates the Mystery is actually Christ Himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 21)

“That’s why the Mystery is officiated at the encounter of two human subjects who are open by faith to the Holy Ghost working within the ambience of the Church, encounter prolonged in the direct bodily touching between them, or through the mediation of a substance. Neither the substance, nor the uttered words or the done gestures - by themselves - constitute the Mystery, but the Mystery is constituted in the encountering in faith of the two persons in the Church's ambience full of Holy Ghost, and in the bodily touching between the two persons, in the same time with their confession by words of this faith of theirs: of one who officiates the Mystery and of the one who receives the Mystery." (Stăniloae 1997: 5)

"The actualization of this unity – virtual, in some degree – of His, with the human subjects, it takes the shape of the Church. The Church is thus a third Mystery, within which God-the Word reestablishes and elevates on a more accentuated level His union with the world founded through the act of the creation, but weakened through the man's sin. One can say thus, that the creation itself it is the Church, and the Church is the reestablished creation and on the way of being reestablished and of being consummated. If the whole Mystery is a unity of the contraries, the Church is the ultimate Mystery, for the Church is the form of the supreme unity of God with all the created things. The Church will be, in its full consummation form the future life, the mode of God of being "all in everything". Thus, the notions of Mystery and of Church they coincide. The universe that has become again Church, it has become again the all-comprising Mystery, if the Mystery is the presence and the work of God within the whole creation. And for within the Mystery is all-comprising, each of its components is a mystery, one can say that each of its components is a church." (Stăniloae 1997: 7-8)

"The basis of the Mysteries, in their narrow meaning, is constituted of the Word's embodiment and of His savior deeds, namely by the fact that He has assumed and he maintains forever, in His Hypostasis, not only the human soul, but also the human body, which He has elevated through His savior acts to the state of deification. But the concrete possibility of His union with us through Mysteries, in order to elevate us to the state of His humanity, it has been laid by the resurrection and by the ascent or the spiritualization of His body, state which His body has been elevated to, consequently to His sacrifice on the cross. Only since then His spiritualized body, within which the materializing rationality of its matter has become fully transparent and spiritualized, He can dwell within our bodies by the Ghost Who irradiates out of Him, with all the states He has crossed through, and with the height which He has reached at, in order to bring us too, through these states, to the same height. (Stăniloae 1997: 9)

"The Christ's relation forms and degrees with the believers through the diverse Mysteries, they have been established by Christ and not by the Church. It is true that Christ commanded us to grant the Baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, but here the expression in the name it doesn't mean a Church's work in the name of a distant Trinity, but in the power of the Trinity; Christ provides the insurance that in the Church's sees act there is present and working each Person of the Holy Trinity according to His place. This is for the Lord continued saying: "Behold, I will be with you to the end of time" (Mt. 28: 19-20), and about the work of the Holy Ghost Christ speaks at diverse moments (Jn. 20: 33 etc.)." (Stăniloae 1997: 17)

"The Christian faith affirms that this union in stages, through Mysteries, it isn't a work of the human being, neither means confounding the human being to God, and this is shown also by the fact that the Son of God has made Himself man distinct from us, or by the fact that He has taken our humanity into His eternally distinct Hypostasis, in a non-confounded manner, through the teaching that this transcendence take place through the grace coming from Christ, in communication with Him." (Stăniloae 1995: 203)

"The Church's Mysteries do not give us only some static charismas, or some limited good and virtues, which we must carefully keep in the present limits, in order to show them at the last Judgment to God, as well preserved, as the unworked or not-multiplied talent from the Gospel. The Mysteries have at their turn a prophetic-dynamic character, giving us powers, which must be continuously developed and fully actualized and which to led us to increasingly advanced spiritual stages in the inter-human relations, towards the final consummation. But these attitudes are valorized not only by us, but together with Christ, employing to do this also the new aspects of the social reality, which the history shows not only through a slow evolution, but sometimes through jumps taking place within history. Christ doesn't limit Himself only to show us, as Prophet, His state, passively, as state which all of us must tend towards. He is the permanent Prophet leading us increasingly closer to Himself, always higher and closer to the Kingdom of Heavens." (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

"The Church's Mystery in a proper sense, as the Third Mystery, it presupposes the first Mystery, namely the Creation's Mystery, but the Church could be brought to existence through the Mystery of Christ. The Church is just the extension of the Christ's Mystery; the whole Church is full of Christ's Mystery." (Stăniloae 1997: 8)

"The fact that the intimate relation with God, which the human being enters with God in, it accentuates the human being's quality as unique person, of eternal value, escape from under the force of the nature depersonalized through passion, it is shown not only in the fact that God Himself is a Trinity of Persons, but also in the fact that in receiving each Mystery the human being is indicate on his name. The human being is received in each Mystery as unique person, in the eternal communion, through Christ, the human Person Who has forever become man too, in communion with the Trinity of the godlike Persons too, being indicated on Their names, and, by this, the human being is provided with the eternal happiness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 203)

“The general basis of the Church’s Holy Mysteries it is the faith that God can work upon creature in the creature’s visible reality. In this sense, the general meaning of the Mystery is the union of God with the creature. The most comprising Mystery, in this sense, it is the union of God with the entire creation. This is a Mystery comprising everything. There is no reality’s part not to be comprised in this Mystery. This union started at the moment of the creation’s act, and it has been meant to be consummated through the movement of the creation towards the state which God will be everything in all things in (I Cor. 15: 28). Who can understand the meaning and the depth of this union: of the mode of the presence of the Word of God in the rationalities of the created things and of His work in sustaining and guiding them towards the target of their full union with Him?” (Stăniloae 1997: 5)

“The Mysteries are officiated by the Church, or by Christ through the Church, on behalf of some persons who want to enter the Church and to remain within Church, those persons uniting themselves by this, with Christ Himself, the One Who has instituted the Mysteries. Of course, the Mysteries are granted to some persons, and not to the Church’s entire community or to some persons groups. But this doesn’t mean that the Mysteries are given to some persons isolated from the Church. Through Mysteries, the Church – or more precisely: Christ working within Church – effects Christ’s action of uniting those persons with Him and with the other Church’s members united with Him. The Mysteries are the act with which Christ recapitulates in Himself, as Church, the people who were separated from God and from one another, if they now believe in Him. Thus, the Mysteries have a unifier function. That’s why the Mysteries belong to the Church, as unity accomplished in the ones who believe in Him, in order to extend this unity, and in order to attract also others in this unity, and in order to strengthen their unity in Christ, or the Church’s unity as mysterious body of Christ. One doesn’t officiate a Mystery on behalf of a person from outside the Church in order to let that person remaining in continuation outside the Church. One is not recognized a Mystery he received outside the Church to, as long as he remains outside the Church. The Baptism is officiated on the Church’s porch, facing the Church’s interior, after the receiver was directing his face towards the Church’s exterior while rejecting the one who reigns outside the Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 14)

“The Mysteries aren’t transcendences on the created plan, from a stage to another, but they are transcendences from the created to the Person-

Absolute. Some transcendence existed also before Christ, through the human being's thinking at himself, and through the relations with the fellow humans, with the nature, and with God Who made Himself somehow felt and necessary to be though through all things." (Stăniloae 1995: 202-203)

"The Mysteries stay in a connection with the Christ's sacrifice. In all the Mysteries we receive the power of sacrificing ourselves, and this power comes from the state of sacrifice which Christ is in. Not out of the memory of the sacrifice on Golgotha comes this power, because in such a case the man had given the power to himself, and the Mysteries wouldn't have been Mysteries; the man's power for self-sacrificing comes from the actual state of sacrifice which Christ is in, which is a prolongation of His surrender as man to the Father, surrender which, by being Christ in a body capable of dying, He brought it to its full extent, by accepting death and shedding His blood; after His bodily death Christ maintains His state of sacrifice like a total spiritual surrender of His humanity to the Father, in order to be consummately filled up with godhead, which keeps it elevated to the state of resurrection, elevation, and pneumatization." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"The report between Church and Christ cannot be expressed in the simple manner through the idea that the Church represents in Mysteries an absent Christ, the Church being a juridical deputy of an absent Christ; this report can only be described like this: the Church, on one hand, it is full of Christ, for Christ works within Church, but on the other hand, the Church is always in the position of praying and serving Christ, and therefore the Church isn't identical to Him. The Church is the body, and not the Head, though you cannot unite yourself with the Head without uniting yourself with the body – but the conscience of the believer highlights the union with the Head rather than that with the body. Between Catholicism and Protestantism, the Church maintains a more complex, more balanced, more conform to the reality position." (Stăniloae 1997: 16)

"The true mystery of the man and of the world it consists of the fact of advancing into the free and eternal God, in true communion with Him." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 14)

"The union with One from Trinity embodied as man, it is done in the Holy Mysteries through the elements of the cosmic creation, which the creator and upholder power of the Holy Trinity works within, a power made useful to us, and a power which we can come back in the fulness of the connection with the Son made man and through the Holy Ghost, for this power is made by Him to us as means towards spiritualization and towards eternal life. Christ Himself, by entering the water, and by receiving as man the Holy Ghost, He has made the water good again, and communicating the powers of the Holy Trinity and the restored powers of the human nature.” (Stăniloae 1995: 207)

“The work of Christ Himself within Mysteries must be reckoned as tightly connected to the fact that Himself instituted the Mysteries. But He instituted the Mysteries for He was the first to practiced them, and He has remained in continuation their invisible committer and, by this, the Upholder of the Church. Himself was baptized so He commanded all the people to be baptized, declaring in the same time that Himself will be present in the practicing of this Mystery: “Behold I am with you to the end of the time” (Mt. 28: 20). Himself as man has received the Holy Ghost after His Baptism, following that everybody to receive the Holy Ghost from Him in the Mystery of the Chrism. He forgave sins and He has remained to furthermore forgive the sins through the priests, by empowering the Apostles through the breathing of the Holy Ghost, as mode of His permanent work in committing this Mystery: “Who you will forgive their sins, forgiven will their sins be (at the same moment, o. n.), and whom you will keep their sins, their sins will be kept” (Jn. 20: 22-23). Christ has laid the basis of the Eucharist by His death of the cross and by His resurrection and He officiated the first Eucharist, and then he commanded Hid disciples to commit it themselves ever since, Himself being permanently in the Eucharist as sacrifice and sacrifice. He was the Hierarch by excellence, and He remains in unseen mode in this work and quality, in the seen hierarchs and priests whom He conveys this quality as seen organs of the Mystery committed by Him in unseen mode. Christ blessed the wedding and He healed sick people. The Church officiates all the seven Mysteries, for Christ committed them visibly, as long as He was on earth, and for He commits them after His Ascent to heavens, or after He has entered with the body the fully pneumatized plan, He commits them in an invisible mode within His Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 15-16)

“The work of the Church’s hierarchy upon the believer people, it is exercised, essentially, through the Holy Mysteries, and especially through Baptism, Chrism, and Eucharist. While the angels, as “pure minds”, they receive the godlike things in an unveiled mode, we receive the godlike things dressed up in “sensitive icons”, or “in symbols”; through symbols we understand words, gestures, and sensitive matters, which do not only signify but they also comprise in a not-understood manner some spiritual realities. These wraps cover, more or less, the “rationalities” of the Mysteries. The sensitive forms of the Mysteries do not impede the consummate ones to contemplate and to feel the Mysteries’ spiritual content, and to the not-consummate ones the Mysteries stay in a wise conformity to those ones’ state.” (Stăniloae 1992: 47)

“This faithfulness to Christ Whose humanity is the real, definitive image of God, this shaping of the believer according to the Christ’s humanity it is maintained and it is achieved also by mimicking His acts in Mysteries, as also through the whole endeavor to behave in life as Christ did. Imitating these acts, representing also an effort and a will of imitating, it somewhat achieves what it is intended through them. All the more is this as this effort is helped by the energy irradiating out of The One who the believer wants to become alike with, and Who is in the state which the believers want to achieve within themselves, by such own acts.” (Stăniloae 2005: 30-31)

“Thus, in the most special meaning, the character and the name of Mysteries are worn by a few visible works of the Church, instituted by Christ, through which Christ unites with Himself, and therefore with the Church, the singular persons who believe in Him, and through which this union with those persons is being developed. This is for the Son of God by taking the human nature, He has reconciled the human nature and He has the human nature with the Father, and he deified the human nature through obedience, through crucifixion, and through resurrection, for, by uniting us with these first fruits of us, to become like Him and to constitute the Church and to maintain ourselves and to increase in the unity with Him, which is represented by the Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 9)

“We transcend through the Holy Mysteries towards the Absolute of the love of the Holy Trinity, out of the power of the Trinity’s love - which love is communicated to us into the Holy Mysteries, as filling us up with love, in order us to love one another, and together to love the third one, or to rejoice of one another, and having our joy increased by a third one.” (Stăniloae 1995: 206)

“Within Church there is a more supple hierarchy, of inward and unofficial order, a hierarchy based exclusively on the holiness degrees. But this hierarchy too, it needs the Mysteries and it maintains itself in dependency on the seen hierarchy which is accredited to celebrate the Mysteries. No matter the level of holiness which a believer would be on, the believer still remains dependent during his life on earth on the hierarchical order of the Church and he must be imparted with the Holy Mysteries. Of course, to the one on a higher level of holiness, the Mysteries are unveiled, he sees more of their content, he benefits more of them, so that even if the material wrap has become - to say so - inexistent to him, he receives the Mysteries further, for the spiritual content of the Mysteries it is nourished out of the infinite content of the godlike life and, as such, it is a necessary source of spiritual life to anybody. The angelic Liturgy from the Church’s painting tells us that the Eucharist, even unseen, it still remains Eucharist, as Impartation, a “truer one”, one fuller with the Body and with the Blood of the One Who has sacrificed Himself for the world. The godlike grace imparted through the Holy Mysteries they aren't confounded, still, amongst them, and that's why, even when the wraps of the Mysteries are more transparent to some people, they still need special grace, conform to their state, which constitute the essence of some precise Mysteries. There is a hierarchy of the grace, starting with the grace of the Baptism and to the grace which the Cherubs and the Seraphim are imparted with. Even the Christian who passes to heavens he still remains within Church, in the heavenly part of the Church, somewhere on a level of the endless grace. And as long as the believer is on earth, he must be within Church if he wants to thrive in the living of the union with God; and not only for he must remain in the hierarchical-sacramental structure of the Church, but also for he must progress in the direction of the heavenly hierarchy of the angels, towards the saints' Church from heavens, which isn't in discontinuity with the Church on earth, but in connection with this one. For, anyway, someone won't reach on the level of purely contemplating God if he hasn't purified himself through the Mystery of the Baptism, for instance. That one must take with him the consequences, the signs of the seen Mystery of the Baptism from the Church on earth." (Stăniloae 1992: 48)

Holy Baptism

"About Saint John the Baptist the Holy Scripture says: And the child was growing up and he was becoming strong with the Ghost (Lk. 1: 180); of course, he was growing up in a house of the prayer and of God also for he was circumcised and consecrated to God. Likewise, child Jesus was increasing in wisdom, and He was growing up with the body too, and He had grace to God and to people (Lk. 2: 52); He was increasing and having grace only with His human childhood, for he was a child only as man." (Stăniloae 1997: 43)

"About the increasingly clearer imprinting of the Christ's image in the baptized ones, about their true personal face becoming increasingly visible out of the not-fully defined generality, or out of the disorder of its inferior impulses, Saint Paul said: And all of us with the uncovered face, mirroring the same image, we are transformed from glory to glory, as from the Ghost of the Lord (2 Cor. 3: 18). By increasingly more mirroring the Christ's image and by this making our personal image increasingly distinct, we become increasingly luminous, for the personal image is the image of the freedom, of the conscience, and of the responsibility, and in these is being mirrored the glory of Christ's image as Person, or in these ones can be seen the accentuated features of the living for God and for all the good wanted by God, in order to be accomplished by us on behalf of others.” (Stăniloae 1997: 36)

“Actually, right at the Baptism, through the will that attached to Christ, Christ secretly inhabits that man’s nature, within which there is the root of the will too. This is for, according to the Holy Fathers, the will is the nature’s desire of maintaining and developing itself, and the true will is rational, namely it follows the true interest of the nature, or its eternal preservation and development in connection with God. So, at Baptism, the will is the first power of the human nature which received the light and the spiritual strengthening from the Word, or from the godlike embodied and sinless Logos, or which receives His Ghost, as together subject of the will, after He was acting upon the will from outside. But this means that in its ultimate intimacy of rational-personal order, the human nature has been freed of the irrational, contrary, and sub-personal power of the sin, but it has still remained in the will the weakness of the irrational habits from surface.” (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

“After Baptism, the man feels himself like belonging to Christ (Rom. 14: 8). Now begins the man’s life into cleanness, out of the power of Christ Who is dwelling within the man, likewise was the life into committing the sin imprinted like a strong virtuality within the man’s being, because of the connection which the man was living in, with satan, the enemy of God. The enemy of God made out of the man’s nature, through the long obedience manifested by the man, an instrument of his wills. The man denounced the connection with that one. And Christ has used this decision of the will of man to attach himself to Christ, in order to unite the man with His will, in order to make Himself, or His Ghost, the subject of the man’s will. So begins a new life within man, a life oriented towards avoiding the sin and towards committing the good, or the will of Christ, an advancing with Christ in the relation of endless love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 145)

“The decision capacity is given to each human being, by the Holy Ghost, before Baptism. The Ghost gives the power of the full personalizing through the emancipation from the nature’s depersonalized weaknesses, and by entering the dialogue with God. Properly-said, it is difficult to distinguish between the decision power given by the Ghost and the decision brought by the human being in order to receive the Holy Ghost in Baptism, with the Power given by Him to the human being, in order the human being to decide himself for a free of sin life, namely to decide himself for the dialogue with God offer, made him through the holy Ghost. The new existence comes to the man in connection with the Cosmos, represented by water, through the Holy Ghost Who is working in the same Cosmos, represented by water, as symbol of the communicability of the Holy Ghost, giving the human being too, the power of communication which is contrary to egotism.” (Stăniloae 1995: 174-175)

“In Baptism the human being is reborn into Christ, fully personalized and open to the communication with the Holy Trinity and with the fellow humans. At Baptism is committed the first stage of the true transcendence or the human being towards the fellow humans, or the union with them through the brotherly communication with them, within Church as mysterious, living, and multi-personal body of the Lord, and the newly baptized human being is entrusted to the others’ responsibility, those ones being represented by godparents, who keep the baptized human being in unity with them, through faith. The Baptism is a birth of the human being with the collaboration of the own will with the Holy Ghost Who makes springing out within human being, clearly, his conscience as new human being, as son of the Father, united with Christ, as His brother, and communicating through Christ with the Father, and with the fellow humans, who are the other sons of the Father and brothers of Christ and of his. That’s why, the Baptism could be called also as the Mystery of the full brotherhood of the human being adopted by the Father, into Christ, through the Holy Ghost, and, so, alive in their loving communication with God and with others.” (Stăniloae 1995: 203-204)

“After in baptism we have accepted the death towards sin, in the same time with the death as offering of our being brought to God, we must die in continuation, but not the death of the former man, for that one died definitively, but we die that death as continuous surrender together with Christ to God. But then Christ no longer dies for our sins, of the baptized ones, but he remains in state of sacrifice, as surrender to God, of us to be as well in that state of sacrifice. In this state of sacrifice of His, it is included, of course, His death He has accepted for our sins from before Baptism and for the sins which eventually we follow to commit after.” (Stăniloae 1997: 30)

“After the Baptism is officiated on the Church’s porch, the newly baptized one is brought in front of the imperial doors, where he is imparted with the Body and with the Blood of the Lord, as sign of the fully incorporation within Church, and the male children are brought in altar, where the priest goes around the holy table, this fact meaning the introduction of the newly baptized one in the highest mysteries of the knowledge about Christ, in order to be at his turn the preacher of the faith in Christ and the priest of his family, or the first responsible for the faith and for the living of the church from within his house, the first one to bring sacrifice and who sacrifices himself for it, like Christ is to the Church (Ephes. 5: 25), or as the bishops and the priest are like seen organs of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 39)

“All the things from Scripture become thus not only contemporary to us, but they are somehow a biography of our reports with God. In this sense, the savior deeds of the life of Jesus will become actual deeds taking place in the deep of my life, if I want to receive Him within me. At Baptism He hides Himself within me, in a supreme kenosis. He manifests His efficiency, covertly at the beginning, and then increasingly obvious, in my endeavor of fulfilling the commandments; He will resurrect within me when I reach the state of dispassion, He “will transfigure” Himself for me when I reach to see the godlike light. Penetrated within me, in a hidden manner, at Baptism, Christ is the efficient force guiding and empowering my whole ascension, during which I become increasingly transparent to Him, through my gradual deification, making me like Him through dialogic al communication with Him, he actively mirroring Himself in numerous human lives, as the sun in countless windows.” (Stăniloae 1992: 187)

“At Baptism the man accepts to no longer be the servant of satan and of any other power of the evil, but he commits himself to be totally self-given to the loving Christ; by this, his freedom is no longer enchained by passions, but it is free towards a true growing up and towards a continuous novelty of the man. That’s why the declaration the priest utters at Baptism says: “Is being baptized the servant of God (first name)” etc. Both the quality as servant of God and the own name are mentioned in all the Holy Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 37-38)

“At Baptism, Christ doesn’t receive the man in a personal relation, without the man showing at his turn some preparation, some desire for it, or without the man taking by this the obligation comprising responsibilities for the whole his life, towards the Christ’s appeal, in order to use the power that he is given at Baptism, or the union with Christ, in order to live according to the Christ’s will and to His example. The live on the level of personal responsibility it starts just in the moment of the Baptism. God takes the man seriously since the beginning. God wants the man to be a responsible person. The man must show that he wants to live such a life, before to receive the power for it through Baptism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 37)

“Because it was used for a long time by the enemy of God as an instrument against God, the man’s nature has remained on one hand, with some physical weaknesses which have influence upon the soul too, and on the other hand the man’s nature has remained even with some weaknesses of the soul himself and of the will. On the weakness of the physical hunger, it is tied the weak resistance to the temptation of the covetousness; to the weakness of the tiredness, it is tied the weakness of lacking the resistance to the temptation of laziness; to the weakness of the pain and of the fear of death it is tied the cowardice; to the satisfying of the temptations, it is tied the haughtiness. The first mentioned are the so-called affects, which easily bring the soul to the second ones, namely beyond their simple satisfying, to the falling into sins and to egotistic acts, or to searching for them. After Baptism, the believer ought to, fight against his soul's sliding to an exaggerate satisfying of those lusts." (Stăniloae 2006: 145-146)

"Because the people couldn't pass to this new life except by ceasing to exist, they couldn't come back to this life except through a new birth, into which the Holy Ghost, by becoming its main factor, which to intensely pneumatize as well the liquid reserve of the universe, namely through Baptism. The embodied Son of God, though He didn't need this rebirth through Baptism, for he has born, from the beginning, out of Ghost, he still accepts the baptism for us, the people, in order to be in this concern too, the first man baptized out of water and out of Ghost. By doing that, He has united the Ghost from within Him with the water, in an actual manner, as bosom and upholder of the life – for this time of the live not-obeyed to the death – for He is fully united with the Ghost. Thus, Christ has fulfilled the whole righteousness which he followed to dress up with, all the people who will believe. Christ has successively accepted these two acts, for we must cross through them both. That's why the Church Fathers consider the Baptism founded both in the Lord's Birth and Baptism. The baptistery is at its turn, both the image of the Lord's Mothers breast and the image of Jordan River." (Stăniloae 1997: 25)

"Between the birth of the Son of God out of Virgin and our birth, there is a great difference too. He was born as real man out of Virgin, but He has remained God too. He has made out of the human nature, the nature of His godlike Hypostasis. The average human being who is born out of Baptism, he isn't God by nature and Who has taken the human nature." (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

"But, though to the one who has died to the sin in Baptism, it is normal him no to die anymore, because the former man has died forever, though, even the one who will remain in such a state of definitive death towards sin, he must continue bringing clean sacrifice to God into Christ, in the sense of a relentless self-giving: Therefore, I urge you, brothers, for the mercies of God, to show your bodies as a living, holy sacrifice, well-pleasant to the Lord (Rom. 12: 1). In this sense Saint Cyril of Alexandria said that we haven't entrance to the Father except in state of clean sacrifice, but we cannot be in this state except into Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 30)

"By all the things communicated to the child, the Christian family aims to defend him against all sort of dangers, against evil temptations, and to give him the power to fight himself against those. The Baptism is the decisive power the child is given with in order to determine him to reckon himself as Christian and indebted to behave accordingly, fighting the temptations before being enslaved to some evil habits.” (Stăniloae 1997: 42)

“By giving the human face an accentuated personal and responsible character and the increasingly deeper conscience of the eternal meaning of the personal life and of its persistence, as also of the eternal meaning of the entire reality in God, which lacks to the one who reckons that everything ends in death, that the whole signification of the human life it is reduced to satisfying some bodily needs, actually always the same, - the Baptism is called by the Holy Fathers as illumination. The man is illuminated through Baptism, being penetrated by the light of the Word of God Who, being eternal, he has given the eternity to the nature He has assumed by embodiment and He has and resurrected, and to the ones who receive \Him through Baptism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 36-37)

“Children cannot be deprived of this death with Christ, of the former man from within them, or to be deprived of the foundation of the eternal life placed within each human being.” (Stăniloae 1997: 41)

“Children open themselves easier than the adults, or even easier than the youngsters, to the faith which their families confess, both for within them the individualistic egotism hasn’t developed yet and for they do not feel themselves yet pressed by the nature’s legality and impeded by their inferior impulses. The children believe that everything is possible and they rejoice of what is beautiful and good. The border between natural and what exceeds the natural, between what the man is given as narrowing and the possibility of the man to create or to open, by freedom, new horizons and roads, it is not fixed yet. The children even rejoice of those horizons. On the other hand, they must be told about those horizons. The Savior, taking in account this impulse of the children towards what is good, towards the faith’s domain, he asks the adults to let their children coming to Him, and not to stop them. But this implies also informing the children about Christ, informing done by adults. Thus, the His word: “Let the children come to Me, and do not stop them” (Mt. 19: 14) it also means: Make Me known to the children!” (Stăniloae 1997: 42)

“Christ’s entering within us it takes place through the Holy Mysteries; through the Baptism’s washing, through the anointing with the Holy Chrism, and by being us imparted with Him on the Holy Table.” (Stăniloae 1992: 43)

“Concerning the recognition of the Baptism committed outside the Church, the liberty the Church manifested towards such a Baptism committed through the threefold sinking or spilling, or spreading with water in the name of the Holy Trinity, it shows that the Church can validate such a Baptism, by oikonomia, when receiving within Church the one who has been baptized outside the Church, by extending over the committed external part the full atmosphere of grace of the Church, which existed in a more or less accentuated mode also in the Christian unity the baptized one comes from. The recognition by the Church, of this Baptism, it is like some sort of late completion of the external part with the godlike power now fully received by the baptized one outside the Church, and it means placing him in full accord with the Church. But the Church can also baptize the ones who come at it, due to the not-fullness of the grace or of the work of Christ in the Christian unity where the baptized one come from, by the fact that within that unity there is no fullness of the faith.” (Stăniloae 1997: 40)

“For living our sacrifice life in virtues, we take the power out of the Holy Impartation too. But the virtues grow up also out of Baptism. Christ adds, through the Holy Eucharist power to the power He has given us, as gift, at Baptism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 31)

“For the fact as well that we must grow up towards resurrection through the life of cleanness and through virtues, the death state of the former man we enter through Baptism and the new life we achieve, they have some sort of permanence and growth. But in order this growth to be possible, Christ Himself continues to be with us in the state of sacrifice and of resurrection, and He communicates us His state of Sacrifice and Resurrection through an increasingly higher efficiency, on the measure of our spiritual growth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 29-30)

“If in the birth of the man born out of parents, it is active also the work of God, then this work won’t be one with the breath of the Holy Ghost, but then God makes to come to existence an original person, out of the still not-personalized potentialities of the human nature. The human nature, after it will be actualized as person, it will have to enter through the will of this new person too, in relation with God through Baptism, receiving the breath of the Holy Ghost. If a person hadn’t been brought to existence by God, then he wouldn’t have been able to take this decision after that. Thus, these two moments are united in the human being’s becoming as person: the human being’s creation as person through God, at his birth, and the fulfillment of his quality as person by accepting himself the dialogue with God, by adhering to Christ in Baptism. The work of God for bringing a new human being to existence, it is shown in the human being’s founding as person or as partner of the dialogue with God. But the born human being must decide himself too, in favor of this quality of his. By doing that, the human being is united with Christ Who has united the new human being with Himself, in His quality as non-hesitating dialogue partner of God, having just God-the Word Himself, as hypostasis of the humanity. By this, Christ also extends the Holy Ghost, through breathing, upon the newly born human being, as a Ghost of the Son. This happens with the human being, at his Baptism. The human being enters by this, as partner, even the dialogue of the Holy Trinity, and by this, the human being restores the dialogue with his fellow human, members of the Church, into Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 85-86)

“If the Baptism produces, by union with Christ, the abolition of the original sin of separation from God, imprinted in our nature, and if without this union with Christ one cannot enter the Kingdom of God, it is obvious that the Baptism will be absolutely necessary for salvation (Jn. 3: 3). The Baptism is absolutely necessary to children as well, for they have this state of separation from God too, because of being born out of body, and therefore they too must pass from the state of born out of body and destined to perdition, to the state of born out of water and Ghost and, by this, of saved (Jn. 3: 5-6). Because nobody had been clean of defilement even if he would live on earth only for a day (Job 14: 4), it is obvious that this defilement is have by children as well, not by personally committing sins but by birth. Only Christ differs from us as man, for He was born in everything like us except the sin (Hebr. 4: 15). Saint Apostle Paul reckons all the people, without exception, submitted to the sin because of Adam, and therefore all the people must bury the former man, in Baptism, in order to be born as new people in Christ. The fact that the death reigns over all the people it is to Apostle Paul a sign that over all people there reigns the sin and its damnation, because death is payment for sin: As through a man the sin entered the world and through sin death, likewise death passed to all the people, for in that one all of them committed sin (Rom. 5: 12, 15). Saint Apostle Paul said to the Christians: Likewise, you reckon yourselves as dead to the sin and alive to God into Christ Jesus, our Lord (Rom. 6: 11). By Baptism, the sin’s body has been broken (Rom. 6: 6). Now, even if we die physically, we are no longer submitted to the eternal death, for is we dies together with Christ, we believe that we will resurrect and live together with Him (Rom. 6: 8). We will live together with Christ Whom is no longer mastered by the death (Rom. 8: 9).” (Stăniloae 1997: 40-41)

“If we want to present the Baptism’s aspects in a certain order, the most important seems to be that of the rebirth. Out of Baptism, the man exits with a totally new existence. The man is not renewed in one regard only, but the man’s existence itself is different. The man is a like a newborn, but on another plan: on the plan of the common life with Christ, full of the virtuality of the pneumatization. The man’s existence has now another foundation and another movement; the man’s existence is somehow en-hypostatized in Christ, though it doesn’t lose the liberty of separating from Christ. The paradox is the fact that the baptized one remains a subject as well. The Baptism doesn’t produce the birth of a man who hasn’t existed before, but it produces the rebirth of the same man (Tit 3: 5), namely the rebirth of a man who has existed before. But for the man who has been born for the second time, not to add himself to the former man he was, the former man must die. His rebirth takes place after the death of the man who has been born before, out of body.” (Stăniloae 1997: 26-27)

“In baptism we are born as new human being with Christ the One Who has been born as man from Virgin without bearing the ancestral sin, but we also die in Baptism with Christ Who died - for He has been born as new man – to all the consequences of the ancestral sin, including the death. The Baptism is too, the symbol of the virginal womb, but also the symbol of the tomb of Christ, out of Whom has been born the life victorious upon death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

“In order to keep the gifts received at Baptism, one needs efforts.” (Stăniloae 1997: 43)

“In the death we live through virtues, it is manifested also the existence of the death towards sin, whilst to Christ His death in continuation with us, it is not a resistance of Him against the sin which he eventually could commit, but it is a surrender to God for the value this death has it in itself, likewise His death on Golgotha wasn’t a death of the former man from within Him. Besides this, there might be no man who doesn’t commit sins after Baptism. That’s why the death of the baptized ones, in continuation, though it may happen to be at some of them only a death as surrender to God and as resistance to sin, it is mixed also with a death towards the committed sin. Then even the death within which it is manifested also a resistance to sin it is also a death towards sin, and it is not only a death as a simple surrender to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 31)

“Just at the Baptism, the man has received in his form as person, the Christ’s form, for the man has entered the relation with Christ. The baptized one will always remember this connection between himself and Christ, between his image as person and the image of Christ imprinted within him. In this sense, the man has dressed himself up with Christ, since Baptism. Christ has given the man His countenance, and the man must make this countenance increasingly clearer, by striving to live increasingly more according to the model of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 34)

“Like if somebody has entered a positive relation with a person, he virtually has in this relation the whole warmth and strengthening attention of that person, but only by persevering in this relation he is being communicated, in an actual mode, all the gradual powers of this warmth and attention, likewise is in the relation with Christ which the man enters at Baptism.” (Stăniloae 2006: 142)

“On one hand, our Baptism is reckoned as image of the Christ’s Birth and Baptism, and on the other hand it is reckoned as image of His death and resurrection. We come out of the Baptism’s bath to a life of cleanness like the one that Christ had after His Birth and Baptism, but we come out to such a live for we have died to the sin and we have totally surrender ourselves to God, into the resemblance of Christ’s death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 29)

“On short, the inverse succession takes place within us for a reason that differs us from Christ, namely because of the sin, but also due to an identical reason to that of the inverse succession of Christ, namely for our sinking as people in the endless life of God, through what we are united with Christ as man in His death and in His surrender to God, in order to resurrect to an eternal life in Christ. At the death of the former man from within us, it is added our union with Christ through faith, our death with Christ as surrender to God and as receiving the eternal life out of Him. Thus, our death in Baptism isn’t identical to that one of Christ, but it only likens His death, for we do not die only in order to surrender ourselves to God but we also die as former man, a sinner man, and not like Christ did for He had no sin. That’s why our death mustn’t be a ceasing of existing in continuation, because while Christ had to His death His life consummate, we assimilate this life into cleanness also through our efforts after baptism. While Christ had the clean life in Him from His birth and he was strengthening it until His death, we receive this life only at Baptism and therefore we must strengthen this life after Baptism. This is the second - tightly related to the first one – that we die in Baptism for, only in the likeness of the death of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 28)

“On the threshold of their entering within Church the people are sanctified for Christ integrates them through Baptism, or through His Ghost working into Baptism, in the body of the ones united with Him, namely Christ unites the people with Him. By this, they have the quality of “saints”, by being “washed up” of the ancestral sin and of their sins until that moment, for they have been helped to decide themselves to get out of their egotism, to get out of the life they have been before living it outside the infinity of Christ’s love and outside the love from the Church’s community. At Baptism, on the basis of their faith – or on the basis of the faith of the ones who guarantee for their faith that is going to get actualized, therefore on the basis of their potential faith - Christ has imprinted their nature with His sacrificed and sanctified human nature, free of the ancestral sin, and free of any other sin and impulse towards sin. The not-narrowed Christ in His endless love by any egotism of the sin, he has imprinted Himself in their faith or in their openness towards Him, as an impetus of their answer to His love, a fact that has made them clean of the ancestral sin of their narrowing and it has imprinted them with the dynamism towards the not-narrowed by sin life, in the ambience of the Christ's love. Christ Who died as man towards any possibility of the sin, towards any possibility of narrowing of His humanity towards the infinity of the godlike love, he has imprinted Himself with the power of this endless love in the one who has been baptized, making him - even on that moment - to die to the sin, to get out of his narrowing and of his slavery." (Stăniloae 2006: 115)

"One cannot know when the child impropriates the spiritual specific of his family in a conscious manner. But the child starts expressing that spiritual specific, since a determinable moment. But before expressing it, the child has impropriated it in its specific essence. When the child starts speaking, he articulates what he has impropriated long time before, gradually, starting just from the first days. And the words and the phrases seeded to him and which he starts expressing at a given moment, they aren't neutral, they aren't empty of any content, but they bear the seal of content with a certain specific. It is a content which has been seeded in him not only by words, but also by acts and attitudes. The Baptism's act can be reckoned as one of those. Anyway, the Baptism is determinant to the spiritual life which the family lives and which is seeded to the child." (Stăniloae 1997: 41)

"One could say that before Baptism the soul is moved by grace, by the ambience irradiating out of the Church. In the man prepared thus, Christ can come and dwell through Baptism in than man's soul himself. Before Baptism, upon that man work the Ghost of Christ, especially through the word of a believer who has the Ghost within himself, and who is part of the Church. Of course, this work isn't only a work by word, but also through the conviction of the one who speaks, through his life surrendered to Christ. That's why Nicephorus the Stethatos placed the service of the word on the forth position - the highest one of the spiritual life -, the first one being the purification of passions, the second one being the contemplation of God, and the third one being the dwelling of the Holy Trinity in the man's soul. The word of calling to Christ, in order to create an inwards state of preparation within the ones who haven't attached themselves to Him yet, it consequently must start out of the Church's fullness, within which one lives the death with Christ and the earnest of His Resurrection. Consequently, the man's preparation for Baptism is being done next to the Church, under the power of Christ which irradiates out of Church, and it is a preparation for the man's entrance within Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 145)

"Our Baptism is related to both the death and the resurrection of the Lord: our Lord's resurrection is some kind of His rebirth as man to the immortal life." (Stăniloae 1997: 27)

"Out of the power of Crist's sacrifice, we too are united with the Father, and amongst ourselves, into Baptism. This is because if we hadn't had the impulse towards sacrifice, awaken within us by the Holy Ghost, we couldn't have been reborn as new human beings and united with Christ, in communication amongst us within Church. That's why we aren't baptized only into Christ, in order us to be reborn as sinless human beings, strangers to egotism, but we are also baptized into the Father and into the Holy Ghost, in the love springing out from the Father, and so we enter, at Baptism, at the Father, through the Ghost, and together with the Son. We become, at our turn, as sons of the Father, together with the Son, out of love for the Father, a love that is communicated to us by the Son. This elevation of ours, it opens us the sources of the immortal life from the Father. And in this we live even more united with Christ Who was crucified and Who resurrected for us. And to this union we are elevated, at maximum, by Christ, by imparting us with His body and blood. This fulfills our union with Christ and, therefore, our entering with Him, as sacrifice, at the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 195)

"Saint Cyril of Jerusalem spoke about an imitation of the Lord's death and Resurrection, in Baptism. The imitation is effort, and it can go until reaching the identifying to the acts of the One Who does the first, and to the states produced by those acts. In the act of initial imitation is concentrated the whole effort of ulterior imitation of Christ, and this imitation starts since the moment of the baptism, and it continues the whole life after, inscribing a growth on the like of resembling to Christ, to deepening in a state of sacrifice like that endured by Christ on cross. The supreme paradox is that we do not suffer in reality what the Lord had, but we still participate to what He suffered and committed: what a wonderful and strange thing! We have resurrected, despite we haven't really died, neither have we been crucified in reality. Imitation is imagination, but the salvation is reality: Christ was really crucified, He was really buried, and He has really resurrected. He has given us all of these, despite the fact that we haven't participated to His passions except by imitation. How overwhelming His love for people is! Christ received spikes in His most clean hands and feet and He suffered, and He gives me as present, without me to suffer, without me to be hurt, the salvation, through participation to His pain. If I had been saved by my death, Christ wouldn't have been saved me – but I only participate to His pain; His pain will be extended in me spiritually, if I open myself to it by my will." (Stăniloae 1997: 29)

"Saint Gregory of Nazianzus founds the unrepeatability of the Baptism through the obligation of no longer committing sins, once we have received the power of avoiding the sin. Of course, here is not affirmed the definitive loss of the ones who later commit sins, but those sins do not definitively get them out of the Lord's mysterious body, namely out of the Church or out of the connection with Christ. The ones who commit sin they still remain in some connection with Christ, without being necessary to be baptized anew.

But the weakening of their connection with Christ is healed through the Mystery of the Repentance. It is something else in the case of the sin of denying Christ, and of getting out of His mysterious body. These ones are lost if they won't come back into the Church, by using the power they have received at Baptism. But, by no means are they baptized for the second time, for the Baptism's grace is not given twice. They aren't reborn twice, because they aren't born twice from their mother's womb, and for they do not come within world twice bearing the ancestral sin." (Stăniloae 1997: 32)

"Saint Maximos saw the purpose of the Holy Impartation in one's imposing upon the nature, in total mastering of the will decided towards good, insomuch than to make the will to rather renounce even to life, than to accept the sin's pleasures and compromises. Thus, through the Holy Impartation one continuously receives power for liberating his nature of the sin's weaknesses, by accepting and strengthening the mortification or the temperance." (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

"The appeal Christ addresses to the Christian since Baptism, it reaches his conscience through the Apostles' and through the Church's preaching, and it urges the Christian to answer Christ's calling in each life's circumstance. Christ's appeal is addressed to the Christian through the Christian's fellow humans who need his spiritual and material help on any moment. Through all the circumstances Christ is the One Who addresses us, and through all these callings and positive answers, the image of Christ and our personal image imprinted by the image of Christ it becomes increasingly clearer." (Stăniloae 1997: 36)

"The Baptism is also an act the family's spiritual life penetrates the children. When the family confess a certain belief, it is sure fact the children will confess that belief too. It is a matter of time for what has been seeded within children and which virtually is within them, to manifest later in an actual manner." (Stăniloae 1997: 41)

"The Baptism is also placed in connection with the death of Christ. This is for the first baptisms have been committed after the death and the resurrection of Christ. This was because only after that the Holy Ghost was fully irradiating out of Christ's body, and that allowed the baptized ones to be fully united with Christ into the Ghost. By the fact that we are given the Baptism while we live in the material universe, for a life as person into Christ, we are firstly given the power to live our life, while we are living in the material universe, as a sacrifice brought to the Father, together with Christ, and out of the power of the Ghost of Christ, as Christ lived His life after His birth as man. By this, the godlike image within man it is restored in the fulness of his rational soul united with the Holy Ghost, after the human being estranged from God has died, and after was born the cleaned of sin human being, like Christ. Christ hadn't had to die spiritually at His Baptism, in order to live a clean life, for He has been, ever since His birth, a new man. The human being must spiritually die at his baptism, in order him to begin, with Christ and out of Christ, a new life. But the human being takes the power to spiritually die, out of Christ's death on cross, that has another meaning. Thus, the human being unites within himself, with Christ's death of cross and with His birth, in order to live with Christ His life after His birth. The Baptism is an act which the Word created the human being through. Christ was baptized before His death on the cross, in order to introduce the Holy Ghost within waters, Whom Christ will again create the human beings through. But he has given the baptism also the power of His death on the cross, the power which the former human being dies through, towards the life of the new human being. About our birth with Christ in Baptism, spoke in the Fourth Century, Theophanous of Nicaea, implying in this birth the renunciation to the life from before, as, to some extent, Christ renounced on the cross, to that life, bearer of the effects from after the ancestral sin. The human being isn't killed, but he willingly dies, as also he isn't reborn unwillingly." (Stăniloae 1995: 176)

"The Baptism is the Pentecost of each man who enters the Church and through Baptism each man can start a new road for he has become a "new creature" in movement of continuous spiritual increasing." (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

"The Baptism places the receiver in intimate relation not only with Christ, but with the entire Holy Trinity, for Christ is the Son and He makes us too, within Himself, sons of the Father, setting us free of the slavery of the impersonal natural phenomena and from passions, which seek for satisfaction not in the supreme communion of the Trinity but in the individualistic and blind sensuality these natural forces exercise it, which leads us to death. And our love towards the Father - the One Who strengthens us with His power and with His endless love - it is warmed up by the Ghost Who brings the love of the Father towards the Son and of the Son towards the Father in our hearts united with the Son. That's why we are baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, namely we are sunk in the reciprocal love and in the common power of the three supreme Persons." (Stăniloae 1997: 40)

"The Baptism's act consists of sinking the receiver of the Baptism for three times in water, accompanied by the ascertaining declaration of the priest: It is being baptized the servant of God (first name) in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The character of declaration and of faithful ascertainment of the words is being Baptized, or of the analogue words from the other Mysteries (is being Married, is being Imparted), it shows, on one hand that the Mystery is officiated through the priest's visible act and through his word, but on the other hand it is officiated by the work of Christ. Except the case of the emergency Baptism, the water receives the sanctification through the Ghost even before sinking the Baptism's receiver in it. But the Mystery as a whole, containing the full work of the Ghost as well, it is done through the threefold sinking of the one who is baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity. In the previous prayer of sanctifying the water it is asked for the coming of the Ghost, in order to clean the water of the work of the demonic powers, on the purpose that water to be prepared for the Ghost's full descent when is being baptized the one who is being sunk in it." (Stăniloae 1997: 26)

"The child, by impropriating his family's spiritual content, he impropriates the family's belief that is being imprinted within him, or that is determinant to him. He receives that belief with thirst and he manifests it voluntarily and joyfully. He is happy to show that he is like the grownups of his family are, and that he can manifest himself with them. He can thus be baptized for the family's faith which he has impropriated doubtlessly." (Stăniloae 1997: 41-42)

"The circumcision, which was the way of Baptism, it was being done at eight days after birth, to all the male children, during the Old Testament, on the basis of the revelation of the same God Who was accomplishing in stages the plan of the salvation. The Lord Himself was circumcised on the eight day and at forty days from His birth He was brought to the temple and put forth before God (Lk. 2: 21-22), as model for all children. On that occasion, He was blessed by the righteous Simeon, who had the Holy Ghost upon him (Lk. 2: 25). The blessing is at its turn an impartation of the Ghost, to the one who is blessed. The argument for not baptizing the children should stop us also from blessing them, which it is absurd." (Stăniloae 1997: 43)

"The comprising obligation which the man assumes at Baptism it is expressed through the declaration of rejecting satan and all its things, as also through the declaration of uniting with Christ, and then by confessing the faith more specifically, by uttering the Creed. By this, the one who is Baptized commits himself not to serve any longer the purposes of satan within world, by doing evil deeds, but to sustain the faith in Christ and to live according to it, according to Christ's example." (Stăniloae 1997: 37)

"The content of this plan regarding us and the power at our disposal in Christ Who dwells within us through Baptism, they are actualized, they are discovered, they are assimilated in us in a gradual movement, in which we must actually use the power offered to us, which actualizes and increases our power gradually. That's why, concretely, we undertake an advancing, even though we do this in what it is virtually weakened within us." (Stăniloae 2006: 142)

“The continuation of the state of sacrifice from baptism it is shown in our virtues. But the power for virtues as continuous sacrifice, as the relentless renunciation to egotism and as living a life for God and for our fellow humans, it comes to us out of the power of state of sacrifice of Christ. Through virtues we offer ourselves continuously as sacrifice to God together with Christ. Saint Cyril of Alexandria said also that: Christ Himself is the holy sacrifice that spreads the good fragrance through virtues. But the virtues represent in the same time the development of the new life into Christ and our consummation according to His likeness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 31)

“The death-rebirth succession the man is submitted to, at Baptism, it is inverse to the birth-death succession of Christ, only while we understand our death as death towards the sin, as death of the former man. Our death in Baptism has this meaning as well. But our death in Baptism has another meaning too: it is our total surrender to God, in order us no longer live to ourselves, but in order to exclusively live to God. It is the total renunciation to us; it is the forgetfulness about ourselves in a total surrender to God. In this we have become with Christ a sole stalk into the resemblance of death (Rom. 6: 5). Through this death we sink ourselves into God, namely into the true life. This is for there is in God the true life. By dying to God, we enter the true life. One cannot notice the succession except in the fact that through intension we accept the death of a life which isn’t really a life, or it is life towards death. But while accomplishing this intention the life of God appears within us – the true life. The death of the former man, and the birth of the new man out of God, they are thus almost simultaneous. That’s why there is no distance in Baptism, between death and the beginning of the new life. By entering to God as sacrifice, together with Christ, the man is sanctified, namely he is filled up with the life of God, as Saint Cyril of Alexandria developed the theme by following the Epistle towards Hebrews. Through this death we sink beyond any will of being ourselves in a life that becomes exhausted; we sink beyond our creatural which is being gradually exhausted, in the death of the apophatic (untold) death, or in the life in God above any definite and limited life, in order to receive from there the power of immortal life, of the life in God and for God. Thus, it takes place within us what it happened to Christ as man.” (Stăniloae 1997: 28)

“The fact that the priest commits the Baptism as qualified representative of the Church, it makes possible that in case of emergency, being given the absolute necessity of the Baptism for salvation, when there is no priest present, let the Baptism be officiated by any layman who is member of the Church, as general representative of the Church, or as member of the general priesthood. This is for the Baptism means the stretched forwards arms of the Church receiving the ones who want to come within it, escaping the waves of the eternal perdition, and these arms can take a concrete form through any of the Church's limb." (Stăniloae 1997: 39-40)

"The Ghost unites Himself with the man in the Baptism's water not only for the water is the fundamental principle of the life on the creation's plan, but also for the water is the universal means for washing up, namely of bringing forth the true image of the defined existences, each of which having its own beauty." (Stăniloae 1997: 33)

"The Holy Ghost united Himself for Christ, again, at His Baptism, with the whole water and creation, intimately connected with Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 25)

"The image of Christ and our image imprinted by Christ become increasingly clearer through our answer given to the appeal of Christ addressed us in order us to imitate Christ in His deeds. But this appeal is done by Christ through the Apostles' and servants of the Church preaching, who present us the model of Christ (Gal. 3: 1). That's why Saint Apostle Paul said: "My sons, for whom I am experiencing again the travail in birth, until Christ will be formed in your souls!" (Gal. 4: 19). And Christ will be formed in them, by giving them in the same time their personal image of their life of responsibility, for "they no longer serve the nature" as "ones who do not know God", for they know God, "or better said they are known by God" (Gal. 4: 8-9), namely they are called by God, by their names, starting at Baptism and then during their whole life." (Stăniloae 1997: 35-36)

"The image of Christ is a truly luminous vestment; it is Christ Himself. As many of you have been baptized in Christ, you have been dressed up in Christ (Gal. 3: 26). This vestment doesn't remain only at surface as the usual clothes, but it is imprinted in the entire our being. It is Christ Himself, but in the same time it is a special, personal, unique relation of each person with Christ. That's why the man is given an own name, in order to know that when he is called on his name, he himself is the targeted one, entirely, and he must answer that calling with the whole his being. This vestment must not be defiled, because through this we defile the image of Christ and our personal image. The Baptism's vestment represents Christ, but it also represents ourselves as become in the image of Christ as persons, for in all our manifestations is shown not only the imprinted in us Christ, but one can see also ourselves as become in His image as persons." (Stăniloae 1997: 35)

"The introduction within Church of the one who receives the Baptism, it is signified especially by the fact that the Baptism is officiated by the priest, or by the bishops, who represents through his ordination not only Christ but also the Church. That's why the valid officiating of the Baptism does not depend of the personal worthiness of the priest if the Church keeps his as Its servant. This is for he celebrates the Mysteries in the name of the Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 39)

“The main effect of the Baptism is the birth to a new life on earth. That’s why, Christ works upon us in Baptism, mainly as the One Begotten and Who totally consecrated His life to God, through a death in sense of self-giving, which led Him to death in the sense of ceasing the earthly existence. In Christ are united His birth with His death, for within Him it is implied the sacrifice since His birth, like some icons of the Lord’s Nativity show us. That’s why in Baptism Christ live with us, in a united mode, His birth and crucifixion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 29)

“The man enters the calling-answering relation with God through Baptism. That’s why through Baptism the man is given his name; the man’s name expresses the relation which the man is place with God in, a relation which the man must honor and fulfill. The man is baptized on his name, and not as a general being: Is being baptized the servant of God (first name). Properly-said, for Christ elevates the man, through Baptism, to a new life, Himself brings the man to this superior, responsible life, by calling the man with His absolutely mandatory power, by founding with the baptized one a relation as from Person to person, namely a responsibility life at His calling. Through this the man is brought out from the indistinct human mass, out from the general anonymity, and the man becomes a person with own responsibilities, founded on the eternal responsibility in front of God. The man is born to this life with the will of Christ, but also with his own will, through answer which the man gives when he is called by his name, unlike in the case of the man’s birth according to the body. The man receives his name at Baptism, and this name makes the man conscious about his responsibility as person. This name gives the man his deep form as person, which is the image of Christ in him. The animal isn’t a person because the image of God isn’t in it. The man answers to God and he develops himself and he maintains himself in the responsible relation with God, through his quality as person. That’s why this unique form as person of each man, it is being imprinted increasingly more within the man, and in it is imprinted the form of Christ Himself. And this is being done by exercising the man’s responsibility to the calling of Christ, by answering increasingly affirmative to what Christ asks from him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 34)

“The man is reborn both out of the Holy Ghost and out of the cosmic matter, for the water represents this matter in liquid state, as reserve, as bosom of any organized existence form. The baptism has an historical importance. The Baptism means that the matter itself, brought back to its spiritual mobility, it becomes an environment of the creator, free, and always new in His acts, Ghost. The Baptism’s water is, in a secret manner, the matter of the future age, which will bear the Son within itself, as transparent Hypostasis, and the life-maker and always new energies of the Holy Ghost. But it is now pneumatized for the man's rebirth or for the restoration of the man's relation with God. It full pneumatization will be proven only in the age to come, for the consummation of the people's relation with God, when it will be shown the final state, the water created in the beginning would have reached, for the development of the people's relation with God." (Stăniloae 1997: 25-26)

"The man obtains the new life like an earnest and like a guarantee of the eternal life. If the man dies immediately after Baptism, he is going to the eternal life. But if the man lives after Baptism, he will have to develop the new life seeded within him at Baptism on the one hand, and through the other Holy Mysteries on the other hand, by his efforts. The new life given at Baptism, extended out of Christ, by the Ghost, it virtually has in it the supreme levels the man will reach in the eternal life. But the man is the one who has to effect their actualization through a continuous movement upwards." (Stăniloae 2006: 141-142)

"The man's consistency consists of the godlike image maintained within man through the irradiation of the divine model and through the man's effort of keeping himself in communion with God. Losing the godlike image by sin, of weakening the godlike image by sin, the man descends towards inconsistency and towards an imageless state. By becoming a non-unitary and impersonal chaos, the man no longer answers - with the whole his seriousness and being - the call which his name is uttered by. To him, the name no longer has a deep meaning, it does no longer mean the obligation to answer, the obligation of the responsibility in front of the supreme instance of God. Such a man distinguishes his name only in a shallow mode. To such a man his name is doesn't any longer mean self-awareness and own incumbent responsibility as such. Only when the man hears his own name called by God, he truly answers - only then the man takes his responsibility seriously; only then his name is distinctive forming principle; only then the man's name is a personalizing force in depth." (Stăniloae 1997: 34)

"The man's work after Baptism, it consists therefore in some kind of assimilation, in an imprinting of Christ's cleanness in his own being, so that that cleanness will no longer be possible to be removed from the man's being. That's why there are some degrees of impropriating the godlike powers and good things of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 33)

"The new life in Christ, received at Baptism, it is therefore the liberation from the chains of the ancestral sin. And this freedom gives the baptized one the power of no longer committing sins and of using this power more easily.

But putting this power in practice it is a duty of the baptized one. In this sense, the baptism's bath has cleaned our previous sins, but not also the sins we will commit after Baptism, though we have been given the power of more easily cleaning those sins." (Stăniloae 1997: 32-33)

"The new life is a gift from above, which comes to us through Baptism, but this gift must be preserved and developed through our endeavor. You painstakingly cultivate the cleanness, by putting it in the heart of the ascension, and keep with your endeavor the forgiveness you have received as a gift, for your forgiveness to be from God, and its guarding to be from you. The gift is a duty as well. The one who doesn't keep and who doesn't develop the cleanness he has received at Baptism, he becomes dwelling place for more demons than he had from before Baptism and with great difficulty will him be saved. That one who hasn't used the powers which he received at Baptism, by employing his powers too in an eased manner due to the power he has received at Baptism, he proves that out of some cynicism or out of some dullness he is no longer willing to employ his powers either. And these powers become totally paralyzed. You have touched the Christ's coat and the blood shedding has been stopped – keep, therefore, the cleanness, in order that blood shedding not to come again to you. Because you won't be able to touch Christ again, in order to steal the salvation. This is because Christ doesn't let Himself to be robbed for too many times, no matter how much he loves the people... You have been raised from your bed, or, better said, you have taken your bed by believing in benefaction; do not throw yourself again on your bed, by paralyzing your body through drowsiness and pleasures." (Stăniloae 1997: 32)

"The ones who are born out of Baptism, they receive the image of Christ, they being able to develop the personal character of their life through responsibility, by looking at Christ and by imitating Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 37)

"The personal image of the man is so depending on and it is so imprinted by the image of Christ, or, the answer given to Christ's appeal grows up so much out of the power of Christ's appeal, so that the baptized one, if he remains in this state and if he develops it, he will be able to say as Saint Paul did: "I crucified myself together with Christ and now I am no longer living, but Christ live in me (Gal. 3: 20). The man has renounced to living for himself, as Christ has also renounced to live a life which not to be consecrated to God and to each man who believes in Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 36)

"The possibility the children to be imparted with Christ, on the basis of the children's relatives, it is shown by the fact of some adults being imparted with the gifts of Christ through the faith of others (the resurrection of the daughter of Jair, the healing of the man with palsy from Capernaum etc.).

The contribution the relatives bring to their fellow humans' salvation it is so necessary that the man with palsy from the Bethesda well he couldn't rejoice the savior power of the water except through Christ, for that man hadn't anybody to bring him to the water well." (Stăniloae 1997: 42)

"The sin weakens our character as person, in what our person has as distinct, and the sin brings us closer to the inexpressive and impersonal animality – or unfree – submitted to the automatic movements of the same passions. The sin weakens the unity between the man's constitutive powers and it weakens even the man's being. The man's being becomes thus non-unitary and helpless in what regards the efforts for what is good. Our being is thus dragged towards the evil things, towards one or another passion, bringing the man closer to nothingness. Such a man's body performs all the biological functions, but the man himself is almost absent from within himself, namely he lives without recognizing Himself as person and without having a conscience. The man decays to a biological individual. By not having the ray from God towards God, the man becomes darkness, as one who is nothing. That man lives a non-substantial existence, an inconsistent existence which almost seems to be only an apparent existence, a dead life. Kabasilas spoke about people who seem to be dead though they haven't died yet. Because of the weakening of the godlike image within man, or of the man's relation with God it coincides to the man's weakening, there is no difference between the life-giver effect of the Baptism's water and the water's function of washing up or of restituting the image. By the restoration itself of the godlike image within man, the man received back the immortal godlike life." (Stăniloae 1997: 33-34)

"The Son of God, though born out of Virgin, as man without bearing the ancestral sin, though He received the Holy Ghost as cleaner and sanctifier ever since the beginning of His conceiving as man, he though was baptized with the water, and not for being cleaned of the ancestral sin and not for being renewed as human being, but in order Him – the clean and the new One – to sanctify the waters through the Holy Ghost, in order the ones baptized with water to take from His Holy Ghost, the power for a new life, a communicative life, like His. Besides that, He wanted to show us that He has truly made man, as us, and that He wanted to get our humanity too, rid of sin, as He escaped His humanity too. So, in His Baptism, He took attitude on our behalf, against our ancestral sin, in order to urge us too, to get baptized, by taking attitude against that sin. This attitude of His came to a peak in cleaning the ancestral sin, at His death on the cross. The Holy Ghost comes back, through Christ's Baptism, in His movement above waters, in order to give the human being again the power to be born as persons in connection with God-the Word, like at the beginning of the Creation He gave the water the power for generating, out of it, the specified human existences, but also to the earth, in order that out of earth, through the special work of God, to come to existence the first sinless human being. And we can even say that, if them the Ghost was moving firstly above waters, and then He breathed upon Adam too, now he is firstly given back to the Christ's humanity, and then he moves out of Christ's humanity, giving the waters back their quality as means for human beings' rebirth in their sinless state, a living and easily to communicate, and non-egotistical state, like Christ as man. This is for the Word out of Whom the Holy Ghost was moving above waters, He is now embodied Word. Through the Holy Ghost, the Word firstly recreated His humanity, united with Himself in a Hypostasis. It was necessary to take place this inversion or the order of the Ghost's descent. This is for the salvation starts now from the humanity of the Word made man. At Baptism, the Word was declared by the Father, as His Son, as representative of the humanity, being shown thus, that everybody is called to come to this quality, through the Holy Ghost Who came back upon waters, this time not out of the not-embodied Word, but out of the Word Who made Himself renewed man; by that, all human beings are elevated to the higher state as sons, through a second birth, this time a voluntary one, as the birth of the Son of God as man it was too. This is for He was baptized on our behalf, as our Representative, and not for Himself. He showed us what we must do too. He was baptized as the One Who has made Himself Son, as man, in order all the human beings to do the same, for making them sons too, by virtually giving them at His Baptism, through waters, His full Ghost, accomplishing the work as the Father deigned: "This is My beloved Son, into Whom I am well pleased" (Mt. 3: 17). Christ was baptized as our Savior, as the First Born amongst His brothers. He did that at the age of thirty, as a new mature man, and then He started His savior work." (Stăniloae 1995: 177-178)

"The virtues aren't only the full self-giving to God, but they are as well self-giving of the baptized ones to the ones who need their help: If you see a naked man, dress him up, honoring the vestment of his incorruptibility (of the Baptism, o. n.)." (Stăniloae 1997: 32)

"Through Baptism, namely by sinking the man in water in the name of the Holy Trinity, it takes place the death of the former man and the rebirth to the true life of Christ. Through this, the man is washed up of the ancestral sin and of all the sins he committed before and the image of Christ is imprinted within the man. By this, being the man united with Christ, he is introduced within Church. But all these effects are comprised one into another, or they are aspect of the one and the same comprising effect, so that one cannot speak about one effect without speaking about all the other effects. We must mention here also the fact that these effects have a dynamic character too." (Stăniloae 1997: 26)

“Through Baptism, the human being enters as person the way of a true human life, through the union with Christ into the Holy Ghost. This is a true and fully communicative becoming, as person, of the human being, by accepting, in common with other, the quality as son of the Father according to the grace, together with the Son of-one-being with the Father, as after Baptism the human being can say towards the Father: “Abba, Father”, by being strengthened by the Holy Ghost, as Ghost of the Son. The human being is born on the superior level as son of the Father, by totally exceeding the state of nature’s servant, more precisely of the nature fallen under the power of some inferior impulses and lacking the power of resisting the evil influences. Within human being, at Baptism, it comes to existence, the conscience as free son of God, totally superior to the fallen nature’s laws. This is brought by the Holy Ghost. “Where the Lord’s Ghost is, there the freedom is” (I Cor. 3: 17). “Therefore, stay strongly in the freedom which Christ has made us free into, and do not get tie yourselves again in the slavery’s yoke” (Gal. 5: 1). But in the strength of this freedom, the human being is also helped by the people from around him, if they too have united themselves, through Baptism, with the Ghost of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 175)

“Through the Mystery of the Baptism, each human being becomes member of the Church, through a first union with Christ; through the other Mysteries it is even more accentuated, or it is reestablished, the union of the Church’s members with Christ, the Church’s Head, being strengthened the Church’s unity, or it is granted to some persons the grace of officiating the Mysteries, of preaching the word and of preserving it unchanged, or the grace necessary to other responsibilities, to marriage, and to reestablishing the health. Being sensitive actions - instituted by Christ, through which is imparted the grace of Christ and through which Christ unites Himself with the person who believe for they to constitute and to maintain the Church – the Mysteries must be analyzed in these diverse aspects of theirs.” (Stăniloae 1997: 9)

“Through the Mystery of the Baptism, which has been instituted by our Savior, the man who believes in Christ, he is reborn out of water and Ghost, to the true life in Christ, and he becomes member of the Church. The Mystery is done through the threefold sinking in water of the ones who is being baptized, in the name of the Holy trinity. The officiant is the priest or the bishop; only in case of emergency, fearing the soon death of the one who follows to be baptized, this Mystery can be officiated for that person by any member of the Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 23)

“We are Baptized in Christ, for through the union with Him and with the strength received from people, us too, to defeat the consequences of the ancestral sin, after us being cleaned by sin in Baptism, but this doesn’t exclude our struggle to remain sinless while we are in the present material body.” (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

“We are offered some possibility of distinguishing between the human being’s decision for Baptism and the decision power given him by the Ghost before Baptism, by the fact that the Ghost calls upon the human being before Baptism, in order the human being to decide himself for Baptism, namely the Ghost gives the human being the awareness of being called, or the tension towards the full union with the Ghost in Baptism. The distinction between the calling felt by the human being as attraction exercised upon him by the Holy Ghost, manifested in his impulse for moving himself towards the full union with God in Baptism, and the decision for Baptism, it was shown by the Church during the first centuries, in the fact that the called ones weren’t allowed to attend the Holy Liturgy until its end. While the baptized Christians were all of them imparted, the called ones had to be baptized, in the first place. The human being was called towards Baptism. The called one feels himself as attracted towards God, but he also comes closer to God. God comes in the human being’s way as the Parent welcoming His lost son, in the parable from Gospel. We have to mention here that, if only a person can be called, that person cannot be called except by another person, and the union between them it lets them unconfounded. That’s why, at Baptism, the baptized one he receives his name forever, in the Kingdom of Heavens. On the basis of the preparation through calling, the baptized ones can say with assertiveness, when asked by the priest, that he rejects satan and that he unites himself with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 175-176)

“We are united, at our Baptism, with Christ Who has been birth a new man, a sinless man, out of Virgin, and Who wants to united Himself, in this state, with us, and for he defeated the death He gives us too, power from the total defeat upon death which He has brought it with His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1995: 178-179)

“We cannot receive the new and eternal life in Christ without Baptism, without dying us too in Baptism, in the likeness of His death. Only if we have become a sole stalk with Him in the likeness of His death, we will be partakers of His resurrection as well (Rom. 6: 5).” (Stăniloae 1997: 41)

“We do not die at baptism like Christ did at the end of His activity, but we are elevated to a life of cleanness and of good deeds, consecrated to God. That’s why neither we resurrect like He has resurrected after that death. The life we are elevated to, out of Baptism, it is only a road to resurrection. Our birth out of Baptism imagines the beginning of the life to be. Achieving new limbs and feelings, it constitutes a preparation for the life expecting us. But we cannot prepare ourselves for the future life except by gaining, here on earth, the life of Christ Who has been made Himself “Parent of the age to come” (Isa. 9: 6).” (Stăniloae 1997: 29)

“When the Gospel penetrated for the first time within world, it must gain the adults in order them to be urged to accept to be baptized. That’s why in the New Testament they speak about the adults’ baptism. But in the same time with the adults there were baptized also the children. The wide expressions: he was baptized (the prison guard from Philippi) and all his family (Acts 16: 36) they surely comprise the children too. Likewise: we baptized then house of Stephanie (1 Cor. 1: 16). Saint Irenaeus declared, on the basis of the Apostolic tradition he experienced in a time nigh to him (he was spiritual nephew of Apostle John), that also the children were baptized (paivuli, infantes).” (Stăniloae 1997: 42)

“Without the man working out of the power he has received in Mysteries, those mysteries end to be reckoned as some magic means, giving the man the right of entering the Kingdom of Heavens for the simple reason that those Mysteries have been officiated upon him as upon an object, without the man using their power in his own effort of transforming and consummating himself – in such a case the Mysteries are reckoned as savior without the man really transform himself, with their help, in the image of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 33)

Holy Chrismation

“According to the example of the Lord Himself, when exiting the Baptism’s water, we too have Christ within us, but not shown yet at our surface, and consequently the Ghost of Christ descends or irradiated out of Christ within us as well, in order to show us too, as sons of God, but us too, in order us to confirm this quality through our activity after Baptism, being helped by the Ghost, like Jesus did after Baptism. With the help of the Ghost, we start in the same time activating our quality of teachers-prophets of the Kingdom of God, of priests bringing ourselves and the nature as sacrifice to God, of emperors reigning over our nature and over the world, in order us to no longer be mastered by them towards a passionate and unfree use of our nature’s powers. If since the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Christ the heavens are open upon the second Adam, and they have remained open ever since – or they have been fully opened as they weren’t not even to Adam before his falling, through the Anointing with the Holy Chrism full of Holy Ghost, to each human person the heavens will be shown as open, for that person is united with Christ. This is for there is no longer a border between the live of the creature united with Christ and the heavenly order of the Ghost. Like the Father recognized His Son, after His embodiment, also a man, as His Son in a shown manner, through the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Christ, likewise the Father recognizes us as well, the ones who have united themselves with Christ in Baptism, by giving us this quality through the anointing with the Holy Ghost, and with the help to shows us as such in fact. Having us too, the heavens open by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon us, the heavens open too, or the mysteries of the life to come, endless, superior to the nature's laws, in an unveiling which is gradually actualized to us, which we will be fully imparted with in the life to come, all of us can prophesy the full coming of that life, all of us can interpret the experience of its earnest, like the Apostles prophesied on Pentecost; we can show ourselves, by the new life which we live, even in our being, as prophets of the life to come. Since Christ and His receiving of the Ghost it has been shown to the people that the limited life in the frames of the nature and of the present time, which ends in death, it isn't everything, but in it, it has burst up the light and the power of the future and eternal life in Christ, it has started the showing of the end of this eon. All these things were said by Saint Peter on the day of the descent of the Holy Ghost: This (what you are seeing) it is what was said through Joel the Prophet: And during the last days, says the Lord, I will pour My Ghost upon each body and your sons and your daughter will prophesy, your children will have visions, and your elders will have dreams. And over My servants and over My maids, I will pour, during those days, out of My Ghost and they will prophesy (Acts 2: 17-18)." (Stăniloae 1997: 47-48)

"Being in tight connection with the Mystery of the Baptism, the Mystery of the Chrismation is not to be repeated." (Stăniloae 1997: 54)

"Christ was anointed with the full Ghost, and this anointing He announced it and interpreted it Himself, by applying to Himself of a place from Isaiah (Isa. 61: 1), by saying about Himself that he was sent to His activity in the service of God and in the favor of the people: "The Holy Ghost is upon Me, for He has anointed Me, sending Me to preach to the poor ones, to announce to the enslaved ones the liberation and to the blind ones the sight, to liberate the oppressed ones and to herald the year of the mercy of the Lord" (Lk. 4: 18-19)." (Stăniloae 1997: 46)

"Consequently, to Christ's dwelling, at Baptism, in the one who believe, they are imparted with the anointing with His Ghost, on the same purpose of being them strengthened in the new life, of being them sealed in this new life. Saint Apostle Paul too, he bore witness that this it has been done ever since the beginning of the Church, for he said: And the One Who strengthens us together with you, into Christ, and the One Who has anointed us into God, is that One Who has sealed us too, and Who has given us the earnest of the Ghost within our hearts (2 Cor. 1: 21). Saint Apostle Paul's witness stays next to that one of Saint Apostle Paul: "Let everyone of you to be baptized and you will receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (Acts 2: 38) and next to that one from the Acts of the Apostles, where they say that the Apostles Peter and John, being sent by all the Apostles from Jerusalem, they went and laid their hands upon Philip the deacon: “and they have taken Holy Ghost” (Acts 8: 15-17). The Lord’s example and the Apostles’ practice can be reckoned as a sufficient proof for instituting this Mystery by the Lord Himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 47)

“For within each soul’s and spiritual limb, the Ghost produces an effect or He imprints an increased power that fits that limb, and some persons are more active through certain limbs than through others – some of them through understanding, other through feeling, other through a certain kind of activity -, the Ghost produces a special gift in each man on the measure of the stronger strengthening of a certain of its limbs, producing a different gift in each member of the Church. But this implies also a strengthening of all the limbs. That’s why is uttered at the anointing of each limb the phase: “The seal of the Holy Ghost”. This is for besides that, in all the special gifts there is active the Holy Ghost together with the whole man, who is more active especially through than limb. Thus, in the diverse gifts of the Ghost, on one hand it is put in work the one grace of the Baptism, and on the other hand, it is developed out of it some gift or some gifts in a more special manner, according to the natural dispositions of the believer. The gifts are diverse, and the Ghost is the Same. And there are diverse ministrations, but there is the Same Lord... And the Ghost gives to each man, in His showing, a gift to be for the benefit of everybody... Rightly, all of us in a Ghost we have been baptized, in order to be a sole body... But the body isn’t a sole limb either, but several (I Cor. 12: 4-7; 13-14; Rom. 12: 4-6). Thus, the difference of gifts isn’t to be used in an evil sense, for dividing the believers, for the pride of some of them before other or in order to take other in submission, but for the reciprocal completion, for strengthening the Church as unitary body of the Lord. As much as others need my gift, as much I need their gifts too. The difference in gifts must be the ground for reciprocal cherishing and love amongst believers, for the striving of each one for knowing what each of the others has unique, for his responsibility to others.” (Stăniloae 1997: 52-53)

“Generally, the Holy Ghost received in the Mystery of the Anointing, He is the communication bridge in love, between us and the Father, an eternally new and increased communication. This means the open heavens and the quality of sons which He communicates to us. By this, the Father gives us the possibility as the filial sensitiveness, of increasingly greater delicacy towards the Father, as also that one of brotherhood in God with our fellow humans. The Ghost Who is the bearer of the parental love of the Father towards the Son, become the bearer of the same love between the Father and Christ as man too, the Father become also to us, in Christ, the bearer of the same love and sensitiveness, on one hand a fiery one, and on the other hand a delicate one. Only by this He sets in continuous movement of ascension the powers he received in Baptism in order to fulfill the will of the Father, by making us alive and by will, and in order to imprint by will the image of the Son increasingly deeper in our total being, by loving as He does, the Father, and by us obeying the Father like Him. In this sense, the Ghost we have received in this Mystery He sanctifies us. By this the man's image as person it becomes increasingly clearer, more luminous, by getting out from the nature's general mist or from the simple virtuality. This is for the Holy Ghost is the Ghost of the power." (Stăniloae 1997: 48)

"In the prayer from before the Mystery of the Chrismation, the priest asks that the one who is going to be anointed "to be pleasant to God in all his things and words, and his soul to be guarded into cleanness and righteousness". The laymen don't have access to committing the means of the grace; but their sphere is the grace's life, its penetration within world. This is the "cosmic Liturgy" within world, operating through the simple presence of the "sanctified persons", of the "dwelling places of the Holy Trinity", as the ones following to be anointed are called, in the prayer of sanctifying the chrism, which is done by the bishops." (Stăniloae 1997: 108)

Chrismation "In the role the Orthodox Church grants the episcopate with, as body in this Mystery, it is shown the fact that the Holy Ghost Who communicates Himself to each believer, it is the Ghost of the entire Church and each believer is introduced in the entire Church, for through his special gift to enrich and to help the Church in totality, like the Church in totality sustains and promotes his special gift. Only in the total unity of the Church each believer can be saved and consummated. Only in it the believer can activate in the totality of his power strengthened by the Holy Ghost, even if some of these powers are more accentuated in some believers, and other powers are more accentuated in other believers. In officiating this Mystery it becomes more obvious than at Baptism, the presence of the entire Church and Its contribution to strengthening each member of the Church in the Holy Ghost, for the one who receives the Holy Ghost through this Mystery, he manifests more effectively his contribution to the life of the total Church, by actualizing in deeds the new life received at Baptism, and the Church contributes at its turn, more effectively, to actualizing and developing through deeds, that one's new life. This is because the man cannot effectively work in the absence of an environment him to work within, and which to encourage the man and to help him doing that, himself benefitting of the each one's work. Thus, by the fact that the Holy Ghost imparted through this Mystery helps the man in developing some special gifts, the Ghost promotes the distinctive character of that man as person. But, by the fact that He is the Ghost of the entire Church, it is shown the fact that a person cannot develop as person except in the churchly community, with the help of the Church and working in the Church's favor." (Stăniloae 1997: 54)

“Saint Apostle John spoke about the Ghost’s persistence within us, accentuating amongst the effects this persistence has especially the knowledge, of course knowledge by experience and bearing in it the urge towards activity in order to make it know to others too. If at Baptism it dwells within us in a hidden manner, and we don’t realize it, through Chrismation we will take the power towards deeds, and these deeds make us feel the presence of Christ and allows us even to show Christ within ourselves; or, the deeds themselves which the Ghost urges us to and he helps us to do them, they imply in themselves a conscience of the presence of Christ within us: And you have anointment from the Holy One (Who is the Ghost, o. n.) and you know everything (I Jn. 2: 20); and: Regarding you, the anointing you have taken from Him, it remains within you and you need not somebody to teach you, and like His anointing teaches you about everything and this teaching is true and it isn’t liar, you remain into Him, like I have taught you (I Jn. 2: 27). The reassurance that Saint John gave to Christians by these words, that they need not to be taught by somebody else, it doesn’t mean founding the individualistic conceitedness, but it means only a reassurance that the Christians do not need to be taught regarding to the spiritual aspects by the ones who are outside the Ghost of Christ. This is for within Church everybody communicates their experiences of living into the Holy Ghost, and they are verified in the light of the Church’s teaching that has been preserved from always in its unity, but especially through the preaching and through the ministration of the hierarchy and of the ministering priesthood. The activity for Christ, the power for which is given us by the Mystery of the Chrismation, it means exercising a general priesthood (...). That’s why the Christian is anointed like Christ has been too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 50-51)

“Saint Cyril of Alexandria saw this good fragrance which the Christians, by being into Christ, they spread it, or which Christ Himself spreads it out of Christians through the Ghost, as tied to the Christians’ state of sacrifice in Christ. But the state of sacrifice is the former man’s state of death – of the sin’s man -, and it is the state of living with Christ in cleanness and in loving doing. The Ghost activates within Christian the state seeded within him by Christ, the One Who dwells within man through Baptism. “Christ Who didn’t commit sin, according to the Scriptures” (I Pt. 2: 22), He brings Himself for the Church, as scent of good fragrance, to God and the Father. That’s why Christ said: “For them I am sanctifying Me” (Jn. 17: 19). Christ said “I am sanctifying Me” instead of saying: “I bring Myself and I surrender Myself as righteous offering to God and the Father”. This is for it is said that he surrenders Himself to God”. Christ Himself is the holy sacrifice Who spreads the good fragrance through virtues... And Himself sanctifies, by anointing through the Holy Ghost, the ones who have entered the communion with him. And according to the likeness to Him, we as well are sanctified sacrifices, as ones who have dies to the sin, for the sin has been killed within us and we are living to God the life in holiness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 50)

“The Anointing with Chrism it was reckoned in the Old Testament too, as the means of communication of a godlike power to the prophets, to the priests, and to the kings, in order to keep the people in the covenant with God. Christ is the Anointed by excellence, for He as man hasn’t received only a power of the Ghost, but he has received the whole Hypostatical Ghost, in order to be the Prophet, the Hierarch, and the supreme Emperor Who introduces and keeps the people of God in the familiarity of God, as being composed of His sons in Christ the Son, and in order to lead the people of God to the full life in the Ghost of the love of God and in the love for God, in the eternal life. Saint Cyril of Jerusalem said that after Jesus was baptized with water and exited the water: the Holy Ghost descended hypostatically upon Him, the alike One resting upon the alike One.” (Stăniloae 1997: 46)

“It belongs to the seen act of this Mystery: the Chrism, the anointing with it and the words: The Seal of the Holy Ghost. The chrism which the baptized one is anointed with, it is a fluidity that soaks and persists more than the water does, in the being of the baptized one, and it lends him the fragrance.” (Stăniloae 1997: 49)

“The baptized one is anointed on his hands and on his legs, in order to be always ready to commit the good and to run to help the ones who are in need, towards accomplishing the appeals God makes to him for committing the good and for avoiding the evil.” (Stăniloae 1997: 52)

“The connection of the Anointment to Baptism it is shown also in the fact that in the prayer the priest utters on this occasion, after he asked also for the seal of the Holy Ghost to be given to the newly enlightened through water and Ghost, whom God deigned to born him again, the priest continues: “Guard him into Your holiness, strengthen him in the right faith, save him from the evil and from all that one’s craftsmanship, and guard his soul into the savior fear of You, in cleanness and righteousness for, in every pleasant to You thing and word, he to become son and inheritor of Your heavenly Kingdom”. It is being asked so, that the one who has been reborn through Baptism, to be guarded and strengthened in the gifts he has received through Baptism, in the struggle against the evil one who will try to deprive the baptized one of these gifts, in keeping the promise he has made for keeping the faith he has confessed at Baptism and the state of cleanness and of righteousness he has been placed in.” (Stăniloae 1997: 44)

“The fact that through the Mystery of the Anointing with the Holy Chrism it is inaugurating to the Christians a continuous and always increased co-

working of the Holy Ghost with them, in order of developing the new life received at Baptism, so that the Christians devoted to Christ they live a continuous Pentecost, a continuous impartation with His Ghost, we can see it in the Acts of the Apostles, where the community from Jerusalem, after thanking God for He anointed His Son Jesus, they ask God for to give them power to preach the word with the whole daring. Consequently, while they were still praying, all of them were filled up with the Holy Ghost and they were heralding daringly the word of God (Acts 4: 27, 31).” (Stăniloae 1997: 48)

“The good fragrance spread around by the man soaked by Chrism, it shows that the Ghost makes the man to fill up everything that is around him, with the fragrance of his clean life and of his doing which is full of the kindness and of the gentleness instilled by the Ghost, imagined as a dove. His fragrance fills the Church up and it is being spread amongst the human community from within Church. The Ghost manifests through man His gentle, delicate, and innocent force of good’s expansion, the force of unifying the people in good, a force which the Ghost assimilates it from Christ in Who the Ghost is within, and Christ Who has consummated the humanity in the supreme stage.” (Stăniloae 1997: 49-50)

“The human being is imparted with a new transcendence - in his quality as person take out from under the nature’s forces – through the Mystery of the Chrismation, that is a strengthening of the human being in the state of adoption by God, or as new man; a strengthening in the new life into Christ, and in the conscience of mastery upon nature’s forces; which this Mystery awakens him daily; this is a strengthening in the valiant fight against the enslaving addictions. Now the Ghost is more firmly imprinted within all the human being’s limbs, as an difficult to be distinguished chrism, that melts the egotistic rigidity, being imprinted as a seal on all the bodily limbs which the soul works through, which the Holy Ghost has started dwelling within, giving the human being the luminous countenance of the love for the Father, together with the Holy Ghost and with the other brothers into Christ, and the courage to say, out of the power of the Ghost Who is within the human being, together with Christ: “Abba Father”.” (Stăniloae 1995: 204)

“The intimate soaking means the assimilation of the state of birth of the new man, the persistence means that the Holy Ghost remains in a continuous communion with the baptized one, and the fragrance lent to the baptized one it means that the Ghost becomes so intimate to him than His work and quality become work and quality characteristic to the man. But no one of these is accomplished without the man’s persevering endeavor, helped by the Ghost he has received. Then, by soaking the Chrism into the body, the body is being mellowed, it is losing its rigidity, it allows to be penetrated by God, so that the man and the Ghost become a sole source of the fragrance of the new life and therefore of this life itself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 49)

“The Mystery of the Chrismation is so tightly connected to the Mystery of the Baptism, so that one could say that they form together a sole whole with two distinct parts. The Mystery of the Chrismation is like a continuation of the Baptism. That’s why it doesn’t start in the religious service with a special introduction, as all the other Holy Mysteries, but, after baptizing and dressing up the one who has received the Baptism, the priest reads in continuation a prayer through which God is asked to give as a gift, to the one newly enlightened through water and Ghost, also the seal of the gift of the Holy and Almighty Ghost. Then the priest anoints his main body parts with chrism, saying: The seal of the Holy Ghost. The tight connection between this Mystery and that one of the Baptism it is shown also by the fact that, after the Anointing with the Holy Chrism, the priest goes around the analogue, for three times, with the one who has been baptized and anointed, singing: How many in Christ you have been baptized, in Christ you have been dressed up too. Halleluiah. The same thing is shown by the fact that the priest, by anointing the baptized one with the Holy Chrism and by saying the words: The Seal of the Holy Ghost, he doesn’t mention the name of the anointed one, like in all the other Mysteries, being reckoned that the name was uttered at that one’s sinking in water.” (Stăniloae 1997: 43-44)

“The New Testament presents the Chrismation and the fragrance of the Ghost as consistent states and full of the fiery dynamism of the effort towards innocence and towards generosity, in Christians. Through them are shown as persistent and dynamic the effects themselves of the Baptism. About the full of irradiant power permanence, of the work of the Holy Ghost within Christians, Saint Apostle Paul said: “Give thanks, therefore, to God the Holy Ghost, to the One Who makes us always victorious in Christ and, through us, he spreads all over the places the good fragrance of His knowledge, for we are to God the good fragrance of Christ, both amongst the ones who are saved and amongst the ones who perish” (II Cor. 1: 14-15).” (Stăniloae 1997: 50)

“The signification of the Mystery of the Chrismation of the baptized one for developing the new life in a co-working with the holy Ghost, it finds its expression especially in the fact that the baptized one is anointed with the Holy Chrism on all his main body limbs, amongst which are counted the senses’ organs. Through these limbs the man connects himself to the world, and through the world the man connects himself to God. Through these limbs the man received the world’s things, but he also sees God through the world and he exercises his action upon world out of this seeing of God, in order the man to make the world more conform to the will of God. (...) One can specify that the Ghost is imprinted through this in the man's mind and it opens to the man the unlimited horizons of the light and of the good, in order the man to know and to cogitate only the good things, in order to fight the evil thoughts, which limit him and in order to easily penetrate the endless mysteries of the knowledge and of the love of God. You have been anointed on your ears, in order to achieve ears able to hear the godlike mysteries; about such ears (...) the Lord says in the Gospel: "The one, who has ears to hear, let him hear" (Mt. 11: 15). The Ghost is imprinted in ears like a power of hearing and noticing the deepest spiritual meanings of the words, in order the ears not to tarry on ugly words or on the lacking depth and cleanness meanings of the words, but to open themselves only to the clean words and to notice only what is clean and deep in the words, for thus to be penetrated by any urge to good things they hear. The baptized one is then anointed on his nostrils, in order these ones not to open themselves to the tempting towards evil smells. After that, the baptized one is anointed on his chest, in order to be able to stand against the devil's plots, after he has put on the breastplate of the righteousness, namely of the virtues which represent as many manly habits in good (Ephes. 6: 11, 14). This is for like Christ, after Baptism and after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Him, he went into wilderness and he fought the enemy, likewise you too, after you have been baptized and you have been anointed with the Holy Chrism, dressed up in all the weapons of the Holy Ghost, let you stand against the enemy power and defeat it by saying: I can do everything in Christ Who strengthens me (Phil. 4: 13). In chest is the power and there is the heart too, with its feelings. The Ghost is imprinted on them to make them clean, generous, sensitive, loving of God and of fellow humans, full of joy, stranger to sadness, to envy, and to enmity." (Stăniloae 1997: 51-52)

"This similarity between the life the Anointment gives it to us and the good activity we are to undertake, or the general priesthood, it was expressed by Saint Cyril of Alexandria, who said: "By washing Aaron up with water, he dresses him up in the holy clothing of the hierarchal ministration" (Exod. 29: 1-9). Likewise, us too, after we have been washed up in Baptism and we have rejected all sort of uncleanness, we have been enriched with the grace from above and from heavens, by receiving the vestment of the gladness, according to the word: "Dress yourself up in our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 13: 14) ... In the same way were the priests sanctified, by being washed up with water and anointed with oil, and then they were dressed up with sanctified clothing and their hands were sanctified in order to be worthy of bringing the sacrifices in a clean and righteous manner. But before that, their heads were anointed, according to the word: "you have fattened my head up, with oil" (Ps. 22: 5)¹⁶⁵. Likewise, we have been fattened up to our ¹⁶⁵ In KJB we have the Psalm 23: 5: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over."; the literal translation in English language of the verse form Ps. 22: 5 from ROB is: "You have prepared table before me, against the ones who are troubling me; You have mind, by being given the gifting of the Ghost... and we have been sanctified and adorned with the grace from above and we have been anointed towards the godlike consummation, in order – by daring – to bring to God the spiritual gift with clean and all-innocent hands.” (Stăniloae 1997: 44-45)

“Through Chrismation, the Holy Ghost penetrates in and he imprints Himself on these limbs and organs and in the soul’s powers, standing at their basis and it persists in them like a good fragrance, as the Christ does. The Holy Ghost is imprinted like a seal not only on the exterior of these limbs, but also within them, giving the man a unitary spiritual countenance. Thus, the word “seal” has, besides the meaning of strengthening, that one of imprinting too. Actually, in this case the two mentioned words are in a relation with each other. The Ghost strengthens for He imprints Himself and he accentuates within man a characteristic image as person, which is in the same time a spiritual image as well. The man is being strengthened through his spiritualization, as person manifesting a firmness in the good things, which is had to be changed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 52)

“Through the Mystery of the Anointment with the Christ, the one who has been united with the Church in Christ, he becomes out of one who was somehow united with the Church, one who is actually united with the Church. It is a new step in strengthening the unity of the Church of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 45)

“Witness about the Christ’s anointing with the Ghost, towards His ministration and activity, it bore the community from Jerusalem (Acts 4: 27) and the Apostle Peter, who shows to Cornelius, amongst other things, in his word about Jesus, how Jesus was anointed by God with the Holy Ghost and with power, how He went from place to place doing good deeds and healing all the ones who were being oppressed by the devil (Acts 10: 38).” (Stăniloae 1997: 46-47)

Confession of Sins

“About His ascent to heavens, given the fact that He was following to no longer granting the forgiveness of the sin in a visible manner, Christ gives His disciples the power of granting this forgiveness. He gives them his power by conveying it to them through His Holy Ghost. This power is actually His power, working within them. That’s why the forgiveness granted by His anointed my head with oil and Your glass is being watering me like a strong one.”

disciples and by their descendants, it is actually granted by Christ Himself, namely it is a forgiveness granted in heavens. "And saying these, he breathed upon them and said them: "Take Holy Ghost, whom you will forgive their sins, forgiven will their sins be; and who you will keep their sins, kept their sins will be"" (Jn. 20: 22-23). This is a power which Christ promised His disciples from before: "Verily I am speaking to you: how many you will tie on earth, they will be tied in heavens too, and how many you will be untied on earth, they will be untied in heavens too" (Mt. 18: 18)." (Stăniloae 1997: 83)

"On the practicing of the Mystery of the Confession, ever since the beginning of the Church, in all the Mystery's three components (namely the confession of the sins before priests, the repentance for the sins, and the forgiveness granted by the priest) there are many witnesses." (Stăniloae 84-85)

"Although through the Mystery of the Confession are forgiven all the sins, being received to the Holy Impartation can be postponed in the case of grave sins, where the spiritual guide cannot see a repentance on the measure of the gravity of those sins: in such cases the Impartation will be postponed until the penitent will have shown through deeds his repentance and his attempts to heal the weaknesses caused by his sins, because these weaknesses are the cause of repeating those sins. The obligation not to commit any longer the heavy sins confessed, it must be proven through attitudes and deeds contrary to those sins, even consisting in some reparations. The priest asks for these on the basis of the Lord's words, for He declared that it is not sufficient that somebody promises to God that he will henceforth live his life as a gift consecrated to God, but, after that one makes this promise, let him go and reconcile with his claimant (Mt. 5: 23-25)." (Stăniloae 1997: 92)

"Christ showed the possibility of manifesting His power through other persons while He was still on earth, by healing persons at distance, through other persons who were in unmediated relation with Him (Mt. 15: 28). But the special and the permanent power of forgiving the sins Christ gave it to His disciples and to their descendants, and not to all the people who reached in contact with Him; and Christ gave this power through an objectively verifiable act, in order to be shown the fact that they do not make themselves masters, by their own will, upon the power of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 83)

"During the Confession the penitent surpasses the sin or the sin's power, in a certain degree, just because of this communion between two responsibilities which penetrates each other. The sinner the penitent is, the more the priest vibrates of a greater responsibility for regaining the penitent's soul, of a greater compassion for the penitent, and of a more acute living of his duty to determine the penitent to come back on the salvation road. And this awakens a greater responsibility for the sins, to the penitent too. The presence of Christ between them two, it is suggested by the fact that the priest listens to the penitent's confession in the front of an icon representing Christ, or he says to the penitent after the introductory prayers: "Behold, son, Christ is here, unseen, receiving your humble confession. Therefore, do not get ashamed, neither be afraid, nor hide to me anything of what you have done, but tell me all those things without doubting yourself and without shying, in order to get forgiveness from our Lord Jesus Christ.". The priest asks the penitent for full sincerity, for the confession is not being done before the man, who can be lied to, or in front of whom the confession can be reckoned as humiliation unworthy of the human dignity, but the confession is done rather in front of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 89)

"In report with the Church, the persons objectively chosen for exercising the power of forgiving the sins, on one hand, they receive this power from Christ, and on the other hand, they receive this power through an act committed by the Church and guaranteed by the Church, namely by another person chosen through an act of the Church through an act committed by the Church, through a prayer and a rule of the Church, therefore through a person guaranteed by the churchly community in communion with all the other churchly communities. Choosing such a person is therefore an act of the Holy Ghost, but it also is an act of the Church; or, it is an act of the Ghost working through a visible act committed within Church, or by the Church. The acts committed by the consecrated person have the quality as acts of Christ, by the fact that these acts have the guarantee of the Church. The Church in its quality as body of Christ, full of Christ, it is the visible environment within which and through which Christ chooses some persons whom He invests with His power, in order to exercise Himself, through these persons, His power." (Stăniloae 1997: 84)

"In the Mystery of the Confession there is no other matter/substance than the hand and the priest's epitrachelion placed on the penitent's head, as sign of the fact that the priest is the envoy of Christ and of the Church, and as sign of the responsibility he bears on his shoulders. Through the priest's body and liturgical vestment, the grace of Christ comes upon the penitent, as it was flowing through the Lord's body and vestments into the ones who faithfully asked Him for help. Actually, in the other Holy Mysteries as well, the grace comes in the receiver's being through the priest's hand too." (Stăniloae 1997: 95)

"In the Mystery of the Confession, the penitent doesn't make only a general confession of faith and he doesn't commit himself to a new life in Christ, but he also unveils the intimacies of his soul in what they have helpless for resisting the sins firmly; the penitent unveils the weaknesses which has driven him into sins and which has been developed consequently to the sins. And the priest is required to know these weaknesses which stay at the basis of the sins known by people and of the unknown sins, as he is required to know these sins too. The penitent, by doing this, he manifests his trust in the priest as in no other man, and he expects from the priest advice, help, and absolution. That's why the priest must pay attention to the penitent's confession, to really enter the soul of the one who opens himself to him, in order to be able to give him advice and to help him, according to the weaknesses which the penitent has confessed. The priest is required, in addition to his authority as seen representative of God, in addition to a appreciable moral authority, also a good knowledge of the mode the diverse human weaknesses can be cured in." (Stăniloae 1997: 87)

"In the Mystery of the Confession, the priest must help and guide the penitent, through the questions he asks the penitent, to go in his confession towards the essential things, and not to deviate, intentionally or due to his nescience regarding the important things, in a unessential sentimental much-speaking, through which he tries to cover the graver sins and weaknesses, and then he lives uncured or without the necessary recommendations for his healing. The man, who is disposed to superficially diminish his weaknesses, or to exaggerate his weaknesses due to his very scrupulous conscience, he cannot help himself in healing his weaknesses. He neither can be helped by average people. Some of his friends can slight his weaknesses, while others can exaggerate them even more, for they care too much for him. Not even the ones who have a rich psychological or psychiatric knowledge can help him like a priest does, for the man needs also to trust the godlike help in order to undertake all the efforts of his conscience in order to get healed." (Stăniloae 1997: 87)

"Often the contemporary man is ashamed of divulging his sins, or he reckons as bellow his dignity to do this act of humiliation in front of a priest. But, on the other hand, the modern man feels as well the need of unloading his conscience in front of somebody, and on the other hand, he realizes the fact that the priest inspires him a special confidence by his great responsibility towards Christ and through the humbleness the priest listens to him with, and which determines the priest not to reckon himself as better than the penitent. Actually, the priest totally vanishes in front of Christ, by placing Christ in front of the penitent's conscience, as supreme forum in front of Whom no man feels himself humiliates, a forum Who is in the same time the most understanding and forgiving Person to the human helplessness, He Who prayed for the forgiveness of the sins of the ones who crucified Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 89)

“One can say that the Mystery of the Confession is a Mystery of the intimate and sincere communication between the penitent and the priest, or even a Mystery of the communion between them. In it, the priest enters the soul of the penitent, who opens himself to him willingly; it doesn’t remain to a passing and superficial contact. Both the penitent’s contribution and the contribution of the priest are far greater in this Mystery. In the other Mysteries, the grace works on objective, ontological plan, at the root of the being, often in an unfelt mode. Here the grace works through the more thorough and vibrant commitment of the penitent, through confession and repentance, and then of the priest, in considering the means recommended to the penitent for the healing of his soul, of the one who got ill consequently to some grave sins, and then again by the contribution of the penitent in accomplishing the recommendations. This is explained by the fact that if through the Mystery of the Baptism and that of the Chrismation the receiver had been forgiven his sins through his simple confession of the faith and of the commitment to observe the faith and the commandments of Christ, the Mystery of the Repentance is committed with a man who has proven that he hasn’t co-worked with the grace of the Baptism, a fact that makes him guiltier, and that it proves that within the man there has been produces an illness, or a weakness, which can drive him even after this Mystery to new fallings. Therefore, the penitent must explain for what reasons he has fallen and which his weaknesses are, in order to be healed. Then he must show through repentance and through the promise of not committing sin anymore, a more assertive commitment in combating the weaknesses which have been proven to easily overcome his nature. The purpose of this Mystery shows that for the recidivists in the same grave sins, the means for remediating the weaknesses must be applied with more strictness. Otherwise, the Mystery has not the durable remediation of the man as the effect, and it cannot make him a truly new man.” (Stăniloae 1997: 86-87)

“Only the persons chosen by Christ in an objectively verifiable mode, as there were chosen the apostles, only these persons can have and exercise the power of Christ with earnestness, and they can be taken seriously in exercising this power, both the chosen ones and the other having the objective guaranty that those ones have been chosen by Christ. They have this guaranty in the fact that the chosen ones have been shown as such by the Holy Ghost, through a consecration act done by the Church and guaranteed by the Church, through invoking the Holy Ghost by the Bishop as another person consecrated in the Church, up to apostles. Only thus a it can be verified whether a human person hasn’t taken from himself this power of Christ of forgiving the sins. Only thus can be avoided the contestations of some persons chosen by Christ, in a verifiable mode, for exercising this power; only thus it can be avoided the unverifiable pretention of some people who affirm that they have received the power from Christ. Otherwise, all the believers could pretend that they are invested with the power of the forgiveness. If that had been the case, the reciprocal forgiveness would have fallen in an exercise of complaisance.” (Stăniloae 1997: 84)

“Recommending the penances bring the priest’s role in the foreground. If while listening to the confession, the priest exercised his role as an understanding friend, mixed with that one of the judge and of the physician, by weighing in the nature and the seriousness of facts confessed to him, now he exercises the role of a judge seconded by that one of a physician, who weigh in the appropriate means necessary to heal the weaknesses which he has find out of. He is a judge not in order to utter sentences, but in order to weigh in with love for the penitent and skills of a soul’s physician, the appropriate means for healing the penitent. The judge work is a simple weighing in helping the work of the physician.” (Stăniloae 1997: 90)

“The Church has established this “penitential discipline” on the basis of the mentioned places from the New Testament, and on the basis of the even clearer words from I Cor. 5: 9-12: “I have written my epistle in order not to mix yourselves with the fornicators. But not – entirely – with the fornicators of this world, or with the greedy hoarders, or with the plunderers, or with the idols’ worshippers, because otherwise you would have to go outside the world. So, I have written you not to have any connection with someone who, being brother only formally, he is fornicator, or niggard, or idols worshipper, or drunkard, or thief. With one like this do not even sit at the same table. This is for what have I judge the outsiders? But aren’t you judging the insider?” Therefore, the priest works in the Mystery of the Repentance in the name of the community too, which gives its implicit assent – as in the cases of all priest’s acts.” (Stăniloae 1997: 93)

“The community ascertains, at its turn, that the penitent has placed himself outside the communion with it, and that he accepts this situation with grief and this will last until the repentant one does not bring proofs that he has detached himself from those sins in a steadfast manner, and by this he has reestablished inwardly the communion with Christ. Thus, the community defends itself against the effects of the decomposition which this agent of the division can have upon community’s union. Thus, the spiritual guide at his turn, he asks the penitent to commit some deeds through which to reestablish the accord of faith and of moral living with the churchly community.” (Stăniloae 1997: 92-93)

“The confident, serious, and repentant confession the penitent does, it is an effect of the work of Christ. This is for to other people the penitent doesn’t unveil his sins, or he unveils them only some of his sins, and often by bragging for some of those sins. By having Christ as working through the serious and vibrant intimacy established between the penitent and the priest, this Mystery elevates them from the plan of the soul on the spiritual plan where the Holy Ghost works on. That's why they say the priest is spiritual guide in this Mystery and his work in this Mystery is a spiritual work." (Stăniloae 1997: 88)

"The constitutive elements of the Mystery of the Confession are: the confession of the sins, the repentance for the sins, and the priestly absolution. The confession of the sins cannot be considered as an act of the penitent separated from the priest, and his repentance must be concretized in accomplishing some deeds recommended by the priest. So, the role of the priest isn't reduced to the simple absolution from the end, but it is exercised in the whole Mystery's unfolding." (Stăniloae 1997: 86)

"The efficiency of the recommendations which the spiritual guide gives, it depends on a great measure on the spiritual guide's living in accordance to them. The spiritual guide won't have the moral authority of asking the penitent restraints which himself doesn't observe." (Stăniloae 1997: 94-95)

"The encounter between the priest and the penitent it has become an encounter in the name of the Lord, for the penitent recognizes the priest as seen organ of Christ; through this, their agreement in Christ is eased by the priest's presence. That's why though to the forgiveness prayer the penitent participates too, from his position of needing forgiveness, their prayers are unified in the priest's prayer and through this it is fulfilled as prayer of the priest which the penitent as well agrees to. In the priest's position as convergence point it is manifested the Christ's primate in this agreement. This primate is manifested also in the fact that the forgiveness is granted through the priest's declaration of absolution accompanied by the placing of the priest's hand and of the epitrachelion on the penitent's head." (Stăniloae 1997: 95-96)

"The fact that the priest works as seen organ of Christ, and as representative of the Church it doesn't diminish his responsibility and therefore the possibility of living the persona communion between him and penitent into Christ. On the opposite, the priest's responsibility is keener, on the measure of his awareness that he is the seen organ of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997; 88-89)

"The first One Who committed the Mystery of the Confession has been Christ Himself, by the forgiveness of their sins he granted to numerous persons who were confessing their faith in Him and who asked for His help, by this implicitly confessing their sins and accepting His urge no to sin anymore. In the most cases Christ has imparted the healing grace and implicitly the grace of the sins' cleaning, through His hand or through a substance His has touched and which was set in contact with the sick one, or through a power irradiating out of His body, or simply by the closeness with Him the sick one was in, and by His word full of godlike power, namely through a direct personal relation with the sick one (Mt. 9: 28-29; 9: 22; 9: 25; 8: 31 etc.).” (Stăniloae 1997: 82-83)

“The human being, by continuously accomplishing his self-transcending, and therefore by continuously advancing towards his true self, by often receiving the body and the blood of Christ, he becomes increasingly aware of himself, while living the present live, about his mistakes which he has committed and which he continuous committing, mistakes which impede the human being in this advancing. That’s why, the human being must strengthen his living of the transcendence, and the practicing of the Holy Eucharist, by asking for and by obtaining the forgiveness of his mistakes, and by reconciling himself with others. And this is the first thing the human being must do, by addressing himself to Christ, through priest, being aware of the fact that he hasn’t wronged to himself and therefore he doesn’t grant forgiveness to himself, neither he obtains forgiveness from some impersonal essence from within himself. This is for one cannot ask for forgiveness except from a conscious Person, a Person Who helps you to live in connection with Himself: The Person of God. Only God’s Person can forgive your mistakes you did to other persons and, in the last analysis, to Him Who loves all the persons he has created. Only through an often confession you become increasingly more a person who is aware of the own responsibility. The confession is an exercise of free communication and of being elevated through humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 205)

“The intimacy accomplished between priest and penitent ever since this phase of the confession, it is not only of soul order, for in it enters an air of unusual seriousness, due to the will of the penitent for coming back to purity and to the priest’s will for really helping him. This seriousness has at its basis the conscience that in this relation is present, in an unseen mode, but transparent and mysteriously felt, Christ Himself Who asks them for and Who helps them to this intention of theirs, Christ Whom they feel responsible to, or united in responsibility. The penitent trusts the priest, just because he feels in the priest his responsibility to Christ for his soul, he feels the priest listening to him in the name of Christ and with a real power of helping that comes to the priest from Christ. And this fact makes the penitent to open his soul and to unveil his sins and his weaknesses with the whole his sincerity, seriousness, and repentance. Christ Himself works in this Mystery through the encounter of the sensitized intimacy of the two people.” (Stăniloae 1997: 88)

“The Lord rejoices for our confession for it is the beginning of the communion which the penitent reenters with Christ, and for He enters the communion with a man who presents himself to Him. The penitent regains by this humbleness, or a soul’s delicacy, and he feels shame for sin, and for the grief he has caused to Christ; it is about a delicacy opposed to the rigid impulse towards sin, opposed to the careless and desperate egotism. The penitent returns to the capacity of communion in purity with the other people. The penitent commits the first act of getting out of the individualistic haughty prison he has created within himself, out of the spiritual carelessness and insensitiveness, which keep him outside communion. The confession itself elevates the man, for it includes in itself the humble repentance for the confessed sins and the will for getting free of the sins' mastery." (Stăniloae 1997: 89)

"The mistakes are done not only to the people and therefore the forgiveness must come not only from the people. No human being can fully liberate you from the conscience of your guilt. That's why, the forgiveness is asked for and it is obtained through the priest who is invested by Christ with a special grace, as His envoy. The Confession it is thus, at its turn, an act of transcendence, of crossing over an impediment staying in the way of the undisturbed connection with God, a crossing which cannot be done without being helped by God Himself. The Confession is the removal of an impediment raising from within yourself." (Stăniloae 1995: 205)

"The Mystery of the Confession consists of the forgiveness of the sins, to the ones who confess and repent for their sins, forgiveness given by the bishop or by the priest – in a seen manner, and by Christ – in unseen manner." (Stăniloae 1997: 82)

"The mystery of the confession has been instituted by Christ by the fact that He granted the forgiveness of their sins to some persons, and by the fact that he has given His disciples and their descendants the power of forgiving the sins." (Stăniloae 1997: 82)

"The Mystery of the Eucharist follows, at the beginning of the life in Christ, after the Mystery of the Baptism and after that of the Chrismation, consummating the union with Christ of the ones who entered the Church. During the following Christian life, the Eucharist follow after the Mystery of the Confession, for it strengthen again the union with Christ of the one who, through sins, he has put a distance or a contradiction between him and Christ. Through Confession the believer gets out of this separation. To the ones who hadn't committed any sin after Baptism, the Eucharist would have been possible to be administrated without the Mystery of the Confession, having the sole purpose of uniting them increasingly more with Christ, or to feed continuously their life out of Christ. But because there is no man not to mistake, or who to fully develop the powers he has been given with after Baptism, through the Mystery of the Chrismation and through the first Eucharist, the believer is being imparted with the Eucharist after he has confessed his sins, or his unfulfilled duties, and after he has been forgive his sins in the Mystery of the Repentance.” (Stăniloae 1997: 82)

“The priest gives the “canon”, or the “penance”, namely he applies the canons established for the diverse sins. These canons do not have as purpose to punish the penitent, but they are destined to heal him. The need for a priest it is highlighted in this phase, by the fact that the penitent cannot establish himself the means for his own healing, neither can he give such penances to a fellow human of his, with sufficient authority in order to determine that one to accomplish the canons. The penitent must be given the canons in the name of the Lord, represented by a person different from the penitent, a person who has the authority for he has been chosen by Christ in order to indicate the healing means corresponding to the will of Christ. The penitent himself, or any other person, he can be too lenient, or too severe, in the means which he recommends. The spiritual guide is requested to be able, through readings of spiritual books, by watching the diverse soul’s processes, by experience, not only to give with a certain surety the most efficient advises, but also to argue them to the penitent, in order this one to allow to be convinced by those arguments.” (Stăniloae 1997: 91)

“The purpose of the recommendations the spiritual guide gives to the penitent it is the soul’s healing, and they can be prolonged or shortened depending on the penitent’s zeal, or on his carelessness, so that the spiritual guide must remain in a soul’s connection with the penitent, or in a spiritual friendship, which can be very beneficial to the penitent.” (Stăniloae 1997: 94)

“The role of the means the priest recommends for healing the ones with grave sins it is shown not only in the fact that these means are adapted to the gravity and to the sort of the sins, to the situation and to the capacity of each penitent, but also in the fact that they can be shortened when the priest notices at the penitent a special zeal of inwardly breaking with his sinful habits, or when the penitent is menaced by an imminent death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 93)

“The sin’s force that is in the penitent’s weaknesses, which have become like his second nature, they are not ripped apart in a quarter or of something more of an hour of sentimental feeling, for how long the confession takes. In order this man’s second nature to be ripped apart, this sentimental state that is opposite to the sin must be concretized in deeds and moral attitudes contrary to those weaknesses, in order to weaken their habits and in order to create other habits. With this starts the repentance phase of the penitent, which develops the repentance or the regret for the committed sins and the decision made in order not to sin anymore.” (Stăniloae 1997: 90)

“The spiritual guide cannot but to absolve the penitent, or to ascertain that the penitent cannot be absolved yet, until the penitent doesn’t untie himself, inwardly, from the ties of the sin, until he hasn’t opened himself to the possibility of communication between himself and the Church, between him and Christ. This is an act of full faith in Christ and in Church. That’s why, like at baptism too, and like at Eucharist too, the penitent is asked about his faith, because he cannot be admitted to Eucharist, either to the previously necessary Repentance, somebody who is from outside the Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 92)

“The spiritual guide expresses his sensitiveness for the penitent’s sins in order to awake and to increase the penitent’s sensitiveness, giving him, by this, the power to get up from his sins. The spiritual guide descends with Christ, the One Who descends to the man’s helplessness, but in a given of power descent. For this occasion of sensitiveness and repentance, with the help of the spiritual guide, Christ asks the penitent for confessing his sins – but also in order to help the penitent to take a step forward in overcoming his weaknesses, as Tertullian said.” (Stăniloae 1997: 90)

“The spiritual space of the Mystery of the Confession, when this Mystery it is being done with this seriousness, it has become or it has started becoming a space of the holiness, which is going to have a real effect upon the penitent’s betterment. This spiritual work is exercised by the priest, especially for guiding the penitent towards a life of penitence and repentance, which the penitent must fulfill it in order his wound cause by sins to be healed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 88)

“The third- and the last - phase of the Mystery of the Confession it is the absolution of sins uttered by the spiritual guide. The spiritual guide prays to Christ to absolve the penitent, and then he adds his absolution too. This shows that Christ is the One Who actually forgives the penitent; but the spiritual guide’s prayer is the one actually bringing the forgiveness from Christ. The coming of the forgiveness through the prayer of the priest it shows in the same time the humble position of the priest, but also the fact that he is needed, as the one who prays, in order the forgiveness to take place. The absolution added by the priest, it is some kind of ascertainment of the forgiveness granted by Christ, through the priest’s prayer as authorized representative of the Church and as seen organ through whom Christ commits the Mystery.” (Stăniloae 1997: 95)

“Through confession the penitent commits the first act of elevating above sin, being helped by the introductory prayers and by the priest’s urges, or by his questions as well. The priest helps the penitent during the whole time of the confession, by encouraging him to confess, not manifesting any interested greediness of finding out, or any sign of unpleasant surprise, which could stop the penitent's impulse towards confession; but neither the priest must manifest indifference, absence of the soul, boredom, or hurry, but he must manifest a very deeply human understanding, which still wants to create and to preserve the repentance state in the penitent. The priest must mirror on his face that the sins he has just found out about, they do not create a desperate situation for the penitent, and neither those sins must be slighted." (Stăniloae 1997: 90)

"What the forgiveness of the sins is necessary for? Tertullian was the first to notice that the Lord hadn't asked for the confession of the sins for He wouldn't have known our sins, but for their confession is a sign of real penitence and it increases the repentance, being in the same time a sign of trust in God and in the priest who represents Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 89)

"During this walk it is being song the Isaiah's hymn of joy, for the conceiving of the Son out of the Virgin's womb. Now it has been laid down the foundation of some people, images of the embodied God. The ones who will be born out of this marriage they too will be members of the eternal Kingdom of God. The heaven itself rejoices for this increasing of the Kingdom of God. During the going around the holy martyrs are also asked that through their prayers to be saved the ones who are being wedded, through a patience that imitates their patience. The joy of giving birth to children it doesn't miss restraints, pains, and endeavors. These hymns are the same which are song at Baptism too, and at Ordination, for the same reasons: "for the birth of new members in the Kingdom of God, for the future growth, which doesn't miss the efforts of the restraint, of the patience, and of the endeavors"." (Stăniloae 1997: 135)

Holy Eucharist

"All the Mysteries do not have only a character of Mystery, but they have as well a character of sacrifice. This is for in all of them Christ gives Himself for us and he gives us, together with Him, to the Father, but He gives Himself us too. In Baptism Christ seeds within us a new life, capable of sacrificing to God together with Christ; in Chrismation Christ gives us the power of advancing in virtues, which are forms of self-sacrificing; the Repentance is the grace of the forgiveness which meets with our renouncing to the egotistic pleasures; the priesthood is the consecration of the ordained one to God, and the power of a life consecrated to God and to the Church; the wedding is a gift of the real live and self-giving, combined with a restraining of the egotism." (Stăniloae 1997: 70-71)

“As Christ’s sacrifice on the cross and His resurrection were necessary for instituting the Eucharist, likewise was necessary the Last Supper. Without it, the Apostles wouldn’t have impropriated in a real manner the death and the mysterious resurrection of Christ, and neither would have we; there wouldn’t have been done the passing from the death of the Lord on Golgotha and from His resurrection towards their living by us or to their living by Him within us. Besides this, without the Last Supper we wouldn’t have known that the Lord has instituted, on the basis of His death and of His resurrection, the Eucharist, through which Him to remain with us and to always come to us as the sacrificed and resurrected Lord.” (Stăniloae 1997: 64)

“At least once, the Gospel according to Luke let us understand that the Lord has committed after His resurrection too, the Eucharist on earth, as a seen presentation of His state of permanently bringing Him in the seen plan. Or, we have in Eucharist the passing from its officiating seen by Him to His presence as unseen bringing during the Eucharist’s consummation, as basis of His presence and bringing visibly represented in the Eucharist from all times: And when he sat with them at the table, by taking the bread, He blessed it and, breaking it in pieces, He gave it to them. Then their eyes were opened and they knew that it was Him; and He disappeared from them (Lk. 24: 30-31). It was necessary to show them that He resurrected as a fact and in this quality, he will continue to officiate the Eucharist in a new wine. Anyway, Jesus recalls them here about the Last Supper, and so about the commandment He gave them to officiate in the whole future the Eucharist as memory of His, which won’t be only the memory about somebody who was, but it will be a continuation of His presence with them in His quality as resurrected, but He being the same with the One Who officiated the Eucharist, at the beginning, in a seen mode. He showed them the proof that they can have Christ in a real manner in Eucharist, since He resurrected, even if He is unseen now.” (Stăniloae 1997: 66)

“Because the full sanctification depends on the impartation of the state of sacrifice too, there is intercalated an interval between the moment of the transformation – or the moment of the Eucharist as sacrifice – and the moment of the Impartation as the Eucharist’s accomplishing as Mystery. This interval of time is filled up with prayers, in order to prepare the believers for being imparted with the Lord’s body and blood. The fact that the sacrifice aspect persists in the Mystery aspect it is indicated by the fact itself that the believers are imparted on the way of the bread and wine, and the priest declares at each believer that he is being imparted with the Lord’s body and blood, but also by the fact that the body is broken in pieces immediately before Impartation and there are concomitantly uttered the words: “It is being crumbled and It is being imparted the Lamb of God, the One Who is crumbled but Who isn’t being divided, the One Who always is being eaten but Who is never finished, but Who sanctifies the ones who are imparted with Him”. Even the sanctification of the believers who are imparted, it is an effect of the impartation as sacrifice, by meaning an even fuller transposition of the believers in the state of sacrifice out of the power of Christ’s sacrifice. Properly-said, only through the act of imparting the believers the Eucharist as sacrifice and as Mystery it comes to an end, for only now it is being accomplished its purpose as sacrifice brought to the Father, but also for the sanctification of the believers; only now it is uttered the name of each believer, as it is done in all Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 76-77)

“Breaking the bread before Impartation it brings to an end the breaking started at proskomidy, which represents the Lord’s birth, and it shows that right in His birth there was implied His destination for Cross and for impartation. This appointing of His from his birth, to be sacrificed, it shows Him that He isn’t in state of sacrifice only during the crucifixion, but he is so after resurrection and ascent as well, in order us to be able to be imparted with Him in state of sacrifice, and in order us too, to impropriate this state of sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 1997: 77)

“But why it is necessary to take place the union of the Lords’ body and blood with our body and blood, on the way of the bread and of the wine? Being about a Mystery, it is necessary to be made sensitive to us, through something, the act of being us imparted with the unseen body of Christ. And the bread and the wine are the fundamental elements and the most supportive to the human body and blood, the most related with them. The bread and the wine represent both the lord’s body fed with them, and our body. The bread and the wine are the nature that ascended to the state of direct food and drink for our body. Through the nature’s law from within us, our body transforms this substance in its own substance. Likewise, Christ transforms these substances in His body. But by His Ghost Christ instantly transforms the Eucharist’s bread in His body, which is an organ of manifestation of the Hypostasis and of His Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 68-69)

“Christ gives Himself to us only out of His love, and he does this only in order to give the people the true life. The ones who are made by God they cannot have the life and they cannot increase in it except out of Him, as Source of the life. That’s why God gives the people birth again. But God doesn’t let the people born out of Him without nourishing them with the Life out of Himself. If some mothers after giving birth to a child, they give that child to another woman to suckle him out of her body, for, in the end, their blood isn’t better than that one’s, unlike this, God feeds the people Himself with His life, in order they to increase in life and to eternally remain in it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 63)

“Christ, being consummate God, he has given to the baptized ones the consummate grace of the Ghost, which doesn’t receive any adding from us, but it is unveiled to us on according to the measure we are working the commandments in. Thus, we increase through faith “until we have reached at the union of the faith, at the consummate man, at the measure of the age of Christ’s fullness” (Ephes. 4: 13). Therefore, no matter what we would bring Him after we have been reborn, it has been hidden within us from before, by Him, according to what is written: “Who knew the mind of Christ, or who has given Him something before, in order to receive back that reward? This is for from Him and through Him and towards Him are all the things” (Rom. 11: 34-36). Since Baptism, Christ dwells within us with everything His “mind” comprises regarding the target He wants to bring us to. Only for in the grace given us through Baptism there is Christ Himself as Person, with the whole endlessness he comprises in Himself as Person, that’s why after Baptism we aren’t added anything, but it is actualized due to our efforts. Of course, In Eucharist, the Same Christ gives Himself, to us, in another mode too, in order to cross within us with His sacrificed body and blood.” (Stăniloae 2006: 142)

“Everybody is evoked in prayer around the Lord’s body and blood: the living ones, the deceased, people and angels, having in front the Lord’s Mother; amongst all of them, the Eucharist strengthens the communion. This unity in the Lord’s body it is accomplished through the work of the Holy Ghost Who is called through epiclesis and Who is active in the acts of the transformation and of the impartation, for the Lord’s body as descended on altar, it is a pneumatized body and the Holy Ghost is the Ghost of the communion between Christ and us, and amongst all of us – in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 61-62)

“If the Eucharist is the Mystery of the deeper unity in the same body and blood of Christ and in the same faith and love, on the basis of an already existing unity, and it is shared within Church for strengthening the Church’s unity, it will be natural not to be given to the ones who do not belong to the Church and who intend to remain outside the Church, because in such a case the Eucharist’s purpose could be disrespected.” (Stăniloae 1997: 62)

“If the witness of the Apostles gives us the knowledge of the Resurrection of Christ as a fact that is exterior to us, and it gives us the surety that if Christ has resurrected, we will resurrect too, the Eucharist makes us having within ourselves the Resurrection of Christ, as power leading us towards our resurrection, and it allows us to somehow foretaste the resurrection. But if through Eucharist we have within us Christ Who died and has resurrected, we prepare through Him for our real death too, as for a death which we are going to surpass in Him, or which we have already spiritually surpassed it in foretasting His Resurrection and in its work within us. Thus, the Eucharist gives us not only the power to die to the sin and to surrender ourselves to God, but also of receiving the real death when it will come, like Christ received it like a gift offered to the Father, without any fear or doubt regarding our eternal existence. The Eucharist gives us the power of dying when we should to, and not only in the likeness of the Christ's death but also in a real mode, as He did, by having within us the working earnest of the eternal life we are going to pass to. United with Christ in Eucharist we no longer fear death, for we bear within us the body of the resurrected Christ as the cure or the medicine of the immortality, or of the eternal incorruptibility, as the Holy Fathers called the Eucharist. "The one who eats Me, he will be alive through Me", said the Savior (Jn. 6: 57); or: "The one who eats this bread (which has descended from heavens), he will be forever alive" (Jn. 6: 58); or: "The one who eats My body and drinks My blood, he has eternal life, and I will resurrect Him at the end of the time" (Jn. 6: 54). "This is for the one who eats My body and who drinks My blood, he remains into Me and I into Him" (Jn. 6: 56). The one who has within him the dead but resurrected Christ, through Eucharist, he can say as Saint Apostle Paul did: "Death, where is your victory? Death, where is your pin?" (I Cor. 15: 56)." (Stăniloae 1997: 56)

"If through Mystery, God imparts us with His work, as grace and as gift, and through sacrifice we offer God our things and our being itself, in Eucharist these two movements meet each other: from us to God and from God to us, in the most accentuated and complex manner. The Eucharist is constituted of numerous feelings, acts, and significations, which start from us towards God and from God towards us, like a human face being constituted through the meeting, in a complex drawing, of numerous lines which come from us, from nature, and from above, in order to give the face its direction towards heavens, towards exterior, and towards interior." (Stăniloae 1997: 70)

"In Baptism, the one who believes in Christ he dies to the sin, or he dies as former man, taking power out of the Christ's death, in order to life with Christ the life of obedience to God. But in this death of the former human being is included also some kind of death, as a surrender of the own existence to God. The last one hadn't existed the first one couldn't have existed. But we become able to this one through Eucharist. Our earthly existence is being maintained after Baptism in order to be renewed and developed in Christ, through virtues, having in it both sorts of death. And the power for this life and for the both sorts of death it is taken not only out of Christ Who was born clean and Who died for our sins, but this power is taken also out of Christ Who dies surrendering Himself to the Father in order to resurrect to the eternal life. And the death for sins and the power for the new life in Christ which are received through Baptism, they are being developed by the power of the Ghost of Christ, since receiving the Holy Ghost through Baptism and Chrismation, and out of Christ's death for our sins, and our surrender to God towards resurrection, which we receive through Eucharist, it is out of Christ's death, as surrender to the Father, and out of Christ's Resurrection." (Stăniloae 1997: 55)

"In Eucharist, Christ as man brings Himself as sacrifice to the Father, but not in a juridical mode; by this Christ opens to us the way towards the Father. So, He puts Himself to our disposition in Eucharist for: in the same time with Himself, to offer us too, to the Father. This is for, at the Father we cannot enter except in state of clean sacrifice, we cannot achieve this state of clean sacrifice but only out of the state of clean sacrifice of Christ, Who, in this sense, He is continuously bringing Himself to the Father, in order to give us the power of bringing ourselves too, together with Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 72)

"In Eucharist, Christ doesn't give us only an irradiation of His state, of sacrifice and resurrection, but He gives us His body Itself being in this state. That's why the Eucharist is the culmination of all the other Mysteries. The believers ascend towards Eucharist, or they are being prepared for the full receiving of Christ, at the beginning by being administrated the Mystery of the Baptism and of the Chrismation, and then, if they have committed sins, through the Mystery of the Repentance, or, however, through fasting, and through a special avoidance of inappropriate thoughts and deeds. Thus, being imprinted by the receiving of Christ in Eucharist, the believers can receive as well His power towards consecrating or sacrificing their life to God and to the Church, or to their duties - which are full of the Ghost of Christ - towards their fellow humans." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"In Eucharist, the man reborn in Christ and strengthened by the Holy Ghost, he no longer unites with Christ Who is born and dies for our sins, but he unites with Christ Who dies at the end of His activity on earth in order to resurrect to the eternal life." (Stăniloae 1997: 55)

"In order to be crucified and to resurrect, Christ had to embody Himself. That's why at the basis of the Eucharist there is the assuming of our body, His sacrificing for us and His resurrection. The Eucharist from the Last Supper it is the mysterious anticipation of the sacrifice on Golgotha and of the Resurrection. It is also the proof that Christ lived at the Last Supper, mysteriously, His sacrifice and His resurrection, as he will live them in the Church's Eucharist, in order to imprint them also in our body and in our blood." (Stăniloae 1997: 64)

"In the communion of the mysterious body of Christ enter also the saints, especially the Mother of the Lord. In a way, the pieces of bread represent their mysterious surrender to God, in the likeness of Christ; in another way, the pieces of bread represent the yielding of all the spiritual victories, brought as gifts to Christ, in their quality as proofs or the fruition of His sacrifice within them, as examples to be followed by the living ones. Although united at maximum with Christ, they still are represented by the pieces of bread as distinct persons; right because of that, they aren't transformed in the body of Christ, as they aren't transformed either in their bodies; for we aren't imparted with them, but we only enjoy the irradiation through them of the power of Christ. That's why they are remembered in order to extol Christ and His sacrifice, but also in order them to be glorified to." (Stăniloae 1997: 75-76)

"In the love for people, everyone always gives and asks for. In the Eucharistic love, the community only asks for and Christ only surrenders Himself. But also, the request is out from the power which the community already has and it is important for accomplishing the love and for receiving the love; in this sense, the community has as well a positive role in the coming of Christ, Who, on the other hand, is within the Church and He comes also from the Church. That's why the Eucharist cannot take place except within Church - as well as the impartation with it." (Stăniloae 1997: 70)

"It has been accepted the idea that these pieces of bread placed next to Agnus Dei, representing the sacrificing of the believers' life as person, they are not transformed too, in the body of Christ. Of course, even less it is accepted the idea that they are transformed in the bodies of the ones who bring them. This would have implied the idea that the believers are imparted with themselves and with others, and this thing was to be avoided. Thus, it has been reconciled the fact that the believers are imparted with the body of Christ to the fact that the believers remain – even when being imparted – in an existence distinct to Christ, or better said, they remain in an existence that is not confounded to Christ's existence. The dialectics of the believers' unity in Christ, but without being imparted ones with other as they are imparted with Christ, but being the believers imparted only with the power of Christ which irradiates out of all of them, or more out of some of them and less out of others, it has been concretized on one hand through the transformation of the community's sacrifice of bread in the body of Christ, and on the other hand, by placing the pieces of bread for believers, around the Agnus Dei." (Stăniloae 1997: 75)

"It is to be noticed that not only Christ bring Himself and He brings the community as sacrifice, but the community at its turn, by bringing itself as sacrifice out of the power of Christ's sacrifice, it brings Christ too. By this, it is affirmed even more the persistence of the community as community of persons, and the reciprocity between Christ and the community in bringing the sacrifice. "And we are bringing to You this speaking and bloodless sacrifice and we are asking for, and we are praying You, and with humbleness we are falling down on our knees before You: Send Your Holy Ghost upon us and upon these gifts which are put forward.” (Stăniloae 1997: 76)

“It must be mentioned the fact that the substances destined to be transformed in the believers’ body are in the same time the main substances which the Christ’s body has been constituted of: the bread, the wine, and the water. They instantaneously are transformed at Liturgy in the body and in the blood of Christ and, on this way, in the body and in the blood of the believers. The community’s union with Christ in prayer, it increases the spiritual power which this transformation is being consummated through. This is for everything is being spiritualized out of the power of the spiritual body of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 76)

“It must be noticed that according to the three synoptic evangelists the Savior uttered also the following words, according to Luke, immediately before offering His body and the blood under the image of bread and wine (Lk. 22: 18), and according to Matthew and Mark, He uttered them immediately after that: “And I am telling you: I will no longer drink out of this fruit of the vine, until on the day I will drink it with you again, in My Kingdom” (Mt. 26: 29; Mk. 14: 25). Out of these words and from the fact that the Savior, when offering the bread, He says: “This is the body which is being broken for you, and when offering the cup: “This is My blood, which is being shed for you, towards the forgiveness of the sins”, it results that the Eucharist it has its foundation in the Savior’s sacrifice on the cross, and on the other hand, that there will be present in the Eucharist, in all the future times, His resurrected body and blood. His resurrection will make the wine as new, therefore the savior’s blood too, which He will impart us with, in this Mystery, into His Kingdom which starts with the Church. If Christ hadn’t been crucified or if he hadn’t resurrected, it wouldn’t have been possible the Last Supper and the Eucharist within Church. Christ lived at the Last Supper, in an anticipated manner and mysteriously, His death of the cross, but also His mysterious death from afterwards.” (Stăniloae 1997: 64)

“Like there is no individualistic separation between my sacrifice and the sacrifice of Christ, likewise there is no separation between my sacrifice and of the others. That’s why the Eucharist is of the Church, of the community. And the churchly community has offered itself not only through bread, but also through all its prayers, through all its declaration of surrendering itself to God, declaration which express its feelings: “On ourselves and one on another, and the whole our life, let’s give them to Christ God”. The community is elevated towards the communion with Christ through the prayers asking for the coming of the Holy Ghost upon its life and, in the culminant moment, by invoking the Holy Ghost, when the priest says: “Send

Your Holy Ghost upon us and upon these gifts which are put forward”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 73-75)

“Presenting the Eucharist as a living of the three moments: the Last Supper, the Sacrifice of the Cross, and the Resurrection, we have it from Saint John Chrysostom and from Saint Eutychus, the Patriarch of Constantinople.” (Stăniloae 1997: 65)

“Saint Apostle Paul said: “So, we have buried ourselves with Him in death, through Baptism: so that, like Christ has resurrected from dead, through the glory of the Father, likewise also us to walk in to the renewal of the life; if we have become a sole stalk with Him into the likeness of His death, we will be partakers to His resurrection” (Rom. 6: 4-5). “We always bear into our body the death of Christ, for His life to be shown as well in our bodies... knowing that the One Who has resurrected Lord Jesus Christ, he will resurrect us too, and he will present us together with you” (II Cor. 4: 10-14).” (Stăniloae 1997: 55)

“Saint Eutychus, the Patriarch of Constantinople (553-557), he discerned between the mysterious sacrifice of the Lord at the Last Supper, between His real death afterwards, and the consummation of the mysterious death which starts on the resurrection day. We accomplish the mysterious death of Christ in Baptism, the second death we accomplish it in martyrdom or, besides martyrdom, in our real death. And the consummate mysterious Easter, which Saint Eutychus let us understand he ties the Eucharist to, we accomplish it on the day of the resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 56-57)

“Saint John Chrysostom interpreted the word of Jesus about the new wine, in the sense that the Christ’s body itself will be after Resurrection, and therefore in the Eucharist too, dispassionate and incorruptible. Properly said, only this makes possible the Eucharistic transformation and the savior eating of His body. This is for only this will mean the full union with Christ, with the body that He has assumed, and by this also His union with us on the way of the bread and of the wine through this body, because only through this His body is towards our eternal life. Thus, we have in this an explanation of the real presence of the Lord with His body and blood, in Eucharist, and of our need to be imparted, in Eucharist, with them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 66)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor saw the same scale between the death with Christ, which we receive in Baptism the power for, and the fuller mysterious death, which we receive the power in Eucharist for: the Baptism gives us the power for the death of our will’s tendency towards sins, for a renewed earthly life; and the Eucharist gives us the power for receiving the real death and the life from after resurrection, for through it we receive the fuller mysterious death and therefore the foretasting of the resurrection, which we are talking about at the Holy Impartation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 58-59).

“That’s why Saint Apostle Paul gets out of the foretasting of the resurrection, which we have in the same time with the carelessness about death, which we must cross through with Christ in order to resurrect with him, the courage of enduring the advancing of the death in our external man: “Knowing that the One Who has resurrected our Lord Jesus, He will resurrect us too, with Jesus..., we do not get discouraged and even if our man from outside gets withered, our man from inside he gets renewed from day to day; this is for our sufferance, an easy and momentary one, it gathers to us, above any glory, a crown of eternal glory” (II Cor. 4: 16-17). The foretasting of resurrection increases from the real and gradual imprinting, in our man from inside, of the dynamic state of resurrection, by the fact that the resurrected Christ is united with us.” (Stăniloae 1997: 59)

“The awakening of the human being responsibility for the union with Christ, it starts with a calling to impartation. This is anticipated also by a calling of the ones who are going to receive the impartation: “With fear of God, with faith, and with love, you come closer”. And the ever-deeper union with Christ, of the ceaseless transcendence towards the Absolute descended to man, Who the human being still cannot forever identify himself to, even if the human being has been elevated to an eternal communion with Christ, it is expressed by the believers through the prayer: “Give us to be imparted with You, more truly, in the undying day (always luminous) of Your Kingdom.”.” (Stăniloae 1995: 204-205)

“The Baptism, the Chrismation, and the Eucharist are the three Mysteries through which the one who believes in Christ is fully united with Him or he is introduced within Church. They are the three Initiation’s Mysteries. The Chrismation gives the power of developing the new life in Christ the believer has receives it at Baptism, and through Eucharist this life is being consummated as full union with Christ, or with the Church. The Baptism is the Mystery of the beginning, the Chrismation is the Mystery of the middle, and the Eucharist is the Mystery of the end or of the consummation. Of course, the new member of the Church, even if he receives the Eucharist immediately after Baptism and after the Anointing with the Holy Chrism, he cannot be reckoned as he has reached the consummation, from the point of view of the contribution he must bring it too. But he has concentrated in himself the whole his road in Christ, a road which, by starting at Baptism, it will advance through the contribution the man brings or by using the power he has been given with, for this entire road, until the state that crown his endeavors of developing the new life, he has received in the three Mysteries. This final state must be always imprinted as potential presence of Christ in the man’s body through the Holy Impartation, in order to attract the man towards it, in order to effect upon the increasingly accentuated assimilation of the man to that state. The consummation must be previously lived or foretasted, in an always renewed mode, and in the same time it must remain an attractive target to the man.” (Stăniloae 1997: 54)

“The bread’s intimate union with the Lord’s body hypostatized in the Word, it transforms the bread in the Lord’s body, for this is the rationality of the bread: to become body. This doesn’t happen to the Lord’s body through the intimate union with our body, neither to our body through the union with the Word’s body. The Lord’s body is only deified and pneumatized, for its rationality is to persist even in the hypostatical union with God. Much less our body is being transformed by the union with the assumed and pneumatized Word’s body, since both of them remain bodies. Our body only starts going on the road of the pneumatization and deification. This is for the rationality of each body is to remain the body of a person, either of the Person of the Logos or of a certain human person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 68)

“The Church, taking in account the real content of the words from the Last Supper, it considers the Last Supper not like being an image of the Baptism, or only of the Baptism, but like being an image of the Eucharist too. Maybe Eutychus the Patriarch considered the Last Supper as image of the Baptism, without excluding the possibility of considering it as image of the Eucharist too, for in the Baptism too, there takes place a mysterious death and therefore the Baptism is like some kind of anticipation of the Eucharist. But for the Last Supper is a sensitive anticipated image of the full mysterious death of the Lord from after resurrection, therefore also of the Eucharist as sensitive representation of this death, the Last Supper is mainly and characteristically the first Eucharist. And for the mysterious Lord’s death that follows it is prepared by the mysterious death at the Last Supper, the Eucharist is to us too, a preparation for the real death, through the mysterious and more accentuated death which we live through Eucharist, but also for the death’s surpassing into resurrection and for our more real impartation with that Christ being in state of resurrection and of full mysterious death after resurrection, impartation that will take place when us too will have resurrected with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 57-58)

“The Eucharist is the force of a magnetic agent that works in our earthly life attracting our life towards it; the Eucharist is the North Star guiding the ship of our life on the waves of our earthly existence; the Eucharist is the ferment or the dough gradually transforming our earthly life in the eternal life. The new life out of Baptism, following to the death of the former man, it cannot exist without the perspective and the earnest of the eternal life upheld by Eucharist. That’s why the Eucharist is given immediately after Baptism and Chrismation. The new life on earth wouldn’t have any meaning and any power without the perspective and the earnest of the resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 55)

“The Eucharist is the Mystery which crowns the Baptism and the Chrismation not only a plenitude of the power and of the new and life, virtually started at Baptism and having in it the virtual power, developed through Chrismation. The Eucharist implies in itself the power of full dying towards the existence separated from God, death started through Baptism and developed through Chrismation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 54-55)

“The Eucharist is the natural continuation of the Baptism. If the Baptism is a rebirth out of Christ, the God-man, the Eucharist will be a nourishing of the man out of Christ. Both of them, Baptism and Eucharist, follow to the Embodiment, which is the sign of the love of God for people.” (Stăniloae 1997: 63)

“The Eucharist is, by excellence, the Mystery of the Church’s unity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 61)

“The Eucharist seeds within us the power for totally surrender our existence to God, in order to receive it back filled up with His eternal life, like Christ, through resurrection. The Eucharist is not so much for the renewed life on earth in the likeness in the Christ’s life on earth, as it is rather for the eternal life. The Eucharist presupposes that the man has progressed or he will progress beyond the renewed life on earth, which he will accomplish out of the power of the Baptism and of the Chrismation, in an eternal life, namely beyond a life that it has been consolidated in the cleanness received at Baptism and in virtues, out of the power of the Mystery of the Holy Chrism, namely beyond a life sheltered against sins, to the eternal life. For the sins committed after Baptism and after Chrismation the forgiveness is generally obtained through the Mystery of the Repentance. They say also about Eucharist that it is for the forgiveness of the sins and not only towards the eternal life, these sins are the ones who have remained hidden to our conscience and which couldn’t have been forgiven in the Mystery of the Repentance by confessing them. Mainly, the Eucharist is given for the eternal life, therefore for elevating above the earthly life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 55)

“The Eucharistic body is only the Christ’s body as Person, on the way of further feeding of His mysterious body, open to this feeding and desiring it. The mysterious body, or the Eucharistic community, it has, on one hand, something more than the Lord’s body as Person has, being composed also of the believers’ bodies; on the other hand, the much less godlike actualized life than that one from the Lord’s body, and that’s why capable and desiring to continuously nourish itself from the Lord’s body, and the Lord is always giving His body to it in the form of the Eucharistic body. The community surrenders itself to the Lord with the thirst of reducing what differs it from the Lord's body, and of being increasingly filled up with Him; and the Lord surrenders Himself to the community, by matching its needs and requests, in order to fill it up even more with Himself. In this sense, Christ is the heavenly bread that it always gives itself as a gift in order to be eaten, and it never gets exhausted, and it never definitively quenched the need for food of the believers who form the churchly community. The transformation of the earthly bread in heavenly bread, and its impartation to the community, it is, thus, an act of the Lord, but it is determined also by the felt need and by the Eucharistic community's request. In the Eucharistic transformation and impartation, there takes place an act of organic accomplishing of what is already in the Church, but there it also takes place a coming of the Lord as consummate fullness in the Church's bosom." (Stăniloae 1997: 69-70)

"The fact that the Lord's body and blood become present to us through the transformation of the bread and of the wine it brings a new ray of light in the depth of the Mystery of the Eucharistic transformation. The Lord doesn't transform, at Eucharist, the bread and the wine for Himself, but in order to impart Himself to the people who believe, namely for there are people who believe and who want to be imparted with Him on the way of the bread and of the wine. This faith and desire the people manifest it through the liturgical prayer that culminates with the invocation of the Holy Ghost, done by the priest in the name of the liturgical community and with the participation of the liturgical community, for the transformation of the bread and of the wine in the Lord's body and blood. Through prayer, by confessing the faith, through epiclesis, the community has been increasingly more united with Christ, not to say about the Lord's present within the community through the previous impartations, or not to say about the fact that the community itself is the mysterious body of the Lord. Thus, the Word of God, by attracting in His intimacy the rationalities of the bread and of the wine, or by overwhelming them through His Holy Ghost, He works as well from within the community He is, in a certain degree, united with. The community and the bread offered by the community they are somehow united with the embodied Word of God. In this existing from before ambience of union – between the embodied Word, the community, and the bread – there takes place the transformation of the bread and of the wine in the Lord's body and blood, as complete identifying of the bread and of the wine to His body and blood, in order this body to be fully united, on the way of the bread and of the wine, with our body." (Stăniloae 1997: 69)

"The Ghost transforms the sacrifice of bread and wine, of the life, in the sacrifice of Christ, in His sacrificed body which Christ brings it to the Father, and then He gives it to be eaten and drunk by the community, in order the community to be filled up more, with His sacrificed body. On this purpose He has transformed the bread and the wine in His body and blood, bringing them to the Father and imparting Himself to the believers on this way.” (Stăniloae 1997: 74)

“The Lord is present with His body in Eucharist and He gives Himself to us in order to be eaten by us, for the eternal life, for His body is tightly united with God-the Word through Embodiment, namely is descended from heavens and pneumatized through Resurrection and Ascent, namely ascended to heavens by being Him overwhelmed by the godlike Ghost, reached to the culminant union with the Godhead.” (Stăniloae 1997: 67)

“The moment which Christ is brought as sacrifice on, it coincides to the moment of the gifts’ transformation. But it shows also that the bringing of the sacrifice implies also a certain sanctification of the community through the descent of the Holy Ghost, which is a Mystery aspect. The believers bring themselves, by offering the bread, and the mixed with water wine, which represent the substance itself of their life. Their intention to bring themselves within these gifts it is shown as well through the prayers which accompany this bringing, and which express clearer their spiritual self-giving itself. This is for the one who prays, he gives himself to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 76)

“The mysterious death has an active scale, before our real death, therefore the foretasting of the resurrection too, with its progress within us. Not only the death of the former man in Baptism it is a forgetfulness about the man we were in the past, but like that are also the repeated deaths from afterwards, lived through the repeated Impartations. Through each of these, we produce a new discontinuity with our past state, launching us towards a new one, a superior one, according to the epektasis (stretching forwards) of Saint Apostle Paul (Phil. 3: 14) and of Saint Gregory of Nyssa. But the discontinuity with the state from the past it doesn’t mean the abolishment of our identity as persons, and the resurrection to a superior state it is possible for the breaking apart from an old state and the coming out to a new, superior state, they do not take place through sinking in nothingness but it takes place in God Who is undetermined, but Who is undetermined through the infinity of the life, and not for the negative emptiness of the life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 58)

“The one who has become a new human being into Christ, or in the union with Christ, he has been imprinted in all his soul’s powers and in the senses’ organs and in the body’s organs, with the Holy Ghost, he can advance further in his union with Christ, namely he can accomplish a new stage of the transcendence. This takes place in the godlike Eucharist. Now, Christ no longer penetrated within the human being only through His grace, or through His energy, like the water or like the oil, but He enter the human being with his body and blood, willingly received by the human being. The union with Christ has reached now the highest level. The man has now, within his being, the body and the blood of Christ, in order to have the body and the blood, in common, both him and Christ. The human being doesn't feel this fact as Christ feels it with His humanity united with Him in His Hypostasis. The human being has only a conscience of accomplishing this fact, and more or less this sets in movement, his feeling. The human being is elevated by Christ, on the highest level as person, as the One Who bears the feeling as sacrifice imprinted in Himself, namely on the level as person who is ready for sacrificial self-giving to the Father, for his fellow humans, together with Christ. The more you give yourself as a gift, the more you will be elevated as person and in an accentuated communion with the one whom you give yourself to, as a gift. In order to continuously deepen this feeling, the man is given the possibility of a repeated impartation with the body and with the blood of Christ, in order to ceaselessly intensify this getting aware, and this personalization developed on the measure of the Self-giving. The human being's responsibility is all the more awakened by the fact that his name is mentioned. The value which a human being is dressed up with, by receiving the resurrected Christ Who accepted to be sacrificed as man, at the eternal life. The human being will be thus, eternally united with Christ, but non-confounded to Christ." (Stăniloae 1995: 204)

"The One Who we united with, or Who we transcend towards while we live this live, it is a Person differing from us, on one hand He is above us as God, and on the other hand He has descended to us as man. So, the human beings do not give the Mysteries by themselves, but through the priest, who is, on one hand, a human being like we are, and on the other hand, the priest is invested with a special grace from Christ. In the future life, Christ Himself will make Himself noticed by us in the impartation with Him, on one hand as man, and on the other hand as fully lightened by His godhead and inexhaustible in His Self-communication." (Stăniloae 1995: 205)

"The ones who are imparted together, they already are in a state of unity of faith, for they have been as well imparted with the same body and blood of the Lord, starting with the next moment to the Baptism. That's why also before the liturgical anaphora (the prayer preceding the transformation of the bread and of the wine in the Lord's body and blood) and the Christian sing: "Let's love on one another, for us united to confess". And they utter the Creed together. Then they are imparted together in order to increase this unity. And in the prayer from the Liturgy of Saint Basil the Great, after the transformation of the gifts in the body and in the blood of the Lord, and before Impartation, the priest asks on behalf of everybody: "And on all of us, who are imparted from the same bread and from the same cup, You unite us one with another with the impartation with the same Ghost". In a writing dating from the Apostles' time, present in the Didache of the Twelve

Apostles, God is asked for those who are imparted to be united like the wheat grains have been united in the Eucharistic bread: "Like this bread was scattered over the hills, and being gathered it has become one, likewise Your Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth, into Your Kingdom". (Chapter 9)" (Stăniloae 1997: 61)

"The Orthodox believers come close to the sacrificed body of the Lord after a certain period of fasting, this representing their disposition towards sacrifice. Out of this teaching of the Holy Church Fathers about Christ's state of sacrifice came the idea of Nicholas Kabasilas that the moment of Christ's bringing as sacrifice it coincides to that of the gifts' transformation, for the body of Christ, which takes in that moment the place of the bread, it is His sacrificed body." (Stăniloae 1997: 77)

"The plan of the eternal life it isn't superimposed only to the plan of the earthly renewed life, but it also interferes with this one and both of them reciprocally sustain one another. That's why the Eucharist isn't given only at the end of the earthly life, or only after the full consolidation in good of the earthly life. The eternal life, or Christ with His eternal life, he strengthens not only as perspective, but also as earnest, the movement of our earthly life towards the eternal life, upholding by this, in our earthly life the renewal in cleanness and virtues, the Eucharist being thus also an author for our earthly life to advance towards the eternal life." (Stăniloae 1997: 55-56)

"The pneumatized character of Christ's body after Resurrection, and therefore also from Eucharist, it is affirmed by the Savior Himself, when he announces that the ones who will want to enter the life, they will have to faithfully eat His body and drink His blood. These words are another proof of the fact that Himself instituted the Eucharist. In the Chapter 6 from the Gospel according to John, after declaring for several times that only the one who eat His body, which He will give it for the world's life, only that one will be forever alive (Jn. 6: 51), because He saw the offence took by His disciples, the Lord adds the explanation: "Is this offending you?... The Ghost it the One Who gives life; the body is useless. The words I have told you are Ghost and life" (Jn. 6: 63). Namely, the Ghost present within body, that Ghost who has pneumatized the body, he makes His body as food towards salvation and life, in the Mystery of the Eucharist. The Word's Hypostasis gives to the body a quality as of the one who has descended from heavens, and the Ghost makes this body capable of being elevated to heavens (Jn. 6: 50, 62), or a pneumatized body." (Stăniloae 1997: 67)

"The power of the mysterious death of the body of Christ and of His resurrection and incorruptibility are deepened through our body and soul blood within our soul, as some power which will be able to reconstitute our resurrected and incorruptible body at the general resurrection. This will be helped also by the fact that the rationality of the body of Christ, hypostatically united with the godlike Logos, it has fully imposed its power upon the matter of this body, by pneumatizing it, given the fact that this body is in essence a materialized rationality. And this power is being extended out of it not only upon our bodies but upon the entire material world, making transparent all its rationalities, or pneumatizing it wholly.” (Stăniloae 1997: 59-60)

“The Savior Himself has assured us about His real presence in Eucharist, with His body and blood, and He explained the significations of this presence. The Savior formally instituted the Mystery of the Eucharist at the Last Supper, both by uttering the words and by officiating it by Himself. On that occasion”, Christ took the bread, He blessed it, and he gave it to His disciples and He said: “Take, eat, this is My body”; and taking the cup and giving thanks He gave it to them, saying: “Drink out of this, all of you, for this is My blood, of the New Law, which is being shed for many, towards the forgiveness of the sins” (Mt. 26: 26-28). In the Gospel from Luke it is added, when offering the body, the words: “which is given for you”, and: “Do this for My remembrance” (Lk. 22: 19). At Mark (14: 22-23) are given only the words like at Mathew.” (Stăniloae 1997: 63)

“The union with Christ in Eucharist it is the basis and the source of the full love amongst the Church’s limbs, for all the Church’s members have the same body not only with Christ, but amongst them with one another. Each one lives and feels the life of the others as life lightened by the mind of the same Christ, and sensitized and empowered towards good by the Ghost of the same Christ. This is for all of them are not just kindred, but they are partakers to the same body (Ephes. 3: 6) with Christ and with one another, so that they no longer separate, if they bring the contribution of their will too, their interests, their thoughts, and their feelings. In their sentiment of being melted down in God, as mysterious death with Christ, and of foretasting the state of resurrection, no one can be distinguished from others, though right in the fact that each one of them has this sentiment this foretasting it has its proof of each one’s persistence.” (Stăniloae 1997: 61)

“The Word of God is the Rationality which all the things’ rationalities have their origin within. Through embodiment, the divine Rationality by becoming the Hypostasis of the human body it attracts the assumed body in the most profound intimacy with Him, as image of rationality from Himself. Somehow, Himself as the godlike Rationality of the rationalities of all the creatures He becomes rationality of His assumed body too, but without abolishing the rationality of the assumed body per se, neither abolishing the body. But the rationality of His body sunk in the divine Rationality, it is there united with the rationalities of the bread and of the wine, which uphold the body, or are destined to be assimilated by the body. The transformation of the rationalities of the bread and of the wine in the rationalities of the body and of the blood, that takes place on the plan of the earthly life through a whole process of natural assimilation, it takes place in the bosom of the divine Rationality, due to the supreme intimacy they reach at, with the body, in an instant. Thus, the Eucharist's bread and wine remain without a foundation of their existence in their separate rationalities, namely they remain as simple images of their rationalities sunk in the rationality of the body of the embodied Logos. But in the divine Rationality, the rationality of the embodied body it finds its full interpenetration with the rationality of any other human body. It depends only on the openness of each man to accept this interpenetration of the Lord's rationality with the rationality of his body. That one can eat the Lord's body, reaching at a tight union with it, in the Word of God in Whom he has his rationality sunk. The body's pneumatization makes transparent and overwhelming the presence of the Hypostasis of the Word through it, so that it can be received by all the ones who believe, in their bodies, in a supreme union. This presence of the body pneumatized and overwhelmed by the transparence of the Word, consequently resurrected and immortal, it gives our body too this ferment of the immortality, of being transparent to the Word, of the pneumatization. It depends on us only, to actualize, or to assimilate in a real manner, through our contribution towards purity and virtue, these qualities of our body, which advance by this in an unexpected spiritual thinness. But even if we do this in the fullest mode, our body will still remain submitted to the general law of the process of weakening and of decomposition through death. But its new and spiritual qualities pass to our soul too, which will keep them until the general resurrection, when with their help it will be able to remake the human body in resurrected state, namely a pneumatized state, especially for the Word of God, the supreme Rationality, He will gather then the rationalities, or the existence foundations of all the creatures, by intimately uniting them with Himself." (Stăniloae 1997: 67-68)

"Unlike in the other Mysteries where Christ is present in an unseen manner through His work, in Eucharist he is present through His body and blood themselves, under the image of the bread and of the wine. Through this Mystery Christ gives Himself fully to all the Church's members, namely to the Church, constituting the Church and upholding it as His extended body, for He completes His dwelling within the ones who believe." (Stăniloae 1997: 62)

"We take the power for the life of sacrifice out of the state of sacrifice we are transposed in, with Christ in Eucharist. Thus, by the fact that Christ takes us too, in order to bring us through our together-sacrificing with Himself, as sacrifice to the Father, it takes place a tight union between His sacrifice and our sacrifice, in the sense that our sacrifice is part of His sacrifice, and His sacrifice is part of our sacrifice, or we are in Him, the One Who brings Himself as sacrifice to the Father, and in Whom we believe.” (Stăniloae 1997: 72)

“Without any doubt the Lord’s presence with His body and blood in Eucharist, and the transformation of the bread and of the wine in order Him to be eaten by us, it is a great Mystery. The tight union of this body with the Word and its pneumatization by His Ghost, it can explain the possibility of this transformation, but it cannot explain the mode it is done in. We try to project a few rays over this Mystery only for attempting not to left it totally opaque, and in order to highlight even more its depth and complexity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 67)

Holy Unction

“Against the actions of the unseen forces it is asked also for the unseen help or the saints, of the martyrs, and of the Mother of the Lord.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“As impossible it is to separate the body from the soul, as impossible it is to separate the total person from the influence of the evil forces upon him. The liberation from the seen influences it is being done also through the strengthening of the body’s senses, with the grace of the Holy Ghost Who is introduced in the body’s senses through by anointing the body with the sanctified oil. By this, the senses are cleaned up, are sanctified, are strengthened in themselves against the temptations coming from the outside things and form the unseen evil forces through their mediation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 138)

“As in all the Holy Mysteries, in the Holy Unction too, the communion with the priest and with the other fellow humans helps us entering the communion with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“For the salvation stays in the communion with Christ, the all-loving godlike Person become man, and the man could pass from his present sickness to death while still deprived, because of his passions, of the capacity for this communion, because he hasn’t advanced through the other Holy Mysteries and through his own collaboration in this communion with Christ, the Church makes an effort in order to prepare him for this communion with Christ and to open him up to the communion with his fellow humans, this being a maximum effort for his salvation through several priests, through several prayers, through the presence of several believers, who are praying together, while they are opened to the communion with Christ and willing to strengthen their communion with the sick person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“In a song, before the sanctification of the oil, it is asked form: “Look down from heavens, the One Who is unreached, as a merciful, marking with Your unseen hand, You the One Who loves the people, through Your godlike oil, the senses to this one who runs to You with faith and asks for forgiveness for his sins, giving him healing to his soul and body, for him to extol You with love, extolling Your mastery”. The priests anoint the sick person with oil on his body parts which provide his main senses, in the sign of the cross, and the signification of the Cross in this anointing it is shown by the singer while the priest commits this anointing: “You Lord, You have given us You cross as weapon against the devil, for he shatters and trembles because of not being able to endure to look at its power, for You resurrected the dead and You defeated the death”. The sacrificed Christ Himself dwells through the sign of the cross in the sick person, giving him the power for restraining himself from sins, to resist any egotism of the sinful impulses; with his power the sick person’s body will be strengthened, in order to overcome the illness from his body. The cross is the means which the power of Christ’s body comes through, for He defeated the death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 139-140)

Holy Unction “In all the aspects of the Mystery of the Holy Unction, there is shown an insistence, because of the fact that the illness of the body and of the soul which the person has fallen in, it makes him incapable of a normal live, of it menaces him with the end of his earthly life. This person must be helped insistently, through the power of Christ, in order to become healthy with the body and with the soul, or at least with the soul, if his end will prove to be soon.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“In the Mystery of the Holy Unction the sick believer is imparted, in an unseen mode, with the grace of the healing or of the relieving of the bodily pain, of the soul’s strengthening of the forgiveness of his sins remained after confession, by anointing him with sanctifies oil, accompanied by the priests’ prayers. The practicing of this Mystery during the Apostles’ time, and therefore the fact that This Mystery comes through Apostles from Christ Himself, it is attested by the James’s Epistle: “If there is somebody sick, let him call the priests of the Church and they to pray for him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of the faith will heal the sick one and the Lord will rise him, and if he has done sins, they will be forgiven to him” (5: 15).” (Stăniloae 1997: 136)

“In the prayer after the reading from the Gospel, after it has been asked for the dwelling of the Holy Ghost in the sick person, they say: “For he has known his sins and he has come with faith to You. So, by receiving him with your love for people, either he has mistaken with the thought and with the word, forgiving him, clean him up of all his sins and, by always being with him, guard him in the following years of his life for, by observing Your commandments, to no longer be him a mockery of the devil, for in him too, to be Your all-holy name glorified". And before this, it has been asked for the healing of the sick person." (Stăniloae 1997: 139)

"In the prayer read after the second Apostle and after the second Gospel, Christ is asked for healing the sick one, based on the fact that He has embodied and he has created Himself for His Creation, showing His will of saving the body and of elevating the body in the Kingdom of God, of making the bodies means of eternal communication between God and the people." (Stăniloae 1997: 137)

"In the prayers of the Holy Mystery of the Holy Unction, are asked for: the healing of the body, the forgiveness of the sins and the soul's cleaning of sins. The dwelling of the Holy Ghost has mainly the purpose of cleaning the sins and of healing of passions and of elevating the man to a life of holiness, and of cleanly serving God. Because of being the sin mainly a sickness of the soul, especially when the soul has thickened in passions, and therefore the soul is a cause of the illness too, the Holy Unction is reckoned both a healing of the body and of the soul, and God is called like the Physician of the souls and of the bodies. The Holy Unction is reckoned as necessary for healing the passions, for, even if have been confessed the sins which came out of these passions, the passions won't be so easily healed and it is impossible not to gush out of them, almost continuously, sinful deeds." (Stăniloae 1997: 138)

"In the same prayer it is asked for the dwelling of the Holy Ghost in the sick one, according to the word of Saint Apostle Paul (1 Cor. 6: 19; 3: 16-17). "Look from Your holy height, saving us, the sinner and unworthy Your servants, with the gift of the Holy Ghost, in this moment, and dwell Him into your servant (Name)". The Holy Ghost is imagines and communicated through the oil sanctified, by the priests, right during this Mystery, which the sick one is anointed with." (Stăniloae 1997: 137)

"It must be mentioned here that the Holy Unction is usually officiated with the participation of several believers, who pray at their turn concomitantly with the priests. Out of this wide communion, out of this sign of the love which several fellow humans give it to the sick person in his state of sufferance and of helplessness, the sick person takes power for getting better with his body and with his soul. Homiakov's word: "No one is saved alone, but he is saved through the Church's prayers, of the saints, and of the Mother of the Lord", it is proven at the committing of this Holy Mystery too." (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“One of the main causes of the human being’s depression and disheartening it is the illness. And for many times, neither the sickness nor the depression can be overcome through human means. The believer who is sick he is tormented also by the conscience that his sickness has its cause in some sins he couldn’t confess, and that he will eventually die without confessing these sins. And who doesn’t pass during his life through illness and through these depressions and worries, which increase his sufferance? They belong to the human composition. Is there possible not to think that God thought also at a help given to the man in these situations of sickness and of the soul’s weakening? This Mystery shows that God manifests His mercy also towards the suffering ones, who hope in Him, who call for Him when they reach in such situation. That’s why, in all the prayers of the Holy Unction it is mainly called for the mercy of God, and God appears in this Mystery as working like the merciful Physician. In the verse of the Arsenius’ song, from the sanctification of the oil which the ill one is anointed with, verse repeated after each troparion, it is asked: “Master Christ, You Merciful, have mercy on your servant”. And in the song of the fourth voice, it is asked: “The physician and the helper of the ones who are in pains... give healing to Your helpless servant, You Merciful, and have mercy on the one who has mistaken much, and save him of sins”. (Stăniloae 1997: 136-137)

“Sometimes, the grace of God works more or less directly upon the body, healing the body, though, even in this case, the soul’s strengthening and the forgiveness of the sins take place too; and some other times, the grace works through the forgiveness of the not-confessed sins, for this one strengthens the soul and, by doing that, it strengthens the body too. But through the grace of this Mystery, it is mainly given healing to the body. Only when the sick one is due to die, this main effect it doesn’t take place – only the other ones take place.” (Stăniloae 1997: 137)

“The committing of this Mystery by several priests (seven, or at least two) manifests the Church’s will for setting several of its forces in movement, through the communion through prayer and love, the setting in movement of several forces in order to escape one of its members from the situation of helplessness and pain he is in. The man feels the need for sympathy and for communion especially when he is sick, and especially on this occasion it is proven how the weakened man catches power out of the love of several people.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“The Holy Ghost’s work within man, which is asked for and it is granted through the Mystery of the Holy Unction, couldn’t have been done without and openness of the sick person’s soul through faith and repentance. One can wonder about the fact that the sick person who receives this Mystery is not asked for a confession of faith as at Baptism, united with the Chrismation, and like at Eucharist, a confession of the sins and a confession of the faith, as in the Mystery of the Repentance; but the priests have the reason to consider it given, as the bishop considers the confession of faith given by the one who is being ordained in deacon or in priest (through theological certificate and through confession before Ordination), or the agreement given by the ones who marry. The fact itself, that the sick person calls the priests to pray for him or for her, it implies their faith in the work of God through this Mystery. Besides this, usually, the sick person confesses before. Then, the sick person has a special sensitiveness for God, by realizing the personal helplessness and that of the human being by and large and he or she places his or her supreme hope in God. His or her body is now transparent to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 139)

“The human being’s existence is untold complex. There is impossible to separate the body from the soul as long as the human being lives, and therefore it is impossible to separate the work of the grace upon the body from the work of the grace upon the soul. The body’s healing itself is felt by a sick person as grace given to the integral human person. The body is full of the soul’s energies; the soul works through the body; without the body the soul is incapable to work. That’s why the grace doesn’t work upon the body without working upon the soul too. But upon the soul works, though, by strengthening the soul and by cleaning the soul of sins, and by that appeasing the conscience, and that has a strengthening effect upon the body too, in order to make the body an instrument of the good work of the soul and in order to strengthen the soul too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 138)

“The insistence with which is being asked for, much more than in the Mystery of the Repentance, the healing of the sick person of his soul’s passions in the same time with the body’s healing, it lets us understanding that the Mystery of the Holy Unction refers especially to these roots of the sin, because in this progressed phase of the man’s sinful weaknesses which comes out of disregarding the Mystery of the Repentance and of its collaboration with the grace of the Baptism and of the Chrismation, it is, actually reduced the sinfulness to. The Confession before the Holy Unction has brought to the sick person the forgiveness of the confessed sins, but the sick person hasn’t enough time yet to melt down, through collaboration with the achieved grace, the sinful weaknesses, nourished through a long habituation to the sin, weaknesses which often explain the illness of the body too. Or, maybe, the sick person wasn’t able to sufficiently describe these weaknesses, which often are blurred in the fog of the indefinite.” (Stăniloae 1997: 138)

“The Mystery of the Chrismation gives us the power to co-work for our advancing in this death with Christ, which is the advancing towards Him; the Repentance restores us in the life with Him. The Mystery of the Eucharist gives us Christ Who accepts, as Subject dwelling within our subject, our death which he crosses us to resurrection through. The Mystery of the Wedding gives us the power of renouncing to the apparent life of the egotism and to live the life of love of surrender with one another to God, which is love for Him. In order to endure the pains with patience, in a disposition of surrender to God, in order to receive also the plenary spiritual life from Him, we are given the grace of the Holy Unction. (Stăniloae 1997: 154)

“The Mystery of the Holy Unction can be reckoned, by excellence, a body’s Mystery, or a Mystery appointed to the body’s healing. Through this Mystery it is highlighted the positive value which God granted to the human body, as One Who Himself has taken a body and He keeps His body forever, and He saves us through His body, by imparting us with the godlike life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 137)

“This communion gives the human being powers not only out of what it has human in it, but, in the first place, by the fact that all the ones who come and enter the communion with their sick fellow human, they come with the faith in Christ, Who healed every sickness and sufferance, Who defeated the death, Who healed some people for the prayers of the others, and Who said that where there are two or three gathered in His name, namely in the faith in Him and in the love amongst them, there is Him too amidst them. The present people help the sick one by the fact that they make felt and working, through their faith and prayer, the presence and the power of Christ, only for they facilitate the communion of the sick one with Christ, through the sick’s faith strengthened by their faith.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

“Thus, in the prayers of the Holy Unction, in which are asked in the same time, for the healing of the body, for forgiveness of the sins, and for healing of passions, for liberating the senses from the evil influences and for banishing the enemy away, all of these are asked for in order the sick person, when becoming healthy with his body and soul, to be able to live a clean life, consecrated to serving God. This shows that the Mystery of the Holy Unction isn’t for death as in Catholicism, but it is for life in health and cleanness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 138-139)

“When officiating the Mystery of the Holy Unction the priest bases himself on the faith and of the repentance of the sick person, asking from God His healing and cleaning grace.” (Stăniloae 1997: 139)

Holy Impartation

“By no longer speaking about Himself as about the Lamb, but directly telling the Apostles that He gives them His body and blood in His quality as God made man and sacrificed, He wanted to show that the symbol has been concretized in reality, that what the people were promised through the symbol of the Lamb, it was then fulfilled through the supreme Lamb. The Fourth Ecumenical Synod established no longer to be used in iconography the image of Christ as Lamb, in order to be shown that no longer is brought as sacrifice, a lamb as a general symbol, but it is brought, as sacrifice, the real and unique body of the Son of God. Christ’s body and blood bring within us the likeness to Him, when we are imparted with them. The same unique godlike Person Who in the same time has become human Person, He unites Himself with all of us, and He gathers all of us, as unique persons, at Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 96)

“Christ sacrificed Himself in order us to impropriate, at our turn, His love and His light, manifested in His sacrifice for us. This is said by Him through the words: “Take, eat, this is My body, which is being broken for you, towards the forgiveness of the sins”, and: “Drink out of this, all of you, this is My blood, of the new law, which is being shed for you and for many, for the forgiveness of the sins”. At the Holy Liturgy we add to these words the expression: “And towards the eternal life”.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 95)

Impartation “How much the material matter can receive the spiritual power of the Lord’s body, it is shown also by the fact that, in the prayers from before the Holy Impartation it is even affirmed that the power of the Holy Ghost from within the Lord’s body, it becomes visible when it encounters at the imparted man a strong faith, and it even heals that man of his body’s illnesses.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 131)

“If the body of Christ had been broken in order the people’s sins to be forgiven in a juridical sense, it wouldn’t have been necessary the body to be given to the people. By being given to each believer towards the forgiveness of his sins, and towards the eternal life, this united the man’s body with Christ’s sacrifice body and blood, and, by this, the man impropriates the state of Christ, which our sins were forgiven and the eternal life had been instituted for all of us. But this means to impropriate, at our turn, His state of sacrifice towards the heavenly Father, and towards the people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 95)

“Jesus instituted the act of the Holy Impartation with His sacrificed body and blood, in order to explain the sacrifice, which He was to bring the next day. He mysteriously anticipated, at the Last Supper, His real bringing as sacrifice on the next day. That’s why He said to His apostles that this impartation to be done by them too, “in order to remember Him”, by repeating the impartation with His sacrifice, which He was to bring the next day and which He made it possible to them to be imparted with, mysteriously, until He still was with them in His body from before, He did this in order us to be able to understand that He sacrificed Himself for us in order us to be imparted with His body and blood.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 95-96)

Impartation “The Christ’s sacrificed body and blood, they no longer are body and blood as of whomsoever man, but they are the body and the blood of the Person of God-the Word Who sacrificed Himself, and Who imparts us with Himself, through them. They are the body and the blood of the godlike Person of the Son of God Who made them as His own. Through them it works within us His Person. They bring within us the forgiveness from the Father, Whom the Son brought Himself as sacrifice to, as His Son made man, thus showing to the Father His love as man, and imprinting that love within us too, in order to gain for us too, the love of the heavenly Father. That’s why through His body and through His blood we are sanctified too, as sacrifice joyfully accepted by the heavenly Father. The sacrifice brought by Christ as man, to the Father Who is the Same and the Father’s only begotten Son, He brings us too, to the Father, by the fact that He imprints Himself on us too, in order us to be imprinted with the answer from the loving Father too. In this sense, the sacrifice of Christ which we are imparted with, it dresses us up in the light of Christ and, therefore, in the Father’s light which Christ is dressed up in too. But Christ gave anticipately, while He still was amongst His disciples in a concrete form, His body, not only in state of sacrifice but also as the body resurrected from the death received as sacrifice. And this body is illuminated and illuminating.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 97)

“Through the Holy Impartation we are united, in an increasingly unimpeded communication, not only with Christ but also with all the ones who are imparted with the same body and blood of His, which He communicated His love through, to all of us, for he wants to unite us, in the tightest mode, with Himself, and amongst us. Thus, we surpass ourselves in the same continuous mode, not only towards God made man, but also towards our fellow humans, and we become increasingly more together with them, through communication, as body of Christ. We never reach the full life characteristic to the common body, without communicating with the others, but we remain dry and sick cells. On the other hand, we live ever fuller our own mystery, in our common meeting with another’s mystery, in the Mystery of Christ-God made man. This communication with the fellow human into Christ produces within us feeling of happiness, which we cannot achieve otherwise, and those feelings prepare us for the eternal happiness. Without the humbleness of the Confession, we never overcome the rigidness of our pride, or we never prepare ourselves too, for the communication which we receive the power for, out of the impartation with Christ, and we neither do out of our part of transcendence, one necessary to our continuous elevation and humanization.” (Stăniloae 1995: 205-206)

“(The Father and God, t. n.) makes us worthy of Christ’s surrender, but also of His Son’s compassion for us, a state Christ’s permanently remains in. The “spiritual familiarity” with the Son it means a union with Christ by the Ghost, the Ghost being a transparency of Christ, in order to makes also us transparent to Christ, by being us penetrated in Eucharist with Christ’s body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 74)

Marriage / Wedding

“After reading the Apostle and the Gospel, the priest asks again in a prayer for their wedding to be kept in honor and for their bed to be kept undefiled – of course, by the blind and irresponsible libido and by a thought of infidelity, which lower both husbands from the reciprocal respect as persons and from their communion as persons. The fuller their love is, and the deeper, the more chaste is. That’s why the priest asks in continuation for the help of God, in order the two husbands’ relation to be sinless. Only thus their bond is full. The undefiled bed, as chaste and without blemish bond, it consists of spiritualization of the two married ones, in the spiritualization of their bodily bond through the whole love, respect, and responsibility for bearing on one another, and of helping each other, and to progress in those, thus gaining the respect of the other people too, and gaining the glory from God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 134-135)

“After the fourth prayer, the priest places the crown on the head of the man, after he has touched the forehead of each future husbands with that crown, and after the priest has done the sign of the cross upon the face of the man, uttering the words: “It is being wedded the servant of God (Name), with the maid of God (Name), in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.” Then the priest places, in the same way, the crown on the bride’s head. This is the central acts of the Marriage’s Mystery, act which the Marriage’s Mystery is being accomplished through. (Stăniloae 1997: 133)

“By touching with each crown, the forehead of each future husbands, and by mentioning both names when placing the crown of each of them, it is shown that the crown of each of them it belongs, somehow, to the other one too; each of them bears his own crown for he is united with the other one, for his crown is united with the other one’s crown. The crown and the glory of each of them consist in the love between them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 134)

“Enouncing more explicitly all the purposes of the Christian marriage, elevated by grace, it is done in the officiating of the Marriage’s Mystery itself, through which the grace of God is imparted to the ones who marry, for their accomplishing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 131)

“In exercising this responsibility, the human being achieves the whole his seriousness and gravity. He becomes truly a human being, and that means a human being for others. This responsibility makes him truly a person, and a factor of great conscious efficiency in the other’s life and in the society’s life, but it is upheld also by respecting the other one as person. Through the reciprocal sacrificial attitude each of them accentuates his own character and he accentuates the character of the other one; their union it becomes increasingly accentuated as a personal communion, within which each person grows up spiritually on the measure of the union between them. Without living and exercising this responsibility, the man remains in a state next to the inconsistency, differing from a child only because he lacks the innocence of a child.” (Stăniloae 1997: 126)

“In the second prayer, after it is mentioned that God created the man like emperor of the Creation and, for he reckoned that isn’t good the man to be alone, He gave him the woman in order him to be an inseparable body with her, the priest asks God even more for keeping away from all sorts of dangers the ones who are being wedded. Related to this, the priest asks God to give the two ones who are being married the joy Empress Helena had when she found the cross, and to remind about these two ones like He reminded about the forty martyrs, sending them crowns from heaven. It is hinted so the hardships which can occur in family and the cross which those hardships represent, and which they must bear patiently, in order to receive crown from heavens. Thus, it is shown also this meaning of the crowns which the two ones will be crowned with, which represent also the need for a full of firmness effort in the family life. And again, the priest asks God for giving them good children, a good composition of thought of their souls and of their bodies, an increasing towards every good thing. The happy marriage implies the harmony of the souls and of the bodies, which depend both of them on the unity of thought of the two ones.” (Stăniloae 1997: 133)

Marriage “In the third prayer, the priest asks: “And now, Master, send Yourself Your hand from Your holy dwelling place and unite Your servant (Name) and your maid (Name), for from You are the man and the woman being united. Unite them into the union of the thought, crown them into one body, and give them fruitful womb and gaining of good children”. Their bodily union springs out of a unity of thought, out of an accord of the hearts, which collaborates to this union. It is the symphony Florensky talked about. Each of the two ones is preserved as person, for each of them wants and thinks and feels, but each of them thinks, wants and feels in accord with the other one, for that one, in convergence with him. In their bond there is not thought contrary to the other husband. By this, their union is like a crown of glory and honor - but this is only for they accept this eventuality of conceiving children, they being spiritualized by this assuming of common responsibility too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 133)

“In what concerns the ritual of Marriage’s Mystery committing, it has an introduction to engagement, namely the promise the future husbands give to one another to unite themselves in marriage, a promise blessed by the priest too. The engagement took place, and it still takes place today, with sometime in advance to the wedding, for the two young people to prepared themselves for the wedding, but also in order to reciprocally engage to be prepare themselves for wedding. But, because the Church considers the engaged ones as obliged to one another as through marriage, today, usually the engagement is committed immediately before the wedding.” (Stăniloae 1997: 132)

“This husbands’ responsibility for one another it is manifested in deeds in the middle of the society, because of the fact that the own family cannot be served without fulfilling some duties in society. Thus, the grace which the married ones are given with, it had effects in society and in Church. As long as we consider the marriage only in connection with the ones who marry, and we do not relate it to the whole Church and by this to the whole world, we won’t ever understand its sacramental character, that great Mystery which Saint Apostle Paul spoke about: “And I speak into Christ and into Church... In this sense, the Mystery of the Marriage is more comprising than the family. It is the Mystery of the godlike love, the comprising Mystery of the existence everywhere, and this is the reason why it interests the whole Church and, through Church, the whole world” (Schmemmann, u. c., p. 99-100).” (Stăniloae 1997: 126)

“Taking the crown off the heads of the wedded ones, the priest speaks again about their glory, for they are going to wear, in an unseen manner, the crowns the whole their life, if they live in true love, in the leanness of the faithfulness, and reciprocal responsibility and respect. With these crowns they will go even in the Kingdom of Heavens: “God... receive their crowns in Your Kingdom, guarding them undefiled and without blemish and not-tempted”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 135)

“In the closing prayer are mentioned the Emperors Constantine and Helena and the Martyr Procopius. The wedded ones are elevated to a imperial honor and to collaboration for faith, like the Emperors Constantine and Helena were, and to patience like the martyrs had. The rejoicing for the good things, the clean and perfect love, they are united with the struggle for the good things, with the hardships of the restraint and of the patience. The hardships are mixed with the sweetness of the bodily and of the soul’s union, having they role in spiritualizing this union.” (Stăniloae 1997: 135)

“Of course, giving birth to Children and raising them up, the serving of the Church and of the society, as restraining of the egotism of the two husbands (or of the children too), it means a cross. That’s why at the religious service of the marriage it is song a hymn dedicated to the martyrs. The husbands who do not restrain their egotism in two, there will become non-transparent even to themselves. They will build up egotism of instincts, a small beastly group, a group that is insensitive to others and which is able only of grasping, and incapable of giving away. A marriage that doesn’t steadfastly crucify its greediness and its self-sufficiency, and that doesn’t overcome itself by doing so, that is not a Christian family. According to the Christian teaching the characteristic sin of the today’s family, it is not the divorce or the lack of “conformation” or the “spiritual savageness”, but it is the self-adoring of the family, the refusal of seeing the marriage as oriented towards the Kingdom of God. There is an impulse of “doing everything for the family”, and if needed, even to steal. The family is no longer towards the glory of God; the family has started to no longer being a sacramental entering in His presence. Not the absence of the holy shyness towards family it makes the divorce to appear like an almost natural process, but this family’s self-idolatrizing determines the modern family to crumble down so easily; it is about that identification of the family to success and about the refusal of bearing the cross... A Christian marriage is officiated between two persons, and the common faithfulness of the two one towards the Third One – God – it keeps them in a unity with one another and with God. Properly-said, Christ is the one Who celebrates the Mystery of the Marriage, but He celebrates it by uniting the two husbands in Himself, and therefore he permanently remains as a means of union between them two. If they separate themselves from Him, their unity will weaken too. The restraining of this egotism in two includes also the restraining of using the marriage’s bond for a simple pleasure, with the avoidance of conceiving children.” (Stăniloae 1997: 131)

“One can say that the godlike grace - asked for the ones who marry, in order they to be able to restrain the tendency towards exclusively satisfying their bodily lust, which lowers each of the two ones to the state of object of the passionate egotism of the other one, in order they to be able to restrain any such egotism and faithlessness in the reports with the other one – it is asked for the strengthening of each one’s patience with the shortcomings of the other one and of the will to help him, in order to make their love deep in Christ, which is not possible without restraining each one’s egotism; finally, the grace is asked for the husbands to be able to give birth to children, which equals too to the restraining of the egotism of all sorts, and to advancing in a full communion. All of these give the marriage’s bond a chastity, an honor, and a noblesse, a real openness of each of the husbands towards the other one, towards God and towards their fellow humans; through all of these the husbands gain their salvation. The two husbands promise all of these to one another, and they, their kindred, and together with the priest, all of them pray for these things, during the religious service.” (Stăniloae 1997: 136)

“Right in the beginning of the wedding’s ritual, the man and the woman, or the god-parents on their behalf, they hold a lit candle, in order to show that they will walk in the light of Christ and of His will, making through this, out of their marriage, a full of a superior sense marriage.” (Stăniloae 1997: 132)

Marriage “The body of each one becomes to the other one transparent to his spirituality, it achieves a spiritual depth, it becomes an obvious place of the spirit; each of them becomes to another an increasingly known mystery and increasingly defined in the same time. And this mystery of each one it is fully revealed only to the other one, it is accomplished only through him and for him. The mystery of each of them it combines with the mystery of the other one in a unique mystery, for each of them bears increasingly more from the person of the other one in his own person. Thus, the marriage becomes a true mystery of the duality or of the dual unity, which starts to be felt and to be accomplished from the moment of the union of the two husbands in marriage, or even from before, but it actualizes its virtuality during the whole course of their life, so the two ones do not get bored of one another.” (Stăniloae 1997: 125)

“The Christendom is realistic. It doesn’t jump on promises of happiness not foreshadowed by hardships, for it is the life joining both sides. But the happiness has, though, the final gain. That one who expects only happiness from marriage, only pleasures, he or she won’t endure it for a long time.” (Stăniloae 1997: 136)

“The Committer of this Mystery is, in the Orthodox Church, the priest, for through him it comes in front of the ones who marry and, in their middle, visibly, Christ Himself Who seals the natural bond which they accomplish by consenting between them and which will keep them united in Him; And for through the priest the two ones’ marriage it is inserted like a living cell of the Church, filled up with the grace of Christ from within Church. Considering the marriage officiated only through the husbands’ consenting, as in Catholicism, where only the priest is witness to marriage, it means seeing the marriage only on its level as natural bond. (...) The blessing of the marriage through priest it is attested by Canon no. 7 from Neo-Caesarea.” (Stăniloae 1997: 131-132)

“The crown is sign of honor and dignity. The crown is borne by the emperor; and Emperor is also Christ and the high priest. The crown is the sign of seriousness, of a maturity and of which somebody is appointed to, in order to defend, to shelter, and to guide the other ones. Through coronation it is shown that the two ones have come off the care of their parents, they have received responsibility for their own life, responsibility for another, the common responsibility for their family and for their children to come, as being their own stronghold. The man isn't whole until he has reached able to receive this responsibility for himself and for others. If the human being was brought to existence by God as Emperor of the Creation, the human being accomplishes this dignity, which is a dignity of responsibility, especially and concretely by assuming the responsibility related to the family life, in which are implied also responsibility for the social life and, by and large, for the life of the world." (Stăniloae 1997: 134)

"The crown is the sign of the glory and of the honor, and this is said by the priest immediately after coronation: "Lord, our God, crown them with glory and with honor". The glory is related to honor, and vice versa. Their glory and honor are seen by God and by people. Their glory and their honor consist in the love between themselves too, in their sacrificial attitude for another, in exercising the responsibility for another, in assuming the endeavors necessary for the family life. Of the fulfilling all of these, it consists of accomplishing of a happy pair, as much as it is possible on earth. The entire Creation gains from the harmony of this pair on this pair's road towards the harmonization wanted by God." (Stăniloae 1997: 134)

"The crowns which the martyrs are given are actually for their patience in sufferance. The husbands have to endure at their turn the assault of many temptations in their conjugal life; they ought to endure many hardships, in order to take the crown of the full love. The glory which the crown gives, it is combined with the enduring of an asceticism, of a restraint, and of a patience, and with the full of efforts fulfilling of some responsibilities. That's why it is being done the sign of the cross with the crown on the face of the one on whose heads the crown is placed." (Stăniloae 1997: 134)

"The engagement is committed through the changing of the rings between the two husbands, after the priest, by holding those rings in his right hand, he did with them the sign of the cross upon the future husbands, saying the words: "It is being engaged the servant of God (Name), with the servant of God (Name), in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit". The priest does the same thing upon the woman, by indicating her too on her name, in order to show the future married equality as persons, and the liberty of each one in committing this act. But at each one, the priest mentions the name of the other one too, in order to be shown that through rings they are bond to one another for their whole life, in the name of the Holy Trinity, taking heed also to the signification of the spiritual power of the cross in strengthening their unity." (Stăniloae 1997: 132)

“The future husbands are given to drink from the same cup, being shown by this that they will sweeten themselves out of the common sweetness of the love and of the joy.” (Stăniloae 1997: 134-135)

“The grace of the Marriage’s Mystery is given for the total and without blemish love between the ones who marry, for their reciprocal help and patience, in order they to endure and to overcome patiently all the hardships. The live in two is complex, being partakers also to joys provided by the reciprocal love and self-giving, those having it themselves a certain infinity, but also of hardships and helplessness paradoxically tied to the mysterious infinite of the human persons.” (Stăniloae 1997: 136)

“The Mystery of the indissoluble union between a man and a woman, as union that is being spiritualized in an increasingly deeper communion, it is Mystery into Christ. Their union in Christ is a small church, as Saint John Chrysostom shows, or a part of the Church. This is for the Church too is constituted of such unities of the ones married through the Holy Ghost, Who breaths within Church. “This Mystery is great, and I say in Christ and in Church” says Saint Apostle Paul (Ephes. 5: 32). “The marriage is mysterious image of the Church” says Saint John Chrysostom.” (Stăniloae 1997: 127)

“The priest leads the two future husbands as they are tied to one another by their hand, around the table, for three times, and that means the non-interruption of their bond and love. (...) Nothing will interrupt their love and faithfulness, nothing will intercalate between them, nothing will get them out of their steadfastness.

“The receivers of the Marriage’s Mystery are two believers of the Church, of different sex, unmarried, from which no one was churchly married from more than three times and who aren’t kindred to one another more than the fifth degree. The mixed marriages between Orthodox and heterodox are allowed, under the condition that the children to be raised up in the Orthodox faith, and the Marriage’s Mystery to be committed in the Orthodox Church. After their Ordination, the Marriage is no longer allowed to the deacons and to the priests, except in the case their wife died, or she retired in monasticism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 132)

“The synthesis of this initial total love it is a bond actualized through deeds, the spiritual aspect receiving an increasingly important role in it. Each one inscribes in his being increasingly numerous signs of attention, of understanding, of serving, and of sacrificing from the other one, and these signs tie them increasingly tighter, and made them increasingly more to know and to appreciate reciprocally, and this living spiritual memory, which elevates each of them as person, by elevating them one through another, it makes their acts of bodily love to be penetrated by increasingly more spirituality and familiarity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 125)

“The woman is the human being most close to her man, and vice versa. And this is for her completes him. The man has in woman the humanity reached at supreme intimacy with him. And vice versa. They are fully unveiled to one another, in a total sincerity; each of them is to the other one another self, but still remaining a you that is necessary in order to unveil himself. Each of them forgets about himself, by becoming the other one’s self.” (Stăniloae 1997: 127)

“This indissoluble unity between man and woman, by being a unity on the human plan, it is not so much an organic, physiological unity, but it is a unity of love. It is based on the love of two human existences completing one another not only on the bodily plan, but also on the spiritual plan. For this the marriage receives a grace within Church. As such, this grace mustn’t be received passively, but it must be actively developed by the two ones. Thus, the indissolubility implied within nature and restored by grace it is also a work of the will of the two ones.” (Stăniloae 1997: 125)

“Through children, the two husbands overcome their egotism, by opening themselves towards others. Through children, the two husbands open themselves more, towards society by and large, which they need in order to raise their children in up. P. Florensky says that the society – and therefore the Church too – it is composed by dual units, and not by individuals; we would say by molecules and not by atoms. Only a family that doesn’t have children isn’t fully necessary to the society. The family promotes the social cohesion, the churchly cohesion, and not the individuals. The family’s cell, though it is not dissolved in the churchly or in the social organ, it must be a communication with the other cells through their common blood: through their children.” (Stăniloae 1997: 130-131)

“Through marriage, the bodily union between man and woman it becomes, from an act of sinful concupiscence, as it is outside marriage, an act wanted by God and blessed by Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 133)

“While the wedding has been started by the priest with “Blessed is our God...”, as a religious service other than the Holy Mysteries and the Holy Liturgy, the wedding the priest starts it with “Blessed is the Kingdom of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost”, as in case of any Holy Mystery, through which it is being given the grace. This is because only since now start the obligations of the coexistence which need the help from the grace. And only since now the two ones are being framed as a unit of love and as a fruitful of children unit, in the Kingdom of God, or through the Church, the Church being meant to grow. In the first prayer the priest asks Christ for Himself to come, to be present, as He did at the wedding from Cana, and to give the ones who are being wedded “peaceful life, a long life, sanity of mind, love for one another, the gift of having children, the non-withered crown of the glory... and to keep their bed not-tempted”. Therefore, all the positive things the union of the two ones needs for, but above all the love between them and the keeping them away from the temptation of the infidelity, of which though can sneak inside one or another. But neither is forgot the obligation of being generous to the deprived ones. The marriage isn’t a monad parsimoniously preoccupied only with itself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 132-133)

Ordination

“According to the Orthodox Church’s tradition, cannot be ordained except the male members of the Church, who confess their faith and who want to fulfill their duties towards the Church, duties belonging to the hierarchical level which they are introduces in. On this purpose the Church requested them to be whole at their mind and at their body and to have a theological preparation and an uncompromised name. On the episcopal level cannot reach except the unmarried ones or widows after their wife’s dead, and who previously have become monks. The priests and the deacons are forbidden from marriage after their ordination.” (Stăniloae 1997: 113-114)

“If Christ had given us in a seen mode, or if He hadn’t been Person, he wouldn’t have needed a person who to accomplish the seen acts He gives us Himself as a gift through. But because He gives Himself as a gift in an unseen mode, His Subject asks for a seen image of His, or another subject as seen image of His, whom He to give us Himself as a gift through. The Mystery as means of a grace from Christ, cannot take place by itself. The priest – as person and - as organ of the Mysteries, he implies the character as Person of the unseen Giver of Mysteries’ powers.” (Stăniloae 1997: 97)

“In creation the man was created as subject in the image of the Logos, as partner of the Logos, having to gather in himself the creation’s rationalities in order to offer them back to the Logos, thought by him, like the Logos offered them as gift and content accessible and necessary to the human spirit, the priest and the bishop are two subjects in the image of the embodied Logos, Who has become Himself the fully restored Priest, having to serve Him in His work of gathering the people again in Himself, through the sacramental priestly empowerments which they are imparted with, by preaching His unifier teaching, by guiding them towards the embodied Logos.” (Stăniloae 1997: 98)

“By going around the Holy Table and by kissing its corners, the future deacon or priest shows that his preoccupation and love will be moving for the rest of his life, uninterruptedly, around Christ, present in an unseen manner on the Holy Table and seen in the bishop’s person sitting next to the table.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116)

“God in Trinity has given Christ this mission of full Priest and Christ has given it to Himself as God, and not as man. And He has received it like man. “Emmanuel has made Himself a Hierarch for us and through Him we have the bringing to the Father and God and we have been renewed according to what we were at the beginning”. As Hierarch he brings us within Himself as well-pleasant sacrifice to the Father. For He brings firstly our humanity assumed by Him cleanly. By uniting Himself with us, He cleans us too, and He brings us as clean gift to God. (...) The death will no longer have power for, by bringing us to God as clean sacrifices, God fills us up with His godhead. And in the tight union accomplished between us and God, we have the source of the imperishable and endless life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 99)

“If the priest and the bishops are seen organs through whom Christ Himself as subject imparts His gifts and Himself, it is obvious they cannot take from themselves this quality as organs of Christ as Giver of His powers. Neither the Christian community can impose Christ these organs which Himself to give His powers through and to give Himself through. The acts which the community’s existence itself depend on, which are committed by priest and by bishop, and therefore the Mystery of the Ordination they are as such consecrated through, it is the condition for its prolongation and maintaining. The priest and the bishop are planted just right through their ordination as intermediary centers and means, which are visible, of the grace which the community is maintained through, for they are organs of Christ, its invisible center and spring. But the ordination isn’t done outside the community, but in its bosom, by its authorized bearers, namely by the existing bishops and by its members. And the community guarantees that these ones are given to it, through those ones, by Christ. This is for they are elevated to this quality through a visible act committed by the community’s existent bishops. And so on, up to apostles. The Ghost of Christ makes some of the community’s members as priests and bishops, through the mediation of the existing bishops, descendants of the apostles, through their prayer accompanies by the Church’s prayer.” (Stăniloae 1997: 98)

“If through the other Mysteries it is laid down a basis of a new personal life or it is promoted this life, the priestly or the episcopal ministration it is granted to the ones who already have this life and who have proven that they have truly collaborated with the grace in strengthening that life within their being.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115)

“In each Holy Mystery Christ gives Himself as a gift to the ones who believe in Him, and in the Mystery of the Eucharist He gives Himself as a gift with His body itself and with His blood itself. But being Him unseen, and still wanting to give us these gifts, namely His body and blood, in a seen mode, He gives Himself as a gift through seen persons. Christ Himself chooses these persons and sanctifies these persons through the Mystery of the Ordination. Thus, Christ is received as the One Who gives Himself as gift through the priest, in the Mystery of the Ordination Christ connects Himself with a human person, as Subject Who gives Himself to us as a gift, and He consecrates that human person as bishop or as priest, and he makes His giving seen by us through the other Mysteries. If the other Mysteries represent the means which the priest mediates us a power with, a power given us by Christ, or His body and His blood themselves, the priesthood qualified the seen person himself who fulfills these means, which Christ gives His powers as gifts through, or he gives as gifts His body and His blood through, these Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 97)

“In front of the people, in addition to the vestments representing his capacity of committer of the Mysteries, the priest is handed the Liturgy Book too, that represents the priest’s main ministration as celebrator of the Holy Liturgy. And after the transformation of the Holy Gifts, the hierarch entrusts the candidate the holy body of the Lord on a sponge in order him to hold it with his right hand crossed over his left hand, with the words: “Take this treasure and guard it until the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, when He will ask it from you”. Then the priest retires at the Eastern part of the Holy Table, keeping the holy body in his hands placed over the Holy Table, somehow identified to it. The priest will hold the Lord’s body, sacrificed on behalf of the believers, until the end of his life which, to him, it coincides to the end of the world, because like he will end his life so he will rise up in front of the Lord at resurrection, or he will show himself after his death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 117)

“In order the priest to be an image as person of the embodied Word, the Word Himself is the original Priest and the source of the priesthood. The Word of God Himself has made Himself - through embodiment - the Priest by excellence, of the creation, of the creation’s bringing back to God, of gathering again in God, the people who were scattered away from their primordial unity. The people who are in the state of scattering and of conceited individualistic affirmation: they cannot be all of them priests of this work. By making Himself man for accomplishing this gathering, because of the fact that the people experienced a community failure, Christ is the unique full Priest, for He is the unique man Who can confess Himself to the Father, with an absolute devotion. He no longer just waits for the people to gather at Him - as He did before embodiment -, in their common quality as priests and they to gather the creation too, because the people didn't answer this expectation. He makes Himself the full and clean man out of the power of His divine Hypostasis, and therefore He is the central Man, the sole man having entrance to the Father and Who can take us there too, the sole truly unifier man, for he hasn't done Himself as man, locked in a limited human hypostasis, but he has taken the human nature in His Hypostasis open to the entire mankind. He has Made Himself by this, the sole efficient Priest, by remaining God too, in Whom, as priest, and therefore as man, He gathers the people effectively. By this He gives the people back their eternal life as life out of God. He remains, by this, Priest forever and ever, the unique full Priest, the unique man in Whom we have the entrance to and the possibility of sitting next to the Father. And because of being unseen after His Ascent, Him, as the unique full Priest, He is the source of the entire seen priesthood." (Stăniloae 1997: 98-99)

"In the seen moments of the priest's ordination there are some differences, which highlight what is specific to the priestly ministration. The candidate to priesthood kneels down in front of the Holy Table on both his knees, showing that he surrenders himself in a more accentuated manner to Christ. In the first prayer, the hierarch asks Christ for the candidate to be given this great grace of the priesthood, and in the second prayer are specified the priest's ministrations, as committer of the Mysteries and as preacher of the godlike word: "He to become worthy of staying without blemish before Your altar, of promoting the Gospel of Your Kingdom, and of renewing Your people through the bath of the second birth". (Stăniloae 1997: 117)

"In the union accomplished through the common vibration of the deepest responsibility towards Christ, towards the present Church and towards the Church's eschatological future and for the whole road of the Church until then – responsibility which will be held accountable in eternity – Christ acquires to Himself, through the mediation of the bishop, a new seen organ of His work, in the Mysteries He follows to commit. In this common responsibility, the one who ordains and the ordained one they become transparent to the work of Christ Himself, for actually Christ is the One Who is working through His Ghost. If there hadn't been the Holy Ghost, there wouldn't have been shepherd and teachers within Church." (Stăniloae 1997: 117-118)

"Like Aaron and Melchisedec – anticipated images of Christ as Hierarch – didn't take the priesthood from themselves, likewise Christ hasn't taken it from Himself. Only the man who is sanctified by God can enter at God. This is for the not-sanctified man cannot enter at God, and the man cannot take the sanctification from himself. Christ as man has been sanctified by God, for He has become clean man through the initiative of the Word of God and through the work of the Holy Ghost, with the will of the Father.” (Stăniloae 1997: 99)

“No one can reach a level of the hierarchy without previously crossing through the inferior levels, starting with the lowest one, namely with the deaconate; neither one can ascend during the same liturgy from an inferior level on a superior level. This is for if the level of the hierarchy was given from the beginning, the priesthood and the deaconate would be confounded to the hierarchy and the hierarchy wouldn’t be given in a special mode. And if the deaconate was given at the beginning of the Liturgy, and later the priesthood and then the hierarchy, the hierarch wouldn’t be able to commit immediately after the whole Liturgy.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115)

“That’s why somebody is ordained as deacon after the transformation of the Holy Gifts, in order not to be possible to be ordained as priest during the same Liturgy, because of not having the possibility to officiate the transformation of the Holy Gifts, which is the essential point of the Holy Liturgy, or to put in practice at the same Liturgy the main ministration of the deacon which is that of helping the priest to impart the believers. For the same reason the ordination of the priest takes place after entering the altar with the Holy Gifts, in order to fulfill immediately, at the same Liturgy, the ministration of their transformation – the essential act of the Liturgy and of the priestly ministration during the Liturgy. After that, it would be pointless the priest to be advanced to the level of the hierarchy, because he has nothing left to do as hierarch, at the same Liturgy. And for the same reason, the hierarch is ordained after the song of the Trisagion, in order to immediately supervise that Liturgy, the reading of the Apostle and of the Gospel, which represent the teaching ministration, so essential to the bishop, and then to officiate the transformation of the Holy Gifts.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115)

“The candidates to the two inferior levels are introduced into the altar, namely to the ministration of the Christ’s sacrifice thus: the deacon to be by two deacons, and the priest to be by two priests. Those ones lead them around the Holy Table for three times. During this going around the candidates kiss each time the four corner of the Holy Table and the hand of the ordaining hierarch, who sits on a chair in the northern part of the Holy Table. In the same time with the hand, they kiss also the omophorion and the engolpion, kneeling down for three times before the hierarch. Around the Holy Table the future deacon is led by two deacons, which signifies an initiation of the future deacon in deaconate and a certain receiving of the new deacon amongst the ones of his rank. Analogue signification has also the guiding of the candidate to priesthood, by the two priests.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115-116)

“The committer of this Mystery is the bishop or his delegate – a hierarch – for the priests and the deacons called to serve in it, and for a bishop there are needed three or at least two bishops, who represent the episcopate of the respective autocephalous Church. Through this, it is maintained the unity of the priests from the eparchy and of the believers who receive the Mysteries from them, in the unique Christ, represented by the bishop, and the unity of the bishops amongst themselves in the received hierarchy and out of the Ghost of the same Christ, like that one of the apostles.” (Stăniloae 1997: 113)

“The conscience that Christ Himself is present and working in this Mystery, it unites in a deep trembling and responsibility the celebrator of the Mystery and the ones who assist him, on one hand, and with the Mystery’s receiver, on the other hand. In this encounter of souls, penetrated by the conscience and the work of the same Christ, it is committed the passing of the power of Christ from the ministrants from before, to the new one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116)

“The dean kneels then on his right knee, in front of the Holy Table, lays his hands one upon another, and he leans his head upon them. He shows by this that he is surrendering himself now as sacrifice to Christ, for on the Holy Table there is always Christ as sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116)

“The hierarch hands the new deacon the signs of his capacity of deaconship, by giving him the timetable and the little sleeves, while standing before the imperial doors, after he shows them to the believers and declares for three times: “He is worthy”, and the people answers also for three times, confirming that: “he is worthy”. To the event of the consecration of a new servant of God and of the Church, with the assent of that one, the believers can participate too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116-117)

“The hierarch takes his miter off, in order to show that not he is the one investing the candidate with the power of the deaconship, but Christ Himself is doing it. The bishop lays his right hand over the head of the candidate, as organ (“matter”) which the grace of Christ is conveyed through, and he utters the words; “The godlike grace, that one which always heals the helpless things and fulfills the missing things, promote the pious hypo-deacon (First Name), in deacon. Let’s pray for him for the grace of the All-Holy Ghost to come over him”. Although the gift of the deaconship is conveyed through the bishop’s hand, the bishop humbly declares that the grace itself is the one elevating the receiver on the level of the deaconship. But these words are only the introduction to the prayer that follows and which is uttered by the bishop, but which all the ones from the altar must associate themselves to. In officiating the Mystery, the hierarch doesn’t singularize himself, but he remains in the communion of the Church. In the first prayer the hierarch asks Christ for “giving His grace” to the one promoted as deacon. In a second prayer the hierarch asks also Christ for filling up, the one He has found worthy to enter the rank of the deaconship, with the whole faith, love, power, and holiness, through the coming of the Holy and life-maker Ghost upon that one. “This is for not through my laying down of hand over him, but through the power of your many mercies the worthy ones of Yours are given the gift.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116)

“The image of the pieces of leavened bread for the deceased and for the living succeeding in any time, it shows not only the solidarity of the ones who believe in Christ in a certain time, in their will to fructify the sacrifice of Christ within themselves, but it shows also the solidarity of all the believers of all times.” (Stăniloae 1997: 217)

“The ministration of the three hierarchical levels it is related to the Liturgy, for the duty of their members it mainly consists in committing the Mysteries and in teaching the people, and the culminant Mystery is the Eucharist, which is being done at the Holy Liturgy; and during the whole course of the Holy Liturgy the believers are mainly being given the teaching.” (Stăniloae 1997: 115)

“The Mystery of the Ordination, as those ones of the Baptism and of the Chrismation, it places the man in a fundamental relation with Christ, unlike the Eucharist and the Wedding, which strengthen this relation on the conscious plan, and unlike the Repentance and the Holy Unction which restore this relation. This relation is imprinted in the man’s being, letting within the man some traces even without the man’s will. It is something analogue to the trace left in the married couple the relation founded between them through wedding, for the rest of their life. That’s why, the Mystery of the Wedding is reckoned as well, by and large, indissoluble, and the Church isn’t happy to approve the second marriage, and it is even less happy to approve the third marriage.” (Stăniloae 1997: 113)

“The new bishop receives as vestments, over the priestly ones, the *σάκκος*¹⁶⁶, the omophorion, and the miter. By keeping the priestly vestments on, and by strengthening them through σάκκος, he will keep and complete the ministration as priest who officiates the Mysteries, not separating himself from the small eucharistic and spiritual communities, or from the concrete believers, by the fact that he owns also the level of priesthood with a more extended unifying work. By receiving the omophorion, the new hierarch assumes the pastoral responsibility for the entire community of the believers, like the Shepherd who leaves the ninety-nine sheep and goes in the search of the one in danger; this would give a spiritual signification to his imperial power symbolized by the miter. It is a spiritual power, a responsibility for the salvation of all the believers.” (Stăniloae 1997: 118)

166 The σάκκος is the vestment of the bishop, made of silk, reaching the knees and having wide sleeves, and which is worn above the surplice.

“The priest and the bishop are the organs of the Church as community. Through them the other Holy Mysteries are administrated to the believers, or they are simply attached to the Church through the Holy Mysteries which the priests officiate. The ordination makes the receiver a representative of the Church and committer of the Holy Mysteries which the Church continues to be maintained through and which the Church continues to be extended through. The Ordination is by excellence the Church’s Mystery, and the Mystery that makes Christ lived through the priest as subject chosen from amongst believers. The Ordination is the condition of the other Mysteries, though the Ordination cannot fulfill its purpose without those ones. In the beginning Christ was sent as Hierarch, and for He has become unseen, He has left the Apostles and their descendants as seen hierarchs, namely as His organs.” (Stăniloae 1997: 97-98)

“The responsibility of the hierarch to hand over the body of the Lord to the priest, and the responsibility of the receiver for receiving it, they are extended in a common responsibility in front of Christ, but also in front of the people whom to be made and kept available the body of Christ, namely Christ Himself, during the while life of the bishop and of the priest, in order to be handed over to other bishops and priests to the end of the world. The eschatological openness of the Priesthood and of the Eucharist they are highlighted through this. The priest looks at the eternal life - holding in his hand the body of the Lord – when the body of the Lord will be required from him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 117)

“Through the three knelling down done each time before the hierarch and by kissing the omophorion, the engolpion, and the right hand of the bishop, the candidate to deaconate or to priesthood shows his will to obey his hierarch, who represents Christ in a seen manner, the omophorion being the sign of the care for the shepherded people, the engolpion being the sign of his spiritual power, and his right hand being the organ through which Christ Himself conveys His work in the committed Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 116)

“When the hierarch is ordained, on the head of the candidate is laid not only the hand of one of the bishops but also the Holy Gospel, being on one hand indicated the main task the new hierarch is given to, and on the other hand being highlighted the belief that Christ Himself makes him a full organ of His. In the first prayer it is said about the “yoke of the Gospel” which the new hierarch receives, and in the second prayer, after being mentioned his duty of “bringing sacrifice and offering for the whole people”, he is appointed “steward of the grace”; then the new hierarch is placed in a special connection with Christ, Who is the true Shepherd, in order him to sacrifice as well his soul for the believers, as Christ sacrificed Himself too, making him consummate through the whole example, teaching, and work of His: “Make him Your follower, giving his soul for Your sheep, guide to the blind ones, light to the ones from darkness, rebuking the unwise ones, helper of the little children, lighter within world, for, by consummating the souls which he has been entrusted with, to stay not-confronted before Your judgment.” (Stăniloae 1997: 118)

“This fact isn’t done in a purely unseen, or spiritual, mode. This is, on one hand, for His body, although is spiritualized, it has remained a real body, and on the other hand, for our body must start from the seen earthly image had by Christ, in order to advance, at its turn, through everything Christ has crossed through, until the human body reaches its resurrection and spiritualization in the eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 9-10)

Holy Relics

“The Church honors the holy relics of the saints too, this meaning that the Church honors the saints by this, so that the people place themselves in connection with the saint through the saints’ holy relics too. The fact of maintaining the saints’ relics in a state of incorruptibility it is an earnest of the future incorruptibility of the whole bodies after resurrection and after their full deification. The saints’ relics are maintained incorruptible for within them is being maintained a godlike power from the time when the bodies were united with the soul. And even more than that, upon these relics is prolonged the accentuated state of deification the saints’ souls from the present state which they are in. This is due to the fact that the soul’s powers and the godlike grace from the soul prolong they state within body too, accomplishing a state of holiness in the body too, while the saint is living on earth, and some kind of state of incorruptibility after the crossing of the saint’s soul, through death, in the state of accentuated deification. The holy relics are thus an anticipation of the pneumatized body from after resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 236)

“Remaining incorruptible, the holy relics of the saints show that their personal soul and the grace of the Holy Ghost remain further in a connection with their bodies. That’s why the ones praying next to the holy relics of the saint they do not address themselves to the holy relics but to the saint himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 236)

“The Church and the believers have the conviction that by touching the holy relics and by addressing prayers to the saints next to whose holy relics the believers stand, often are done healings and other wonderful deeds, as in case of touching the icons, due to the godlike energies which, out of the persons of the ones who are represented in icons and, in the last analysis, out of Christ, the godlike energies are prolonged in icons or in holy relics. A reason for honoring the holy relics and for the faith in the power irradiating out of them it is given to us by the Holy Scripture through the case of the resurrection of a dead man thrown over the bones of Elisha (2 Kings 13: 21). The godlike power working through the saints’ bodies after their death, it is a continuation, but also an intensification of the power that was working through their bodies while they were alive. Even the shadow of Peter’s body has the power of healing sick people whom it was passing over (Acts 5: 15). And other sick people were healed by touching the towels which were used by Saint Apostle Paul (Acts 19: 11).” (Stăniloae 1997: 236-237)

Holy Scripture

“(...) the Scripture (is, o. n.) composed of stages, of words, and of acts, which express the resurrected Christ and they lead the ones who believe towards their fulfillment into the true Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“The Holy Scripture is one of the forms the Revelation is kept in efficiency through, as an appeal of God in continuation. The Holy Scripture represents Christ in the form of His dynamic word, and of the word, equally dynamic, of the Holy Apostles, about Christ’s savior deeds, in the permanent efficiency of these deeds. But the Holy Scripture it also describes the mode God prepared our salvation into Christ in, and the mode Christ continues to work in, through extending His power, for our likeness to Him, to the end of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“Through the word of the Scripture, Christ continues to speak to us too, to challenge us to answer with our deed, for working thus together with us. We feel through the word of the Scripture that Christ continues working within us through His Holy Ghost: “Behold, I am with you on all days to the end of the time (Mt. 28: 20)”.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“The Holy Scripture is the Word and the Son of God Who has interpreted on Himself in words, in His work of coming closer to the people for elevating them to Him, to His embodiment, to His resurrection, and to His ascent as man. He works through these words, through them he interprets Himself, upon us, in order to lead us too, to the state he reached at.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“The Holy Scripture presents what the Son of God continues going with us, from His state of consummate God and man, so that the Scripture interprets the present work of Christ. This is for Christ remains always alive and always the Same, he interprets Himself through the same words, but as the One Who wants to make us too, like Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“(...) the richness God will show us in the future ages, His integral kindness to us, comprised into Christ, they are described in the Holy Scripture. On this way the Holy Scripture is not only a book preserving the memory of what God did through the preparation of the embodiment and through the embodiment of His Son, but it is also a book telling us what does and what will do the embodied and resurrected Son of God, to the end of the time, in order to lead us too to resurrection.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“(...) in the Scripture it is described not only the descending action of God on earth towards us, to His embodiment, but also the beginning of our elevating to deification, done through resurrection, and the beginning of His action’s extending from the state of Resurrection within the beginning Church, as model of His action to the end of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 54)

“The Holy Scripture is an always actual book.” (Stăniloae 2003: 54)

“The Holy Ghost bears witness about the work of the Ghost being done in the ones who were listening to the words of Christ, or to the words of the Apostles about Christ, on the basis of His words and of His deeds, after His ascent to heavens (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 55)

“The Scripture activates its power in the communion amongst persons, in the conveying of its word with faith, from a person to another, over generations.” (Stăniloae 2003: 56)

“(...) the words of Christ or about Christ, fixed or not into the Scripture, they are means of conveying and refreshing the faith within Church, or from the Church towards the ones from outside it, concomitantly with the conveying and the refreshing of those word though the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 56)

“The state created by the producer of faith Ghost, it is deepened by the meanings of the Scripture, so that one no longer can make a separation between the word of the Holy Ghost come within us through another person and the effects the words of the Scripture have, respectively the Scripture’s content.” (Stăniloae 2003: 57)

“Immediately that one passes beyond the letter of the Scripture and beyond reading it without spiritual understanding, he finds not only the Scripture’s spiritual meanings but also the work of the Ghost of Christ, or he finds Christ Himself Who increasingly unveils His spiritual richness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 57)

“The words of the Scriptures are the inevitable occasion to enter the relation with the authentic Person of Christ, but not only read in their written form, but also by knowing their content.” (Stăniloae 2003: 57)

“The content of the Scripture (...) not being a human product but being instilled by the Holy Ghost, it must be, on one hand, guarded, and on the other hand, the Scripture must be deepened in its unaltered meanings received from Apostles.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“The Scripture had an intrinsic dynamism. Its content needs to be known, applied, and lives in an increasing depth and intensity, because the content of the Revelation is Christ Himself, the boundless Christ Who wants to be increasingly known and more impropriated, and loved increasingly intense.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“The Scripture exists and it is applied through Church. Without Church the Scripture wouldn’t have existed. The canon of the Scripture is due to the Church, to the Church’s witness. The Scripture was written within Church and the church bore witness about the Scripture’s apostolic authenticity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor regarded the whole universe of the consistent realities as an embodied speech of the godlike Logos, and therefore of Christ; and he considered the Holy Scripture like a spoken universe which expresses and interprets, in proper-said words, the incorporated universe of the rationalities of the Logos and the universe’s purpose, a purpose that is being accomplished in relation with God. Both of them express the thinking and the will of God Who has created and Who leads the creation towards the tight union with Him and, by this, towards deification. But in the most direct mode and therefore with much more power – in the degree of the most intense presence, which is the one of the face-to-face dialogues – God spoke and He speaks in Christ, as being the embodied Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 54)

“Thus, “the law was the shadow, and the prophets (the ensemble of the prophets) were the fore-imagining of the godlike and spiritual good things, from the Gospel”. In the anticipated shadow was being projected not only the not-fully discerned shape of the original, but also something from His power. This is because only a ray projected out of the original it gives the shadow its shape. In this sense, “the manna given to Israel in wilderness was the Word of God Who has destined the whole spiritual life to the ones who eat Him, and it differs from any other taste that answers the lusts of the ones who eat Him”. (Stăniloae: 2006: 9)

“Firstly, from a formal point of view, one cannot see in Gospels any tendency of building up an image of Christ, with the help of the fantasy. The life, the words, and the deeds of Jesus are presented with the simplest possible means, without any gushing up of wanted enthusiasm. There is also an amazing background consonance in describing the image of Jesus from the Gospels, although in some details and means their authors manifest quite enough liberty. In this, the authors of the Gospels prove themselves to be mastered by the “precise”, objective reality of what they describe, and they aren’t the masters of that reality. Then, no fantasy would have been able to build up such a unitary image, in the same time so unusual and though so human, of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

“The gospel isn’t in its essence, mythology, for it doesn’t personalize some nature’s forces. In the Gospel the divine Person cannot be reduced to a force of the nature, so that neither the report of the man with the divine Person can be reduced to a report with a nature’s force, but there is always highlighted the bilateral personal character of this report. This report isn’t presented in Gospel as an imagining. This is the non-mythological fund of the Gospel. Even Bultmann recognized this fund. That's why he didn't propose except a demythologizing of the mythological clothing which this non-mythological fund is dressed in, for this fund isn't mythology, in its essence. The Greek-Roman, or German, or Hindu mythology, they cannot be demythologized, for they are mythologies in their essence. Their demythologizing equals to abolishing them. But the Gospel cannot be abolished as long as the mankind will exist, either in eternity." (Stăniloae 2005: 43)

Holy Tradition

“This together-working of the Word of God and of the Holy Ghost it can be firstly noticed in Revelation, until it comes to an end in Christ, and then it can be notice within Church, through Scripture and Tradition. Especially, the important role of the Holy Ghost in accomplishing the Revelation and in the Revelation’s ulterior efficiency, it shows that the revealing of the Logos as supreme meaning of the existence, and His embodiment in the human nature, they are solidary to the act of the human nature’s spiritualization which is done through the Holy Ghost (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 41)

“The Word of God, Who, through the Revelation of the Old Testament prepares us for receiving Him, then He embodies Himself, he resurrects Himself, and He attracts us towards salvation and towards the eternal union with Him, He unveils Himself in His quality of full meaning of our existence (...) Our resurrection into Christ is thus the purpose of the Revelation and of the world. But the Holy Ghost bring within us the power of this meaning, by giving us the capacity to impropriate this meaning of the existence and to imprint ourselves with it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 41)

“(...) the Revelation, as reality accomplished into Christ and manifesting the same efficiency through the Church during centuries, it represents the Tradition. Therefore, the Tradition is the Church itself, as form of the undiminished efficiency of Christ, through the Holy Ghost, or of the Revelation accomplished in Him along centuries.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“The Tradition actualizes that dynamism of the Scripture without alter it, the Tradition itself meaning to apply and to deepen continuously the Scripture’s content. Concomitantly to preserving the authenticity of the Scripture, the Tradition performs this actualization of the Scripture’s dynamism, by its quality of true explainer of the Scripture. This explaining is, in its essence, the Apostolic one.” (Stăniloae 2003: 59)

“The Tradition – or the knowing of Christ in an identical manner – it consists in the continuous experiencing, the same and always new, of His love above knowledge and above any limit. It cannot be experienced except by concomitantly experiencing the love amongst all the believers (all the Saints), namely within Church. That’s why the Tradition is made known by the Church. Therefore, through the Church is made understood the true expressing of this love within the Holy Scripture.” (Stăniloae 2003: 60)

“So must we understand the report between the Revelation that had become permanent and that is ended into Christ, and its continuous novelty manifested through Tradition, having its base given by Apostles.” (Stăniloae 2003: 60)

“If the Scripture had had only a narrow, literal, static meaning, it wouldn’t have needed the Tradition as explaining which, though, to preserve unaltered the original apostolic meanings. But it would be absurd to admit after the Scripture a lived applying. If the Scripture hadn’t been intended to pass Christ into the life of the people, and to make the norm of this life to be according to Him, then the Scripture wouldn’t have needed to be completed by Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 61)

“The Tradition, as always enriched explaining of the same Christ, it cannot be separated from receiving Him as unchanged content of the Tradition, from the flowing of the same grace of His, or from receiving the same Person of His within Church through the Holy Mysteries and through the explicative word about Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 61)

“The Tradition has two meanings: a) the totality of the modalities of passing Christ in the human life in the form of the Church and of all His works of sanctification and preaching and b) the conveying of all those modalities from generation to generation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 62)

“The Tradition is the making permanent the conveying of the Same Christ wholly revealed – namely embodied, crucified, and resurrected – within Church, namely the permanent communication of the final dynamic state God has reached at, through revelation, in His closeness to the people. As such, the Tradition is the prolongation of the action of God from Christ, as essentially described in to Scripture. Only through the Tradition the content of the scripture becomes always alive, actual, dynamic in the whole its integrity, along the generations from history. In this sense the Tradition completes the Scripture. Without the Tradition, the Scripture or the Revelation, it doesn’t actualize the whole its efficiency, or its continuous efficiency. Without the Tradition one cannot penetrate and live the whole content of the Scripture.” (Stăniloae 2003: 62)

“The Tradition has the role of placing and maintaining the successive generations of Christians in connection with Christ, by the fact that it is, in essence, both invocation of the Ghost of Christ (epiclesis in broad meaning) and receiving of the Holy Ghost. To this are reduced the Holy Mysteries and the religious services other than the Holy Liturgy, which are asked for and which are received through the prayer, the grace and the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which sanctify not only the soul, but also the body of the man and the surrounding nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 63)

“(…) the Subject of the Tradition is God also. On the measure God is the Subject of the Tradition, the Church is a subject that endures the Tradition, or the work of the Holy Ghost done and conveys in it, through and along Tradition. But also, the Church is an active subject of the Tradition, for it asks for and it receives continuously the work of the Ghost by using the same means, in the name of the believers and, through them, the Church prepares itself for asking and receiving the Holy Ghost, and it makes efforts in order to shape itself increasingly more according to Christ through the work of the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 65-66)

“The Tradition in what concerns its content, it represents the way the fullness of the revelation of Christ is maintained, or it represents Christ as plenitude of the concrete Revelation; the Tradition as conveying, it ensures the prolongation of this content through faith. But both these sides of the Tradition are ensured through Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 66)

“The Scripture is maintained alive and efficient through Tradition, and the Tradition exists by being practiced by the Church. The Church is the environment within which it is imprinted the content of the Scripture or of the Revelation through Tradition. The Scripture or the Revelation need the Tradition as means for their content to be activate, and they need the Church as practitioner subject of the Tradition and as environment within which is imprinted the content of the Scripture or of the Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 66)

“The Church explains and applies the Scripture in its authentic content through the Apostolic Tradition preserved by it, a Tradition that has given the true explanation and applying of the Scripture. But this Tradition had formed and maintains the Church, and the Church is obliged to guard the content of the Scripture in its authentic meaning, the meaning this content it has been conveyed to it by the Apostolic Tradition, from which it cannot deviate.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“The Church appears in the same time with the Tradition, because the Tradition is the revelation incorporated within a community of believers. There cannot be incorporated the revelation except concomitantly to the forming of a community of believers who to accept and to apply the Tradition in their lives, and there is not community of believers to accept the applying of the Revelation before starting its own applying as Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 68)

“The authentic, fundamental, and normative of applying the Tradition it also depends on the revelation, on the Revelation brought to that point from which its efficiency starts. That’s why the Tradition cannot be changed or abandoned, because changing it or abandoning it, it equals to a maiming of the Revelation, it equals to maiming the Tradition’s applying in its fullness and in its authenticity, and this would mean maiming the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 68)

“But, apart from this, the churchly tradition considers the descent into hell and the resurrection, like being tied to the royal dignity. Even if the resurrection would be an exclusive act of the Father and not of Jesus Christ, which even Bulgakov does not affirm, the resurrection is no longer only an act of His humiliation, but of glorification, from the apart of the Father. The hierarchal ministration means sufferance, it means movement towards humiliation and towards annulling in death. The resurrection is therefore an act of ascent.

Of course, like the state from after the resurrection it is superior to one from the passing through hell, likewise, the state from after the ascent exceeds all of the previous states. But all of them are acts of gradual glorification, and not of humiliation and sacrifice.

The death, like the ending of the life, it was the lowest point at which Jesus Christ descended in renunciation and sacrifice. With His death it was done His “work” of salvation through pain and renunciation. It is true that, according to the Epistle towards Hebrews, the hierarchal ministration would have lasted until He had presented Himself in front of the Father with His blood, after His ascent. Though, also according to that Epistle, His hierarchal dignity lasts forever and ever (7: 24) - thereby also after the sitting on the godlike throne, which does not fit in the theory of Sergei Bulgakov.

In fact, the three dignities cannot be totally separated in order to be identified each of them to a stage of His life, like Sergei Bulgakov does, who, until around the passions, he sees the Savior only like a prophet, from the beginning of His sufferings and including the ascent, he sees in Him only a hierarchal, and after that only an emperor. The three dignities always coexist into the interweaving, though, in each stage, one of them is more prominent. When He was teaching like a prophet, Jesus did wonders like an emperor and through the teaching He was exercising an imperial power over the souls. Through the sufferings He also taught the people. And from death until the second coming, even if His dignity of emperor is very highlighted, shining in the heavenly glory, and exercising a greater power over the souls, He continues to teach through the Holy Ghost and to sacrifice Himself into the Eucharist or to intervene at the Father like a priest forever.

The presentation with His blood in front of the Father, into the Holy of the Holies, it can be understood like being accomplished in the moment of the death, because through death He reached further than any mortal, but also like a permanent presence of Him, like the One Who was crucified, in front of the Father, intervening through the remembrance – and the remembrance like a new sufferance – of this fact, for the people.

But, even if the event and the state of the resurrection are not tied to the hierarchal ministration in a principled way, though, on one hand, they do not stay on the same level with the ascent and with the state from after ascent and, on the other hand, they are superior to the life of Jesus without the body, during those three days, while His body stayed in the tomb.

For the time being we are interested in knowing in what consists of the superiority of the resurrection over the existence without a body. We know that the man, by being created like a spiritual-bodily being, he can live the fullness of his life only into this whole, namely, when both his spirit and his body are not thickened by sin, so after the resurrection. But the answer which will be limited to this general teaching it seems to be too hermetic, too cheap in unveiling of some evidence. In our corporal existence it seems not to be indications for the confirmation and for the affirmation of this teaching. Just from the phenomena which present the body like a barrier to the full development of the spiritual life, are pulled out arguments for the continuation of the soul into a fuller but bodiless life, after death.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Tradition it means making permanent the dialogue with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“The Tradition cannot exist without a Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 65)

Holy Trinity

“The knowledge about the Trinity of Persons having a common nature and the knowledge of the union of the human nature with the divine nature in a divine Person, it exceeds so much our thinking possibilities, that it cannot be but revealed. And this knowledge is revealed, as reality, in Christ. But once revealed in the reality of the person of Christ, namely lived in Him, the Trinity unveils as a real pressure also the Trinity’s quality as supreme meaning of our existence, as fulfillment of our aspiration for a ultimate meaning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 84)

“The foundation of our belief in Trinity is Christ, for He is the Trinity’s concretized and culminant Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 84)

“If there is only one person, by not communicating the being, it loses the certitude of the existence and gets lost in nature; two persons risk also sinking themselves in monotony or in nature, in their exclusivist, closed, egotistic communication between themselves. Only whether there are three persons, there can be maintained continuous refreshment for each person, as also for them taken in pairs. Only by existing three persons, they aren’t confounded to one another, or they are not totally separated from one another. Only a third person maintains between the two persons, who can change as partners, the distinct unity and the broadness of the love. Only by surpassing the twoness, the life is truly rich, and unlimited in God. Christ receives the Ghost as man for he is received as man in the perfect communion of the trinity, for through Him to be also us received in that community by grace.” (Stăniloae 2003: 89)

“The Holy Trinity decided the embodiment, the crucifixion, the resurrection, and the ascent as man, of One of the Trinitarian Persons, in order that Person to recapitulate all the people in Himself and for bringing all the people in the eternal communion with God the One in Trinity. This is a circular movement starting out of the Trinity towards us, for coming back to the Trinity together with us. A divine Person descends from the Holy Trinity in order to come back not only as divine Person, but also as human person in Trinity, having unites with him the whole humanity that wants this, for a communion with the infinite Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 92)

“But because the essence is not really given except in a subject, or in a hypostasis, we can say that the support of all the attributes of God the creatures are imparted with, even the support of the existence, it is the hypostatic - or the threefold hypostatic - divine reality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 155)

“(…) the Supreme Personal Reality, as existent or as existence by the Self, or absolute, He is not mono-personal, but He is a community of Persons. For He is life fullness. And the life fullness is being lived in the community of Persons, a community that is self-existent, supra-existent, supra-existential, and absolute. This community of Persons decides, in communion, all its aspects. This community of Persons is the common source of all the acts and of all the existing realities.” (Stăniloae 2003: 166)

“The divine supra-essence is the source of the infinity. And the divine essence is hypostatized, but is hypostatized in a Trinitarian mode. Thus, the infinity of the divine supra-essence depends on this threefold character of Person of the divine supra-essence. The Trinitarian community couldn’t be fulfilled by having a limited character of His content.” (Stăniloae 2003: 168)

“(…) the mode the three Persons do not contradict the unity of the divine supra-essence in, it is above our understanding.” (Stăniloae 2003: 171)

“Like our subject is simple in himself, but out of him endlessly sprout out thoughts, feelings, and acts, in a resembling mode, but infinite higher, it is simple in Himself also the threefold divine common subjectivity, but out of His inexhaustible abyss endlessly come out acts, through which He makes Himself known to us in a multitude of attributes.” (Stăniloae 2003: 172)

“For the things creates in the threefold divine subjectivity are many, they compose a composed world. Even more, each unity from the world is constituted out of identical or diverse elements, and therefore it is a composed one; this is because each element of a unity it has at its origin an eternal rationality and a special divine work, and the rationalities of all things and the works from their basis are united in a common rationality and work, and in the same time a very complex one, in order to create, to sustain, and to consummate a partial unity from the world, and on the general plan, the unity of the entire world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 172)

“According to the Christian teaching, it is a false eternity both that one of an unchangeable substance and that one of a continuous becoming. Above those false eternities of Parmenides’ and Hegelian provenance, the true eternity is that of the Holy trinity. The Trinity of the perfect Persons it is the plenitude; The Holy Trinity explains everything. The Holy Trinity remains eternally unchanged in His love, but the love if the life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 179)

“The knowledge is in the last analysis the loving referring of a subject to another subject. Even by referring to a subject, the subject who knows, he indirectly refers to another subject. And only in this referring it is accomplished also the self-knowledge. Only through this referring he knows himself and he actualizes himself as subject. God has such a perfect reference pole in Himself. He refers Himself as to other persons and these persons refer to none another reciprocally, and perfectly. The Father knows Himself in His referring to the Son, by knowing the Son, and by knowing Himself in the Son, in His continuous movement towards the Son Who is in Himself, and in the continuous movement of the Son towards the Father. The perfect knowledge, or the perfect omniscience of God, it consists in the fact that each divine Person knows the other One in Himself, but in His quality as another Person. Through this, each Person knows Himself and actualizes Himself, perfectly and eternally. This is due to the dynamic interiority, or to the so-called perichoresis. But this interiority mustn't be understood in the likeness of the physical interiority. This interiority consists in the fact that each Person is intentionally open to The Others and directed towards Them, in a total and infinite love, and that He doesn't keep anything for Himself, but He is wholly surrendered to The Others. This is a total and infinite spiritual perichoresis of the conscious love." (Stăniloae 2003: 241-242)

"In the reciprocal knowledge of the Trinitarian Persons as infinite Subjects, in the same time with the eternity, it is given the basis for the possibility of knowing other subjects too and therefore for creating those subjects too, subjects which are limited in themselves. God descends through His knowing love to the inferiority of the created, limited subjects; but in the same time, he elevates these subjects through His love to their interiority within Him, by opening their road towards knowing Him." (Stăniloae 2003: 242)

"Nothing can be understood without the Holy Trinity." (Stăniloae 2003: 242)

"Only the full unity and the Trinitarian knowledge explain the joy of God to know other persons too, by loving them, and the joy of these persons to know God, and to amongst them, through the union without confusion, through their "ecstasy", namely through their getting out of themselves. If there hadn't been the Trinitarian love, there wouldn't be knowledge in God and there wouldn't have been any possibility of knowledge and love between Him and the created persons. The aspiration for knowledge comes out of the interpersonal love, and this comes out of the Holy Trinity." (Stăniloae 2003: 243)

"The wisdom, in this sense, it cannot have any ground except the perfection of the Trinitarian communion. Through wisdom, God wants to lead all the things towards the perfection that irradiates out of the Trinitarian communion. The wisdom amongst us it irradiates, at its turn, out of the inter-Trinitarian communion itself. "One" in an abstract sense, characteristic to some philosophers, it cannot be wise. Where isn't interpersonal relationship, there isn't balance and measure, but exaggeration towards one side, exclusiveness. The efforts towards wisdom are involved or imposed only by the life together." (Stăniloae 2003: 255-256)

“The righteousness and the mercy of God cannot be separated in the report of God with us. The righteousness towards the creatures it has its basis in the equality of the Trinitarian Persons. But only after a benevolent descent, God creates creatures and makes them part of His happiness, according to a righteousness which reflects the equality of the divine Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 256)

“Out of the perfection of the reciprocal Trinitarian faithfulness and attention, we are imparted too, through the Holy Ghost, with the power of the faithfulness and of the attention, firstly towards God and, by doing this, also amongst us. That’s why the one who dedicates himself faithfully to God, he is “consecrated”, he is “sanctified”, and this is accomplished by receiving the Holy Ghost, and it is always accomplished for God and for the mission of bringing other people to God. This makes us be in a Ghost with the Father and with the Son.” (Stăniloae 2003: 283)

“Each divine Person gets out of Himself, totally, to the Others. But even by doing this, He doesn’t do a movement in order to realize a greater exit. This is because He is in a total manner to the Others, or He has the Others within Himself. Being in the same integral movement, one can say that They are motionless. But for They are not confounded to Each-Other, the love still is a going out, and therefore it is a movement from One to Another. There is persistence in this going out, permanently being at the end desiring it, to the Other Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 289)

“We know out of the supra-natural revelation that God subsists in three Persons. But something like that doesn’t exist in the created order and, even there had existed then it would have been totally different from the tri-personal subsistence of the infinite and uncreated essence. By that, even put it on this way, it remains a mystery to us. That’s why we mustn’t image that we have completely understood the reality of the Holy trinity, by remaining to a worldly meaning of it. In such a case we would create an idol, by stopping the movement of our spirit towards the mystery of the plenitude of the life from above understanding. But we mustn’t either renounce to this expressing, as it wouldn’t say anything real referring to God. In such a case, either we would drown ourselves in the indefinite that doesn’t give as certitude about anything – and therefore it doesn’t give us either the certitude of the eternal existence through the communion with the divine personal reality -, or we would remain with the formula of an impersonal or mono-personal God Who therefore wouldn’t be able to and available of a communion with the created persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 294)

“Only a God Who is Father and Son, explains the whole earthly paternity and filiation, says Dionysus the Areopagite, by developing an affirmation of Saint Paul (Ephes. 3: 14). The warmth of the differentiated human relations it comes out of the existence of a God Who is not stranger from the affection of such relations. But these relations are being spiritualized from God by the Holy Ghost. That's why, on the other hand, the relations of the divine Persons are incomparable and above the human paternal and filial relations, as is also the Ghost Who consummate those relations." (Stăniloae 2003: 294)

"The salvation and the deification as work of elevating the people who believe in the intimate communion with God, it isn't but extending the affectionate relations from amongst the divine Persons to the conscious creatures. That's why the Trinity essentially reveals Himself in the work of the salvation and that's why the Trinity is the basis of the salvation. Only by existing a threefold God, One of the godlike Persons – namely That One Who is in a relation of Son with Another Person and Who can remain in this affectionate relation as Son while being a man too – He embodies Himself, placing all His brothers into humanity in this relation as sons to the heavenly Father, or placing the Father in relation as Parent with all the people." (Stăniloae 2003: 296)

"Through the embodied Son we enter the filial communion with the Father, and through the Ghost we pray to the Father, or we speak to Him as some sons. This is because the Ghost unites Himself to us in prayer." (Stăniloae 2003: 297)

"The Son, by embodying Himself, He confesses as man too His love towards the Father, but an obedient love, or He reveals the Father to the people, in order these to love Him just as their Father. In the same time, the Father confesses to the Son, in His quality of embodied Son, and therefore to us too, His love as Father. And the Holy Ghost spiritualizes the humanity assumed by the Son, by deifying it or by making it able to participate to the love of the divine hypostasis of the Son towards His Father. The revealing of the Trinity, occasioned by the embodiment and by the activity of the Son on earth, it isn't but attracting us according to the grace, or through the Holy Ghost, in the filial relation of the Son with the Father. The acts of revealing of the Trinity are savior and deifier acts, are acts of our elevation in the communion with the Persons of the Holy Trinity. That's why the Holy Fathers take all the proofs for the Holy Trinity from the salvation work accomplished into Christ." (Stăniloae 2003: 298)

"A mono-personal God wouldn't have in himself the eternal love or the eternal communion, in which to desire to introduce us too. He wouldn't embody himself, but he would send us a teaching on how to live righteously, or, if he had embodied himself, he wouldn't have placed himself in a relation with God as a different person, but he would have given to himself as man too, the conscience that he is the supreme reality; and he would have given this conscience either to all the people, or he would have shown himself in quality of man too, as lacking the humbleness of the man in the relation with God, as with one who is not an own hypostasis but a different hypostasis. But we are saved in Christ for we have in Him and out of Him the whole height and the whole humbleness, the whole warmth of the communion and the eternal preservation of each person. Christ is the Son equal in being to the Father, but in a Son – Father relation and, in the same time, the Man Who prays and sacrifices Himself to the Father for His brothers into humanity, and Who also teaches His brothers how to pray themselves and how to sacrifice themselves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 298)

“When we cogitate de Fathers as not-comprised, as uncreated, we cogitate also the Son and the Holy Ghost, alike, for the infinity, the glory, the wisdom of the Father, are not separated from those of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 300)

“Each Person of the Holy Trinity, by revealing Himself in the world and by working amongst people and within people, he manifests the consummate unity with the Others Two through the being and through the perfect love for Them. But in the same time each Person of the Holy trinity brings His love to the people too, out of the love He has for the other two Persons. Our love amongst us isn’t perfect because of neither the unity amongst us, as beings, it isn’t perfect. We are called to increase the perfect love amongst us and for God, through the godlike uncreated energies - which represent the unity of being of God brought amongst us – and by increasing the unity of our human being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 303)

“The Hypostases of the Holy Trinity aren’t united in the same nature only by the thinned threads which unite Them but also separate Them in some measure. There cannot be cogitated any kind of thinning of the nature amongst Them. All Three of Them are perfectly One into Another, by possessing together the whole divine nature, and All of Them possess the entire nature in common, without any weakening of the continuity amongst Them. In order to understand in some measure this, we must keep in mind the fact that the divine nature is entirely spiritual and of spirituality above any spirituality known or imagined by us. As such, the divine Hypostases are free of any impermeability and free of the persistence in joining, of which the human hypostases aren’t totally spared.” (Stăniloae 2003: 305)

“The divine Hypostases are totally transparent to each other and bin the interiority of the perfect love. Their consubstantiality isn’t maintained and isn’t developed through thin threads which would unite Them as bearer of the same being, as it is in case of the people; but Each of Them bears in common with the Others the whole nature. They are through this fully interior to each other, not having to jump over a thinned bridge between Them, in order to be accomplished, through such a communication, a greater union amongst Them. The infinity of Each One it doesn't let the possibility of such a thinning of the divine nature amongst Them. They can be likened, as the Holy Fathers say, to three supra-luminous and supra-transparent suns, which reciprocally comprise and show one another, by bearing inseparably, the same infinite whole light." (Stăniloae 2003: 305)

"The Father, or the Sun as paternal subsistence of the infinite light, He makes to appear in Himself the Son, or the Sun as reflex of the entire infinite light, subsistent into the Father. The Father projects Himself in Himself as filial Sun, by further seeing Himself through This One, and by comprising This One, or by showing Himself more luminous through This One. And, also the Father projects Himself in Himself as another Sun, or as the Holy Ghost, by showing Himself through This One even more luminously, as the paternal Sun, and by showing also the Son, as the filial Sun. They are three real Hypostases, three real modes the same infinite light subsists in. Each of Them is transparent as bearer of the same infinite light through the Others Two, being interior to Them and having Them interior to Him. But in the spiritual order, the subsistence of the light as sun it means conscious subject. The subject cannot be separated from the conscience, and the conscience cannot be separated from the subject, and this is for the conscience is in the same time reality and power, by being always the predicate of a subject." (Stăniloae 2003: 306)

"The spiritual essence subsistent only in subject it always implies a conscious relation between subjects, and therefore it implies a hypostatizing of it in several subjects, in a reciprocal perfect penetration and transparency, in what Saint John Damascene called perichoresis. This is because of a subject cannot have a joy of existence without the communion with other subjects. In the consummate unity of the Trinity, in the conscience of Each Subject, there must be perfectly comprised and transparent the consciences of the Other Two Subjects and, through this, their bearer Subjects too." (Stăniloae 2003: 306-307)

"The supreme spiritual essence isn't a singular subject, but a communion of subjects which are fully transparent to each other. The Trinity of the divine Persons is characteristic to the divine essence, without the three Persons to be confounded in the unity of the essence." (Stăniloae 2003: 307)

"The kindness is reckoned by the school dogmatics as a feature of the divine being. But the Holy Fathers think more complexly. They do not cogitate the being as separated from the Person. The kindness of the being is shown in the relation amongst Persons. Of course, by doing so they do not confound the Persons, for the birth is an incommunicable property of the Father. But in the act of the birth, it is manifested in the same time, in a certain personal manner, the feature of the divine Person of being good. Each Person manifests the features common to the being from His own position.” (Stăniloae 2003: 307-308)

“The plenitude of the existence, that is characteristic to the divine being, a plenitude also the joy belongs to, and the full happiness that cannot have but the form of pure subjectivity, it cannot be lived by a sole self. The joy by oneself is not a full joy, neither is a plenitude of existence. And the joy of existence communicated by a self to another self, it must be in the one who receives it equally full that in the one who gives it. And therefore, also the plenitude of existence must be likewise. But this means the full giving of a self to another self – and not only a giving of something from the self, of from his good things. It must be a correlation of total giving and receiving between the two selves, in order to accomplish some sort of reciprocal comprising of the selves, who, on the other hand, they remain not-confounded in this comprising.” (Stăniloae 2003: 308)

“In the full love the person does not give themselves and they do not reciprocally accept each other, but they reciprocally and personally affirm each other, they put one another in existence by giving and receiving. The divine love is all-efficient. The Father puts the Son in existence from ever, by His integral self-giving, and the Son continuously and from ever affirms the Father as Father, by the fact He gives Himself to the Father as Son. By reciprocally affirming each other in their distinction, through the perfect love, the acts this is accomplished are acts from ever and they have a character of totally personal acts, although they are acts in which the divine Persons are together active.” (Stăniloae 2003: 308)

“If the love existentially belongs to God, then also the reciprocal relating the love of the divine Persons is manifested in, it must have an existential basis, though the positions the Persons occupy in this relating are not changed amongst them. In God there must be Father and Son and Holy Ghost. But the Persons do not change these positions amongst Them. On the other hand, for the being is one and for the love is perfect, the relating is from equal to equal, and not like from superior to inferior, neither like amongst strangers. If God had had to relate Himself to something stranger from Himself, it would have meant that He needs something different from Himself. The relating of God must take place within Himself, but still amongst different selves, in order the relating, and therefore the love, to be real.” (Stăniloae 2003: 308-309)

“In order to maintain the definition of the love as a divine existential act, and in the same time to define this act as relation, and keeping in mind that the divine being is one, it is necessary to see the divine being simultaneously as unity-relation, as relation in the bosom of the unity. Neither the unity must be crumbled in the favor of the relation, nor must the relation be annulled in favor of the unity. Or, the Holy Trinity is above the difference between unity and relation as we understand them. The reciprocal relating is an act, and this act is existential within God and in the same time it indicates a distinction of the Ones Who relate to One Another. The relating is common within God, though Each Person has another position in this common act of the relating.” (Stăniloae 2003: 309)

“To each Trinitarian Subject the Others Two are internal to Him. To each Trinitarian Subject are, in the same time, transparent to Him the Others Two, as other Selves of His. The Son appears in the conscience of the Father through the act of the birth as another Self (ἄλλον εαυτον). According to the Holy Fathers, if the Self of the Father hadn’t known Himself or he wouldn’t have in the mirror of His conscience the Son as another conscience of His. This doesn’t mean that the Son brings to the Father the knowledge about Himself, but that the Father, only for He is as Father the subsistence of the divine essence, therefore for He is the birth-Giver of the Son, He knows Himself. In other words, the divine essence is light only because it subsists in Three Hypostases; or that fact that the divine essence is light it is shown in the fact that it exists in Three Hypostases Who know each other.” (Stăniloae 2003: 309-310)

“The Self of the Father knows Himself by the fact that He knows Himself from His image in the Son, like the Son knows Himself by looking at Himself in the Father Who is His model. The Subject of the Father gives Birth to an image of His, in order to know Himself through that image. But the condition of His real knowing, it is not given to Him by a simple thought image of His, but by a real image, that shows Him by its existence not only what He can think at, but also what He can do and how He can love, namely this is an image that receives also, through this, the being of the Father. The Father knows Himself in the Son and through the Son, only because the Son as real image of the Father he projects towards the Father His existence as Son of the Father; but also, the Son knows Himself through this. The Father knows Himself into the Son not as in a passive image of His, but as in an active image, that turns also towards the Father His knowledge about Him, a knowledge that has become possible for it has been born as perfect image of the Father.” (Stăniloae 2003: 310-311)

“God is pure Subject, of Trinity of pure Subjects. The whole divine essence, that is threefold subsistence spiritual essence, it is made subject or it is made threefold subject. The subsistence of the divine being it isn’t else but the concrete existence of the divine subjectivity, on three ways that interpenetrate each other, and threefold in a threefold inter-subjectivity. No one of the Three Subjects sees anything like object in the Persons of the Others, neither in Himself as pure subject. If they had had within them something as object, that fact would have diminished Their full openness towards the other Two Subjects, and They wouldn't have had Themselves as three subjective consciences perfectly interior to One Another. And this would have made Them, in some measure, to treat One Another as object, and therefore there wouldn't have been a perfect communion amongst Them. This would have made each Subject not to be fully open and transparent and in a perfect communion with the Others." (Stăniloae 2003: 312)

"The pure character of the divine Subjects implies a full inter-subjectivity of Theirs. That's why we talk about a unique God and about three Selves. The Three Subjects do not detach One from Another, or from the conscience of the Others, to show the godhead existing separately. The subjectivity of no divine subject is being narrowed, nor widened, but it comprises somehow the Other too. Each one lives the modes of living of the divine being, not as His, but as Theirs." (Stăniloae 2003: 313)

"The Father, by eternally giving birth to the Son, He doesn't make the Son, by doing so, an object of His. That's why the Christian teaching uses also the expression: "The Son gives birth to Himself out of the Father", and not only the expression "The Father gives birth to the Son". And the birth is eternal – a fact that indicates a character of pure subject also of the Son. The birth of the Son out of the Father it indicates only the unchanged position of the Father as Giver and of the Son as receiver of the existence and the connection between Them through the act of the birth. Both of Them live this eternal act as subjects, but They live it in common, or in an inter-subjectivity that doesn't confound Them, for Each One lives that fact from His own position." (Stăniloae 2003: 313)

"To the Orthodox theology it is unknown the terminology of the catholic theology about a generatio activa and a generation passiva, the first term being attributed to the Father and the second term being attributed to the Son. The Son isn't passive in His birth out of the Father, though He isn't the Subject Who gives birth, but the Subject Who is born. The term proceeding referring to the Holy Ghost it doesn't indicate, at its turn, any passiveness of the Holy Ghost, a passiveness that would make Him in some regards an object of the Father. The Ghost "from the Father proceeds", said the Savior (Jn. 15: 26). The Ghost is in an eternal movement of proceeding out of the Father, like the Son is also in an eternal movement of being born out of the Father. But neither the Father is, because of that, in a passiveness. The Ghost proceeds, but the Father is the One Who proceeds Him. The proceeding of the Ghost out of the Father it is at its turn also an act of pure inter-subjectivity of the Father and of the Ghost, without confounding to One Another. And in an not-understood way, the Father being both the source of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, Each of Them lives together with the Father not only in the act of His coming from the Father, but They participate joyfully together with the other one to the living of the act of That One's coming out, but from His own position. All Three live in an inter-subjectivity the act of the birth of the Son and the act of the proceeding of the Ghost, but Each of Them from His own position, this fact forming again a community amongst the Three Hypostases." (Stăniloae 2003: 313-314)

"The term inter-subjectivity highlights the positive communion taking place amongst the Person of the Holy Trinity, between the acts of the birth and of the proceeding, whilst the expression oppositio relationis which is used by the catholic theology following to Thomas Aquinas, in order to indicate the reports produced by these acts amongst the divine Persons, it less highlights this reciprocal communication and communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 314)

The community is shown not only through being, but also through the personal characteristics themselves. The "opposition" between the Person of the Holy Trinity it is the specific brought by Each of Them in communion; it is the mode a Person communicates with Another Person in the act of His coming out, by giving and by receiving, and through this, upholding on One Another in What They are. But the communion doesn't always need such acts of coming out One from Another. The Holy Ghost doesn't need an act of coming out from the Son in order to accomplish a communion between Him and the Son, in order to be in an inter-subjectivity with the Son. They are in this inter-subjectivity by the fact that They are both from the Father and within the Father and Each of Them enjoys the Father together with the Other One, not only through the act Himself is originated from, but also by the act the Other One is originated from, by rejoicing in the same time Each One together with the Other One, for Both of Them are originate by One and the Same source. This fact was expressed by some Byzantine Father and writers through the "shininess" of the Ghost out of the son, or through the "resting" of the Ghost into the Son. Both of Them are coming out of the Father, and they rejoice together with the Father for the fact They come out of the Father, but they also rejoice with One Another for the fact of this provenance. The pure inter-subjectivity of the Three Person is manifested also in the fact that They reciprocally affirm One Another as distinct Persons." (Stăniloae 2003: 314-315)

"The inter-subjectivity and the reciprocal affirming, it makes that the Father, by living on Himself as Father, he lives as Father the whole filial subjectivity of the Son; the subjectivity of the Son is interior to the Father but like to a Father. The subjectivity of the Son is endlessly more interior to the Father than it is to an earthly father the subjectivity of his son, or than it is interior to a mother the filial subjectivity of her son, making her able to substitute herself to her son and to live more intensely than her son his joys and his pains. But like the heavenly Father lives also the subjectivity of His Son in His parental subjectivity, without mixing the two subjectivities, but by intensifying them, likewise the Son lives the parental subjectivity of the Father in His filial subjectivity, or as Son. Everything is common and perichoretic in Trinity, without in this common movement of the subjectivity of One within Another to be confounded the distinct modes of the together living of this subjectivity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 315)

“In God each Self is and comprised everything, but His perfect happiness consists in the fact that each Self, Who is everything, He comprises the other Selves, Who are also everything at Their turn, Each of Them being everything in reciprocal comprising. These Selves do not welcome One Another from exterior, as the human selves do, for They are forever consummately interior to One Another, but They aren’t identical to Each Other – and the human selves aspire to become themselves like that. And the divine whole (or the infinite godlike being) isn’t externally multiplied as in the case of the people, for in such a case the Godhead would no longer be absolute. The divine whole remains consummately one and though It subsists in three modes as Persons, each mode perfectly comprising in Himself the Other Two modes. The divine whole is in an ontological dialogue in Three. No Partner to the dialogue brings to the dialogue content from outside. Each of Them has the infinite divine whole in the dialogical communion with the Two Other Selves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 316)

“The difficulty for our understanding it consists in the fact that to God, a Self is the titular of what Another Self has, whilst to the human beings, each self is titular of a content mostly different from that of another self. It would be like another self, interior to my self, it would be the titular of everything that I am, but I remain also the titular of what I am and using it like the perfectly identical content of a dialogue, the dialogue of a giving and of a receiving, or of a tireless love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 316)

“To God is not possible that a Self affirms before Another Self, but a Self continuously reckons the other Self as His replacement. Each one is seen only in relation with the Other One, or he looks at the Other One, or He sees Himself in the Other One. The Father doesn’t see Himself except as subject of the love towards the Son. But the Self of the Father isn’t lost by doing so, for he is affirmed by the Son, Who, at His turn, He doesn’t know Himself except by fulfilling the will of the Father. But just by doing so it is being intensified in the Father the feeling of the paternity, and in the Son the feeling of the filiation. This is the movement of each Self around Another as a center (περιχώρησις = circumcessio). Not One Person unveils His Self, but two Persons unveil the third Self; but They neither unveil their Selves in exclusivity, but they put in front the Other One, by making Themselves transparent to That One, or – to say so – hiding Themselves under That One.” (Stăniloae 2003: 317)

“In this forgetfulness of the Self of Each Person for Another, it is manifested the perfect love and only that one makes possible the unity opposed to the individualism. The sin of the individualism impedes us to understand the fullness of the love and of the unity of the Holy Trinity, which still preserves the Persons.”

“Only this desire of Christ, the One Who dwells within us, of substituting His own Self with the Self of the Ghost, and vice versa, it engages us too in starting the substitution of our self for the Self of the Ghost and for the Self of Christ and for the self of our neighbor, restoring thus our unity of nature which has been macerated by sin. That’s why the work of our salvation, as work of our unification into God and amongst us, it cannot be but the work of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 317)

“There doesn’t exist anything that is totally separated from other things, neither is there a unity without containing a distinction. Consequently, all the numbers are in the same time a unity, and any unity is in the same time a number: and any one is a multiple too, and any multiple is one too. Both of them are affected by relativity. The reality is beyond one and multiple. This characteristic is eminently held by God. He is eminently One and Three, or, better said, beyond the ways one and three are to us. The Three Subjects are so interior in Their unity of not-dispersed being, that They cannot be separate in any way, in order to be counted as three entities with some discontinuity amongst Them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 318-319)

“The number that represents by excellence the distinction within unity, is the number three. Two doesn’t tell us what is actually comprised in unity. This can be actually observed on the plan of the subjects, where is shown the true signification of the distinction within unity, or of the unity in the distinct ones, and the purpose of this paradoxical constitution of the reality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 319)

“A subject who is unique in an absolute sense, he would be deprived of the joy, and therefore of the meaning, of the existence. He would doubt even about his existence. His existence would be mixed with the dream. According to our teaching, a subject and an object, or a world of objects before that subject, it would maintain the subject in the same loneliness lacking the joy and a certain meaning of the existence. ‘What would profit a man by gaining the whole world, but he loses his soul’ (Mt. 16: 26). A subject and an object aren’t twoness, because the object doesn’t get the subject out from within the incertitude of the existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 319)

“Two subjects accomplish through their communion some consistency and a joy and a meaning of the existence. But neither this real twoness - that is in the same time a dialogic unity based on the unity of being - it isn't sufficient. The communion in two it is also a limitation from two points of view. In the first place, the communion in two it doesn't open the whole horizon involved by existence. The two ones not only open to one another, but they also get closed to one another. The other one becomes not only window to me, but also a wall. The two ones cannot live only out of themselves two. They must have the conscience of a horizon that stretched beyond them, but in connection with both of them. And this horizon cannot be constituted by an object or by a world of objects, which cannot get them out of the monotony of a narrow sight, or of loneliness in two. Only a third subject ring them out from their incessant loneliness in two - who can also be partner of communion and who doesn't stay in front of them passively as an object does.” (Stăniloae 2003: 320)

“If the self-lacking any relation, he can be represented as a dot, and the relation between two subjects it can be represented as a line connecting a dot to another, their relation with a third one it can be represented by a surface that comprised everything within, more precisely it is a triangle. This intentionality is being accomplished in the divine Trinitarian communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 320)

“The limited horizon or an exclusive communion between two persons it is tied to a love with a limited objective. Because of that, if such a communion doesn't satisfy either the people, the less it satisfies God. Though the Father and the Son give Themselves to One Another entirely in Their love, out of this love it must be removed any meaning of egotism in two, which would contradict the divine infinity. This does everything that is outside, or it keeps everything that differs from Them two, in an eternal nothingness, or, the most, on a level of eternal inferiority. But such an exclusivist love for another it implies in it a fear too, an incertitude, and a jealousy. The third one is the fire trial of the love between two. Only through the third one, their love proves to be generous, capable of stretching to subjects from outside them. The exclusivity between two it makes impossible the generous overflowing over the wall of the prison in two.” (Stăniloae 2003: 321)

“The subjective-objective consistency is fully ensured in God by the fact that He is in Three Persons. A sole person could be considered that is only cogitation, and two persons sunk in their exclusivist communion they can have too the impression they have gone out from reality. Only a third Person assured Them that They are in an objective reality which overcomes Their dual subjectivity. This if because of despite the fact that the Third Person is at his turn lived as subject too, though, by the fact that that he is live by Other Two, he gives Them the feeling of Their own objectivity. A common object that would be necessary to Them, it would circumscribe Them, but a Person Who is equal to Them, He lives Them in Their not-circumscribing, and He widens Their not-circumscribing by making it fully 'objective'." (Stăniloae 2003: 322-323)

"At God, this relating is perfect and permanent. So that there doesn't exist a third one in a proper sense, namely with the meaning that the third one would be outside the direct me-you relation. This is the more as each Person sees through each Person also the Another, or He sees in Himself the Other Persons. At God the relations we-you or me-you, but also me-you-you, take place simultaneously. Each divine Subject is capable of paying this simultaneous attention to Others, take individually or by two. A fourth one is no longer necessary for actualizing the plenitude of the existence, or for confirming the Two in existence. The third one represents everything that still can be beyond Them, the whole reality the Two Ones can be confirmed by. The fourth one in God, he would disperse and limit the third one, he would diminish the third one's importance. The fourth one would mean that the whole objective horizon, the Two Ones are in, is no longer concentrated in a sole Person." (Stăniloae 2003: 324-325)

"By accentuating the love between the Father and the Son until it confounds Them in a single principle of the proceeding of the Holy Ghost, the catholic theology no longer sees in Those Ones as distinct Persons. And this makes impossible even the love between Them. This is because of no longer existing as Two Persons in the act of the proceeding of the Ghost, the Father and the Son no longer can actually love One Another. The existence of the Ghost as the Third One, or His role of showing the greatness of the love between the Father and the Son and of keeping Them as distinct Persons, it becomes pointless. The Ghost is no longer actually the third one, but He is the second one. The Ghost is rather seen as the One Who sinks, the Two Ones in an indistinct unity. And if the Two Ones, in order to proceed the Ghost, in common, are sunk in an indistinct whole, the Ghost as result of this indistinct whole he no longer can be a person either." (Stăniloae 2003: 326)

"The Trinity of Persons ensures the fullness of Their communion, also in the fact that it makes this communion full of the joy of a Person Who rejoices of Another Person. Between two, the joyfulness isn't full because isn't communicated, by Each of Them, to a Third On. The Father rejoices of the Son, but He wants to communicate this joy to a Third One, in order that joy to be full. This doesn't mean that the Son must gives existence, at his turn, to a Person who differs from the Father, to Whom the Son to communicate His joy. In such a case, the Son too will lock Himself, from the Father, in the communion with a different Person. On this purpose, the Father proceeds a Third Subject, Who is directed together with the Father entirely towards the Son. The shared joy the Father rejoices of the Son, it fills the Son up with an increased joy of the Father. In addition to that, the Son too, He shares His rejoicing of the Father to this Third Subject, without needing to proceed Him at His turn, once there exists the proceeding from the Father. The Ghost participates to the joy the Father rejoices of the Son with, and through this the Ghost shines out of the Son too. The Son Himself appears shinier to the Father, for he rejoices of the Father not only as consistent image of the Father, but also together with the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 330-331)

“The Holy Ghost connects the Father and the Son, but without ceasing to be a distinct Person and without proceeding from the Son. In this sense the Ghost is also “the Ghost of the Son”, but the Son remains “Son” in this shining of the Ghost out of Him, and he doesn’t become the Father of the Ghost. The Ghost isn’t the joyfulness itself, but He is the One Who, by participating to the Father’s rejoicing of the Son, and to the Son’s rejoicing of the Father, He shows in its fullness the One’s rejoicing of Another, or of all the Three Ones’ rejoicing of all the Three Ones.” (Stăniloae 2003: 331-332)

For the Ghost isn’t only the One Who participates to the Father’s rejoicing of the Son and to the Son’s rejoicing of the Father, but he also is the One Who rejoices of the Father and of the Son, He isn’t a Third One in a rigid meaning of the word. But for the Son has the special position as image of the Father, and the Ghost is being proceeded on the purpose of participating to the Father’s rejoicing of the Son as image, the Ghost has in the relation with the Other Two Persons the special role of the One Who is proceeded on the purpose to make each Person’s rejoicing of Another to be a joyfulness participated by Another. Only in this sense He is counted as the Third One. Otherwise, The Ghost can be called, as well, the Second One as the Son is (another Second One), or, for both the Son and the Ghost are in the same time with the father and together with the Father, All of Them are the First One. In Trinity there isn’t a number “after” and a number “before”. “The Three Ones in Trinity, They transcend any mathematic number”. (Stăniloae 2003: 332-333)

“(…) the Revelation is the work of the Son and Word of God, according to Whose model the man is created, for the Son has His origin into the Father and the Son answers the calling of the Father; but the Revelation is the work of the Holy Ghost too, as That One spiritualizes us continuously, strengthening us increasingly more in the loving freedom that was liberated from the nature’s automatism.” (Stăniloae 2003: 41)

“The Word and the Holy Ghost, They are the two Persons Who are doing together and Who solidary actualize the whole Revelation and its efficiency, to the end of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 42)

“Between the Word and the holy Ghost there is reciprocity of the revealing, and both of Them accomplish a revealing of the Father and a common spiritualization of the creation. Never is the Word deprived of the Ghost, Who makes us to receive the Word, and neither the Holy Ghost is deprived of the Word with Whom He unites us increasingly more. But each of Them has His own position in the revealing action, according to the position They have in the internal life of the Holy Trinity. That’s why They are always together. As in the Holy trinity, the Holy Ghost, resting Himself upon the Son, or shining out of the Son, it shows the Son to the Father, and the Son shows to the Father the Ghost, existing between them a reciprocity, likewise in the Revelation and in its later efficiency, the Son sends into our intimacy the Ghost, and the Ghost sends the Son, or the Ghost brings the Son in front of our soul’s sight, or even within us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 42)

“In the Old Testament, the Holy Ghost prepared the coming of the Word into body, and the Word, once come into body, he prepares the coming of the Holy Ghost Who will prepare, to the end of the world, the second coming, that one into glory, of the embodied, resurrected and ascended Word.” (Stăniloae 2003: 43)

“(…) the full result of the work of the Ghost in the humanity of Christ it is Christ’s Resurrection. That’s why, out of Christ’s resurrected state, it irradiates the whole work of the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 46)

“(…) since Resurrection, the Ghost overwhelms the body of Christ, and since Pentecost, the ones who believe in Christ they feel the full power of the Ghost irradiating out of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 46)

“(…) there is not about an alternation between the direct and the indirect presence of the Son and of the Ghost, but it is about a progress in our spiritualization in the same time with the progress of the Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 46)

“Properly-said, the work of Christ is one with the work of the Holy Ghost within Church. The Holy Ghost imprints inside the human subjects the godlike work that is one with that of Christ, and it deeply imprints in each human person the image of Christ, but without confounding them or without making them uniform.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“The godlike Hypostasis of the embodied Son and the godlike Hypostasis of the Holy Ghost, in Their work within us, They keep in account the specificity of each of us, by letting us as distinct hypostases, likewise the Hypostases of the Holy trinity are too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“The Hypostasis of the Son as embodied Hypostasis, He has become the fundamental Hypostasis of the Head-Hypostasis of the Church, and he works from within Church in each limb of the Church according to that limb’s personal specificity. The Hypostasis of the Ghost, though He is within Church as Hypostasis too, he doesn’t become a Church’s hypostasis in the sense the embodied Son is, for the Ghost hasn’t embodied Himself, as the Son has done, in the first fruit of the human nature, through what human nature Christ extends His embodiment within other people, namely within Church. But, for since the Ascent of the embodied Son, the interpenetration of the Ghost with the Son is being done also with the Son as man, the Ghost accomplishes some kind of interpenetration with Christ also in Christ’s quality as Hypostasis extended with His body, as Person, in the Church’s body. Thus, the Holy Ghost extends the connection of the Son with the Father within the mysterious body of the Son too. By this, there takes place an intimate interweaving of the Church with the Holy Trinity, an interweaving that will become consummate in the future life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“If the Father is within the Son and the Son is within the Father, They will work together in Their dwelling within the Church, or within the believers, but They won’t be confounded to One Another; likewise, is the Son is within the Ghost and the Ghost is within the Son, in Their presence within the Church, they will be united but not confounded.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“The work the man becomes subject to, it is the work of the entire Godhead, a work the man accepts it by renouncing to himself; this work doesn’t belong only to the Ghost, but it belongs to the Son too, for the Son gives the man the power of renouncing to himself, by His sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 2006: 137)

“Becoming a man, the Word of God hasn’t multiplied the Trinity’s Hypostases, and He hasn’t broken either His unity of being with the Father and with the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 46)

“Without any doubt, our intimacy, or the intimacy of the Church, in which Christ dwells after Ascent, it is not itself the “throne” the Father sits together with the Son. The Father and the Son always are above our intimacy, for Them to be able to come in our intimacy from there. The Father and the Son “come” through the Holy Ghost, into our intimacy, or They are coming in an increasingly higher measure, or They also may not to come; it isn’t our heart the last place from where springs out the presence of the Father and of the Son. The godlike throne is the supreme level of the existence, the supreme level of transcendence, or the fundamental ultimate and endless source, from where all the things have their beginning and cause. And there is also the supreme state of spiritualization of the Son’s body, which coincides to the full communion of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 79)

“On the other hand, the “coming” of Christ and of the Father from Their throne into our intimacy, it doesn’t mean They move Themselves from a place to another, but it only means Their entering – They, or the supreme foundation and source of the existence – inside us, or our placing in unmediated connection with this living foundation or endless source of the existence, without this living and endless foundation of the existence to remain different from us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 79)

“The Eastern Christendom, by highlighting so much the presence of Christ and of the Father, through the Holy Ghost, it affirms an immeasurable efficiency of Theirs, or of the Holy Trinity, within believers, even in this life, if the believers strive to clean themselves, of sins and of the passions, which keep them locked in themselves. By this, the believers are kept in unity and led on the road of the holiness, in the image of the holiness of Christ’s body; the culminant state of spiritualization the Christ’s body is in, is a state of irradiation of the Holy Ghost, the Holy Ghost being in His fullness present in this consummately transparent body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 79)

“The presence of the Ghost within us it is so tightly tied to the presence of the Son and of the Father than “if the Ghost hadn’t been present, we couldn’t have been able to call Jesus as Lord”. But without the Ghost “we couldn’t have been able to call God too, as Father”, so that we couldn’t have been able to utter the Lord’s Prayer.” (Stăniloae 2006: 83)

“The Ghost works out of Christ, within us, for the Christ’s body has become shiny through His transparency, by the fact that irradiates out of Him the light of the endless power and love of God; or, the Ghost makes Christ obvious as God, as Lord, having this efficiency not because we notice Christ without His body, but through His body itself fully become transparent.” (Stăniloae 2006: 83)

“We entered, through the Son as man, the intimacy of the infinite love of God and this infinity of the godlike love irradiates upon us also through the Person of the Ghost, but without the Son and His filial feeling towards the Father to remain far from us. The sent gifts aren’t exterior to the Lord’s body, but these gifts come out of the fullness He has elevated Himself to, through death and resurrection. The Ghost comes a bearer of the infinity of the love of the Father towards His Son, for this infinity embraces us too, through the Son, and it is communicated us too, through the transparency of the Son. In the Son’s transparency it is shown, not only to us, the godhead of the Father and His love, but also to the Father are shown the human persons who believe in Christ and who open themselves to the Father, in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 84)

“Just through this the Ghost can reveal Himself, to us, as Hypostasis too, namely in an especially accentuated and sensitive mode, in the spiritual meaning of the word, like it fits Him; in a mode the Ghost couldn’t show Himself before Christ and not even before the death, the resurrection, and the Ascent of Christ with the body to heavens. This is because the Ghost cannot fully enter except a body and that body must have become fully spiritualized and transparent. But this means that now Christ Himself is showing the Ghost as Hypostasis, as before the Resurrection the Ghost was co-working with Christ, in order to show the Son more clearly, as divine hypostasis through embodiment and through the deeds Christ was committing, inclusively by enduring the death and especially through resurrection. One can say that, on the measure Christ was making His Hypostasis increasingly clearer, the Ghost was becoming, as Hypostasis, clearer too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 84)

“The Ghost comes as Hypostasis, for in His plenitude of Hypostasis, He has placed, in Himself, in the ascended body of the Lord. The Ghost as Hypostasis could show, on Himself, to us, only in the body of Christ that has become fully transparent to the infinite and fully intensive depths of God, in the work of these depths towards us. Only in quality of Hypostasis the Ghost makes felt, with the whole power, the presence of His godlike work. The not-fully transparent presence of the Ghost in Christ, from before resurrection, was due to the fact that the body of Christ was at its turn not-fully transparent in the conditions of the terrestrial existence. The full transparency of the Ghost through the Lord’s body after resurrection, it is due to a spiritualization of the body of the Lord, which makes Christ as Hypostasis more felt too, more felt in the intensity of His work. That’s why the full transparency of the Ghost is, in the same time, a much-increased spiritual transparency and intensity of Christ’s presence.” (Stăniloae 2006: 85)

“We must not reckon that the Holy Ghost and Christ successively pass from the foreground on the second plan, or in the role of being environment for the other one. During the Christ’s life on earth, the Ghost wasn’t fully revealed as God, with the accentuated intensity of His work, and that’s why neither Christ was fully revealing, on Himself, as godlike hypostasis. After Ascent, through the full showing of the Ghost, is known in an increased also Christ as God; or Christ fully reveals Himself as godlike Hypostasis by the fact that Christ reveals Himself through the Ghost, or the Ghost Himself can reveal Himself as hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 85)

“The Holy Ghost showed, on Himself, on Pentecost, at the beginning of His irradiation out of the humanity of Christ, in some more sensitive manner, on one hand in order to convince the Apostles and the people who didn’t belong to the Church, of this beginning of His irradiation; on the other hand, because still Christ didn’t irradiate then, but incompletely, in people as godlike hypostasis. From this point of view one can say that, through the descent of the Holy Ghost, the Church it was concretely brought to existence, for Christ descended, for the first time, within hearts.” (Stăniloae 2006: 85)

“While the Holy Ghost hasn’t assumed the human nature as His image, and therefore the Holy Ghost cannot be considered as man’s model, Christ, by assuming the human nature as His image, He is thought as a model of the man. But the man cannot become, in an actual manner, a full image of Christ without the work of the Holy Ghost, or without the help from the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 88)

“The unmediated connection or relation each believer has with Christ, but only within the frame of His unique body, it also united the believers with one another. On the other hand, this unmediated connection with Christ, God Who has become man, it makes the people too, victorious over all the powers and the impulses which would attract them downwards and which would keep them locked up in their egotism and in the immanent horizon of the death and of the corruptibility. This fact makes easier to them, at its turn, the together-union in the infinite and free ambience of the Ghost or of the loving communion of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

“The Christendom affirms the belief that the contradiction is the expression of the sin, and the sacrifice, far from being contrary to the movement, it is a convergence movement towards advancing. Thus, the movement doesn’t lose its sense by eternally turning around in a circle, but is bring the partners to an always more deepened knowledge of the infinity of the Trinitarian being and love, fact that gives the human persons the possibility of a eternally new participation to this infinity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 72)

“But, why would be the intentionality towards communion, among the Holy Trinity, only belonging to the Son? Doesn’t this intentionality fall to every Trinitarian Person and, for Each of Them is Person on the plenary degree, why aren’t Each of Them called as the Word?

Of course, Each Trinitarian Hypostasis is a consummate intentionality towards communion and therefore a Person on the supreme degree, but the Son’s intentionality carries a special character. The Trinitarian Persons, namely the divine intentionality towards communion, are not uniform, but Each One has His own character. The Son represents in a special mode: the reverence, the obedience, the serving, the obligation, in report with the Father. The Father is: the generosity, the dedication, the first word. But if the meaning and the power of the word stays into dialog, what makes the word a so-called word and it is not let to a sole way, as monolog, it is the second part of the dialog: the answer. The fulfilling of the word, what is tensely expected, it is the answer. BY answer it is accomplished the resting of the communion, it manifests the fulfillment of it, the evidence that it is not only a me, but a duality of persons. The Son, by being the second Trinitarian Person, He is the first sign of the personal character, wanting communion, of God. "Give me a word", "tell me a word" - we often hear a man begging to another. His question does not comprise yet the surety of the existence of a communion, the surety of righteousness, of the possibility of the real word. The question is not yet the fulfilled word; even if there is an overwhelming intentionality towards communion.

The Father has the first word, but the plenitude of the Trinitarian communion it is shown through the importance of Son, like the fulfiller of the word.

This might be the motif why the Son is named right on His place into the Holy Trinity, the Word. In the character of obligation of His Person we do not find then also the motif of the particular resemblance between His Person and the human persons. No man has the possibility to be the primordial and generous so-called intentionality. What can he give to the fellow humans? His natural situation is the one of humbleness, of assuming the responsibility, of obligation, and of serving. And the Son, He is under this aspect, the man's heavenly model, He is the un-created Man. The eternal obligation, in the same time free and loving one, into the bosom of the divinity, this is the great, but also the comforting mystery of the Christianity, which stays at the basis of the man's salvation.

We specify also here that the intentionality towards communion and the obligation of the Son inside the Holy Trinity, it must be conceived differently from all the correspondent characteristics of the man. According to the things we have told related to the reciprocal love between divine Persons, the Son's intentionality towards communion - which is otherwise commune to all the three Persons, like a characteristic of the Person - it is not clasped with the insufficiency sentiment, like it is clasped to the man, but it is a positive tendency of love for the Father, from the superabundance of His existence, which He receives it continuously from the Father, like a manifestation of Him towards the Son¹⁶⁷." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁶⁷ Over all we don't forget even for an instant that God is beyond any human idea, and any attribute from the world it can't be address Him directly. The negative theology is right when denies to God even the existence, in the sense that at Him there doesn't exist something like our existence. But isn't less true that all what is positive and good in the world it has its cause in God and so in a superior mode, an unspeakable one, it is comprised into God. Cf. A. Koyré, W. c. p. 225: "Ja es soll alles aus dem Nichts entstehest, weil das Entstehungsprinzip, die

“The Christian teaching tells us about the God in Trinity that in God is from ever and ever a richness of unlimited life but, just because of that, in Him is a richness of the perfect love. Each divine Person is open to the Others Two, with the infinity of His love, for each One of Them is totally self-give to the Other Two. The Son has His total infinity from the Father, and, at His turn, the Son gives His infinity as a gift, to the Father. And the Holy Ghost, likewise, He has His infinity from the Father, as being gives as gift to the Son and together with the Son giving Themselves as gift, to the Father, and when the world is created, the Holy Ghost gives Himself as a gift, together with the Son and with the Father, to the man, who opens himself to the Son. The Father knows in Himself the same being as in the Son but, like One Who gives that being within the Son too, the Father also knows that being in the Son too, but as given back, by the Son, as a gift, to the Father. They know one another, therefore, as having the same being, but a being that is on each time lived with another personal feeling. This makes possible to the people too, to know one relatedly to another.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 29-30)

“If Christ hadn’t been from a heavenly Father, and if He had been like any man, then He wouldn’t have been God. And if He hadn’t been the Son of God, the people would have been right to not believe in Him. In the faith in Christ, it is Implied the faith in the Holy Trinity. A God Who isn’t in Trinity, He isn’t God. In such a case the world would have been the sole reality.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 82)

“The freedom lived within some margins by the human persons in their relations and acts, it must have its origin in a supreme existence, whose freedom cannot be restricted by anything. That existence is cogitated by the Christian teaching as a unity in Three Persons of-the-same-being, having in Them the limitless life from ever and endlessly, Persons Whose names show Them as being in a relation of perfect and eternal love. This is for One of Them is the Unique Father, and other is the Unique Son, and Who can be more loving and more loved than a supreme and unique Father in relation with a supreme and unique Son, and vice versa? And another Person is the Holy Ghost proceeding out of the Father and resting Himself upon the Father’s Unique Son; the Father and the Son have thus the One Who shows letzte Quelle, aus der die Welt entspring und die sie erklären soll, augenscheinlich von dem enthalten darf, was die Welt selbst enthält, sonst könnte es eben nicht letztes Prinzip und Quelle sein, Andererseits muss dieses Prinzip und diese alles dessen, was sie anhält, erklären zu können“. But, if it is inevitable to orient ourselves in the God’s knowledge after what we find positive or negative in the world – with the concern that in Him they are into an infinite mode, a totally superior way – any progress in the world’s knowledge and of the man it will mean internal life of God. We highlight so much the aspect of communion of the internal life of God, because in the new times it has been highlighted in a special mode this profound and noble aspect of the human reality.

the joy of Each One of Them for Another, that joy having its plenitude through the participation to it of the Third Person.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 158)

“This union through love comes from the Trinity of Persons existing in a unity of being. Through this it is shown that the love and, therefore, the full union, it is in Three. This fact is reflected in God’s created work too, in several ways. The first form of the loving union amongst the Three in creation, it is that amongst man and woman and children. The man isn’t a whole man without having a woman, neither the woman is whole without having a man. The two ones are, in the same time, one. (...)

If the two are made for the third, one can say that, in reality, the three are one.

The unity amongst the three one it is shown also in the fact that I and you, we never speak without feeling ourselves tied to a third one. The third one is the one uniting us, or who strengthens the love between me and you. If we do not unite us towards the love for the third one, our love won’t be full. In this it is shown the responsibility of the two for the third one, or of the third for the love between the two ones.

The man finds the Third One as Creator by looking at the world as a gift from Him.

Everywhere we come across to a third one, who strengthens the unity between the two ones. In Three there is the supreme unity too. And this supreme Trinity has created the three kinds of unity amongst creatures. Where there isn’t a third one and, in the last instance, a Third One as supreme forum, there doesn’t exist any satisfying unity within the created world.

If the man and the woman aren’t united with the children through the common responsibility for them, the love between them weakens. The responsibility of having and raising children weakens where it weakens the connection with the supreme Third One, and the connection between husbands falls in a passing and meaningless pleasure. Likewise, if a me and a you do not live a responsibility for a third one, as a bigger group composed of several persons, the connection between the two one will also weaken, because of not being upheld by that group and, therefore, it loses its full meaning. But this responsibility for the bigger group it finds its power only in the sentiment of being imposed by a common Creator Who has a plan for the whole group (national, social). This is for the three forms of the persons (me, you, him/her), because of being limited, they have to be multiple, and not only one of each, as in God in Whom the Persons are infinite. Here must also be noticed that the union between husband, wife, and children, it is being spiritualized towards a union amongst a me, you, and him by and large, though the memory of this special union on earth it leaves though a living seal on their persons, for eternity.

Finally, if the human person no longer sees in the world - given him as a gift, by the Creator, in order the man to know Him and to spiritually advance towards Him - an eternal meaning, the person will become poor in the light which he can communicate, or he falls into the spiritual death.

A supreme Third One gives meaning to all the connections amongst the human persons and between them and the world. Through the world, the person will be enriched and they will increase in their love, if in any dual connection with the created things the thought at the supreme Third One it will bring within them a meaning, an explainable origin, and a use of them in order to spiritually grow up, and towards an increased meaning of the man. I and you, we spiritually increase only by cogitating at our responsibility towards a supreme Third One. But also, the connection between me and God it strengthens my connection with my fellow human, as individual and as group.

All the created things show the fact that they cannot come except from the Creator and towards the Creator.

Only thus all the things are shown as having a purpose and as having their origin in a Third One Who has brought them to existence by thinking at a meaning for them. As that it is shown that all the things are made on the purpose of spiritually increase in love due to the love existing in their Creator.

This is the light of the Creation given by the One Who is by Himself the world's Light. This Creation's light shows the value which the created ones have been given with, by the Creator Who is infinite value by Himself." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 193-196)

"According to Saint Gregory of Nazianzus, if we had affirmed only the divine Hypostases, we would have fallen in polytheism; and if we had affirmed only the being, we would have denied the living Person of God - the God of the love. In the divine nature there is one movement, one will, and one kindness. But this life and kindness they aren't in a preexistent divine nature of the Three Persons, but in just their relations with One Another, relations keeping Them both united and distinct." (Stăniloae 1995: 141)

"There are three reasons why we are baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity and for which we affirm the work of the Holy Trinity in all the Holy Mysteries administrated to us:

a) For the persistence of the Three Persons from ever and forever, this being the foundation for each person's eternal lasting:

b) As in the Holy trinity each Person lasts forever in His uniqueness or identity, likewise lasts after being created and lives by eternally participating to the happiness of the Holy Trinity, each person who stays in connection with the Person of the Holy Trinity, through faith in Trinity and in the eternal uniqueness of the Persons. As the Father eternally remains Father and the Son eternally remains Son and the Holy Ghost eternally remains Holy Ghost, likewise each human person eternally remains as himself or as herself, by not being merged, in a pantheistic sense, in the great and disturbing essence, neither being changed through reincarnations, in the same pantheistic sense:

c) The happiness of the human persons who last forever in connection with the Holy Trinity, it consists of the love amongst Them and amongst us, it is brought to us by One from Trinity, the Only Begotten Son, through his embodiment. If He hadn't been One from Trinity, Christ wouldn't have had any power to give the eternal life, a life during which we to be loved by an infinitely king Father, by the Son Who has become our Brother, and into the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 206-207)

"The victory upon death it is solidary with the faith in the Trinitarian God, a God loving and creator of the world, and it is solidary also with the value granted to the man by such a God. This is for, only such a God created the man out of love, as person who God to be in an eternal dialogue of love with. The victory upon death, namely the man's courage to engage himself on the road that leads to victory upon death, since rediscovering the entire tormenting meaningless of the death, it is solidary with the faith in the Trinitarian God, the Creator of the world, namely with the capacity and the will to get the man rid of the death's absurdity, for the man is a being of value." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 23)

"If the man as person tend to comprise all the things and he tends to be above things, especially through other persons, and especially by comprising one another in a reciprocal self-giving, but he still cannot come to an end, then that will have to be a state the man can accomplish only within God. God comprises, as Person, in a real mode, all the things, and He is above all the things, but he does that through Other Persons, by comprising Themselves One into Another, fully and eternally, namely through total and reciprocal Self-giving as gift, but still without confounding to One Another. Towards such a communion tend the people to transcend amongst them and towards one another. That's why that is, in the same time, a transcending toward the Holy Trinity, the people being attracted by the Trinity's power. The human persons can infinitely advance into the communion amongst themselves and in their communion with the Person of the Holy Trinity, for in the people's reciprocal attraction there is working the Holy Trinity too, by that attracting the people towards the Holy Trinity too. The fullest and most concrete attraction between us and the Holy Trinity is exercised by Christ. By communicating with Him through His humanity, we communicate with One from the Trinity, and together with Him we communicate with the Father and we have within us the Holy Ghost.

Through the Son of God Who has made Himself, forever, as One of us, the Holy Trinity gathers all of us who want to, and, together with us, all our connections with the world, in the Holy Trinity's interpersonal relations. All of us and all the things are gathered into the Holy Trinity, without us being confounded as persons, as in the unity of the Holy Trinity the Persons aren't confounded too. This is for we are gathered into the Son Who communicated, without being Him confounded to Them, with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. Neither are we confounded to the Son, for He remains the Source of ever more intense filiation of ours, as persons, towards the Father, and of the ever more intense brotherhood of ours, with one another. This is for the Person of the Son Who has become central person to the mankind, he remains the most intensely attracting Person between the human person and the Holy Trinity. And a person doesn't annul other persons, especially when he is very developed in his love. All the more it doesn't annul us the Person of the Son." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 36-37)

"The difference between the works chosen and used by God's will, and His being, they show God as being Person, namely a Trinity of Persons, because a solitary Person, without the love from eternity, for another Person, He wouldn't have been a Person. Where it had been only the impersonal essence, everything would have been emanation out of that essence. But this is an impossibility. That's why, the creation as masterpiece of the godlike work, it is the masterpiece of the Holy trinity. And for God's being belongs to the Three Persons in a non-separated mode, each work of God it belongs to the Three Persons. Saint Maximos the Confessor, when explaining a text belonging to Dionysus the Areopagite, said: "All the godlike works, the whole theology attributes them not to only one Person, but to the Holy Trinity, except the attributes of the Three Persons" (G.P. 4, col. 242 b)." (Stăniloae 1995: 27)

"Without the Holy Trinity, the universe wouldn't have been produces through creation, but it would have been an emanation of an impersonal essence, and that is impossible." (Stăniloae 1995: 27)

"Each human being is like an image of the Son and Word of God, namely a person "in the image" of the Father, and the image of the Father is the Son and Word, or the supreme Rationality and Wisdom, having in Himself the joy of the Holy Ghost too. Each human being is called to think at the mystery of his/her own being, with joy given him/her by the Ghost, like the Only Begotten Son thinks at the infinite richness of the divine being received from the Father together with the Ghost. This is for, even the human person's being is only a shadow of the divine being received by the Son, from the Father, even in this quality as shadow, the human person's being reflects the richness and the depth of the divine being, as it is received by the Son from the Father, and it reflects also the affectionate sentiment of thankfulness of the Son towards the Father, for the Son receives His being from the Father – namely the sentiment hypostatized into the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1995: 51)

“In the supreme existence the conscience covers everything, and it has everything open. But only in the limitless love, the limitless whole is open to each Person, limitlessly, or godlike, hypostatized in the Three Persons. In the perfect love, there doesn’t remain, in any Person, something unopen, or unshown, of uncommunicated to the Other Two Persons. The conscience of each godlike Person, the total existence (being) is no longer open to Him only as His own, but also as belonging to the Others Two. This means that the existence (the being), which the supreme Person is aware of, it isn’t only His existence (being), but it belongs also to the Other Two Persons. All Three of Them are Subjects of the same existence (being). The love belongs to their own existence, for, by loving the own existence or being, Each Person loves the existence or the being of the Two Others. Likewise, the rejoicing of the existence belonging to One of Them, it is the rejoicing of the Two Other Persons. Each of Them rejoices of the own existence by rejoicing of One Another. This means that the Three Subjects are aware of the community of their existence or of their plenary being, not only as of a common and static possession Their being, but as of a common existence in consummate communication. By this, the godlike Person show the perfect love. And in Their distinction, One of the godlike Persons is the Giver of the consummate and limitless existence, from ever, of the Other Two Persons. In that Person, the love has the quality as parental giving. In Other Person the love has the quality as gratitude for receiving the filial existence. And in the Third Person, the love has the quality as participation to the Father’s rejoicing of the Son and of Son’s rejoicing of the Father, but the Third One too, He receives this quality also from the Father. But not only the person Who Self-gives, He affirms the Person Whom He Self-gives His existence, but also the One Who receives the existence He affirms the One Who Self-gives to Him, by rejoicing Himself of this Self-giving, and by this He provides joy to the Self-Giver. Not only the Father affirms the Son, but also the Son affirms the Father, by rejoicing of the existence given Him by the Father. This is the reciprocal kindness or love, of a Person of Another Person. This kindness is related to itself Their existence. The Father doesn’t live His existence and He doesn’t rejoice of His existence, except as existence that Self-gives, full of the Son’s love. And the Son doesn’t live His existence except accompanied by the joy of receiving His existence from the Father Who gives Him the existence as a gift, out of a limitless love, according to His existence. And the Ghost lives the plenitude of His existence by rejoicing of the Fathers’ joy for the Son and vice versa – through this the Holy Ghost's value is confirmed by Them; He confirms Them, at His turn, by this." (Stăniloae 1995: 10-11)

"Saint Gregory of Nazianzus saw the movement amongst the Three godlike Persons as love, or as kindness. That's why, he saw the kindness of God as united with the existence of His Hypostases. Without the Hypostases, God wouldn't have been kind. Only amongst the godlike Persons can take place the movement of the love; without Hypostasis, the movement would have been purposeless. A mono-personal God, or an impersonal essence, He cannot be kind or loving. The mono-personality itself would have brought God to a quality as essence. If that had been the case, God wouldn't have had within Himself a loving movement and a happy resting of that movement in Himself. He has the loving movement in Himself, for he has the love as movement of a Person towards Another, for He is threefold in Persons. But, in the same time, Each Person has the continuous resting of this movement in the beloved Person, namely it is about a stabile movement, for Each One has in common with the Other Two, the limitless plenitude of the existence or of the being." (Stăniloae 1995: 11-12)

"The internal movement of God is possible for He is threefold in Persons; but by that too, this movement finds its resting in Himself. But this is also for He doesn't search for a plus of existence outside Himself, namely neither a plus of union, through love, with another existence. That's why too, the human being tends towards God: for God is the supreme kindness as threefold in Persons. And by tending towards the endless kindness, the human being actually tends towards eternity. This is for within God the existence is one with the eternal – and therefore endless – kindness." (Stăniloae 1995: 12-13)

"The human being hasn't been ascending, from ever, towards the kindness of God; neither the God's kindness has been from ever descending given that there wasn't, from ever, outside God, an inferior existence. If that had been the case, God would have been, in a way, dependent of that inferior existence, and in such a case His love wouldn't have been free, namely it wouldn't have been a true love. In God there is, from ever, a love amongst equal Persons, and God doesn't ascend higher through that love, neither He descend lower, so that He isn't submitted to a process of completion by neither of those two movements. In God is, from ever and forever, the same overflowing of love amongst equal Persons. By being the divine Persons limitless in life, the overflowing of love amongst Them is limitless too, from ever and forever. It is a total overflowing of love from Person to Person. But only the Father is Father, for He is only Self-giving. The Father totally Self-gives to an only one Son. And the Son turns Himself with filial love, totally towards the Father, not being Him but only a Son and not a Father of another Person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 13)

“Although the plenitude of the existence belongs to the common supreme being, this being doesn’t really exist with all the mentioned features, except in different Hypostases. The love belonging to the plenary being is actualized in different Hypostases. The divine Persons love on Each Other both for They have the same being and also for They are Three and Each One brings something unique to the Others Two, completing Them. Thus, the common being is concretized in different Persons. There wasn’t any common being before Persons. Only scholarly we discern between the common being and the Persons Who the common being is concretized in. And the fact that any Person has as origin Another Person, or other Persons, it shows the fecundity of the being as only existing in different Persons.” (Stăniloae 1995: 13)

“A Person in God is only Father, and from before eternity. He isn’t also a Son of an essence or of Another Father, and so, infinitely. And He is only the Father and of only One Son, for His parental love to have, by this, the absolute intensity. If there had been more sons, they would have represented other and other modes of existence, of the divine being. In such case, the divine being couldn’t have been received by only one Son Who to have it together with the Father. Only for the divine being is received wholly, by a unique Son from the Father, the love between Them will be absolute too. Finally, several sons of the same Father, or belonging to fathers who had been coming out one from another, and who had become, at their turn, as sons, they would have represented gradual emanations of the supreme existence. And that one, as being due to a law, it would have shown cannot preserve the plenitude of existence, but it would have been the bearer of a non-plenary potency, and that would have made inutile and impossible a created universe which to be categorically distinct from the plenary existence of the divinity, but being possible to be elevated into the consummation of God, as an existence emanated from a non-plenary existence cannot be elevated to. In such a case there would have existed a sole universe, with diverse degrees of existence, namely a non-plenary existence, but also neither totally dependent on God’s almightiness, capable to elevate that universe to Himself, by bringing the universe out of its insufficiencies. That’s why the Son too, He must be only Son, and not Father. Only thus the Son is wholly full with His love for the Father, and He is totally turned towards the Father, by showing Their union, but also by highlighting the absolute paternity of the Father. This makes the whole created existence to be turned towards the Father. Everything is united, through the Son, into the Father. Only thus it can be achieved a consummate unity amongst all things, a filial unity of all things within the unique Father, through the unique Son. Only if all the things come out of the Father, they will turn back, with filial love, to the Father. All the things come to existence out of the Father's love, Who makes them in the image of the Son. All the things are loved, by the Father, within the Son, and all the things turn back towards the Father, through the Son. There is not beloved existence, for the Father, that to be beyond or outside the Son. And that's why, all the things have been created in order to be gathered together within the Son, and together with the Son into the Father. This is because the things coming out of the Father's love, through the Son, those things cannot find a target for their love, except the Father, Whom all the things will be gathered within, together with the Son." (Stăniloae 1995: 14-15)

"The names as Word and as Wisdom, given to the Son, they accentuate even more the reciprocal interiority between the Father and the Son." (Stăniloae 1995: 17)

"The kindness and the love cannot be the feeling of a mono-personal existence, or of a solitary existence. But God is kind and He is loving not only for there are a Father and a Son Who love on one another, but also for They communicate to a Third One too, their love. This can be experienced by the human being, as image of God. Even someone's self-awareness is conditioned by his awareness of another human being, and the awareness of both of them is conditioned by their awareness of a third one. This is the existential connection amongst persons. My self-awareness is so tightly connected with my awareness about you, so that Saint Gregory of Nyssa could say that within the Holy trinity, where the union amongst Persons is a consummate union, the Father knows the Son "as Another Self" (Contra Eunomium, lib. II, G.P. 45, col. 495). I couldn't be aware of myself, if I am not aware of you and of a third one. Thus, we can understand the fact that the Son has both the quality as Word and as Wisdom. As such, the Son isn't a Word and a Wisdom in Himself, but in union with the Father and with a Third One. I distinguish myself from you as person, but I still cannot part with my conscience about you and about a third one, not even in my self-awareness. The Son is Word and He is Wisdom, but He is the Father's Word and Wisdom. Without One Who speaks, there cannot be a Word. And the Father, by being self-aware, He is aware of the Son too; by revealing Himself as Speaker of the Word, the Father gives birth to the Son as Person Who is non-separated from Him. And the love Whom the Father breaths upon the Son, that One is a Person too. And the Son, by receiving the loving breath and, by this, receiving the Father's embrace, he lives this embrace as becoming His too, as penetrated within Himself, but also as a Persons distinct from Him and from the Father. Each Person lives the Other Two Persons and in the same time. They do not live as Two Ones isolated from a the Third One, but Each One of Them is united with the Third one. The Fathers sees the Ghost as united with the Father, and the Ghost shines out of the Son, and the Son sees the Ghost as being together with the Father, and as proceeding from the Father. Each of Them sees the Second One as together with the Third One.” (Stăniloae 1995: 17)

“By loving, as Son, the Father, the Son lives in His filial love, the love of the Father for the Son. But in the Father’s love for the Son, the Son doesn’t live only the Father Who gives the Son His existence, but the Son also lives the fact that the Father lives and feels the Son. The Ghost, at its turn, though He lives on Himself as the Father’s life or Feeling, the Ghost lives together with the Father, as Source of Life and of Feeling, namely as belonging to the Ghost, also the Son, as the One Whom the Ghost is directed towards, as Feeling of the Father.” (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

“In understanding the Trinity as fulness of existence, we must mention the fact that the Second Person and the Third Person aren’t to the First Person as bosoms for resting, or of stopping the further movement, in the sense of a limitation. Saint Gregory of Nazianzus affirmed that the godlike Oneness stops from Its movement in Trinity “due to consummation”. “The Oneness, moving due to the richness and being the Two-ness exceeded (for it is above material matter and form, which the created things are made of), it is bordered in Trinity due to consummation” (Word about Peace, chapter 8; G.P. 36, II, 60). The Oneness moves for it is rich in existence, but its richness is consummately shown in the Persons’ Trinity. Saint Maximos the Confessor declared, when explaining the place (Ambigua, chapter 1), that, in Trinity, God has His consummation as concrete existence, for in Trinity is concretely shown God’s limitless being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

“A singular Person, even if cogitates, on Himself, as limitless, that Person cannot actually be limitless, because that Person remains monotonous, or in an infinite of the vagueness, or the imprecision, and that isn’t actually an infinite. And if that singular Person had tried, by Himself, to specify that vagueness, then that singular Person would have delimited that vagueness, in a real mode. Richer and really various is the existence in two Persons. The Another, even if He is a border of your monotonous infinity, He escapes you, in a way, from a “limited” infinity. He opens you another infinity, and infinity enriching your infinity. He enriches your life, He is your life, and He escapes you from the deadly monotony.” (Stăniloae 1995: 18-19)

“Saint Gregory of Nazianzus declared that, if you pass through the second one towards the third one, the second one won’t be unveiled to you as open to the infinity. This will make you to forsake him, without you being able to stop either to the third one, for the third one will be, to you, even more limited, as point of crossing towards the fourth one, and so on. The importance of the second one is enriched by the fact that he is point of passing, but also of stopping at the third one. By this, the third one too, he contributes to the even deeper unveiling of the second one's infinity, making you to love him ever more. Thus, in three is it perfectly lived the infinity by each of them, in the other two. They have in this Trinitarian "limitation" the true infinity." (Stăniloae 1995: 19)

"This stopping to three gathered back in unity, it doesn't take place to the people, because no human trinity has the infinity. This is because at people, each father becomes, at his turn, father to other people. At people, no trinity is content to remain to itself. But, in the Holy Trinity, the Father is only Father, so that He is wholly directed towards His unique Son, He has in Himself everything that means Son, and that's why the Son is only Son, so that He is wholly directed towards the Father, having within Him the infinity of the paternal love of the Father for Him, and the Father having within Him the infinity of the Son's filial love directed towards the Father. And the Ghost, by heading Himself from within the Father towards the Son and turning back from within the Son towards the Father, He doesn't do anything else except to consummately open, to the Son, the Father's infinity, and to the Father, the Son's infinity, or to see it as common infinity belonging to the Ghost too, once the Ghost has impropriated the love of Each Other for the Another's infinity." (Stăniloae 1995: 19)

"An embodied god who hadn't been the Son of a Father, he wouldn't have maintained himself as person in the relation with another equal to him person. The humanity he would have assumed it would have sunk within him like in an impersonal abyss, not participating to the love of the Son towards the Father." (Stăniloae 2003: 299)

"On one hand, the man's personal consummation, through his eternally non-confounded union with God, it cannot take place except where one believes in a man's external eschatology, in the man's happy union with God. But such eschatology is the due consequence of a Trinitarian God." (Stăniloae 1992: 29-30)

Hope

“The third element is the hope for the future. The man hopes, he plans, but in the same time he is exposed to the unpredictable future. “His advancing in the future is a continuous endeavor to diminish his internal estrangements and the distance between what he is and what he wants to be. We have to be content, therefore, or only with the reconciliation (individual or collective) with an eternally far away purpose, always asymptotically followed, one that moves only at distance, or this absolute purpose is impossible to be reached without, once reached, to suppress the infinite and to make it disappear in the absolute of God. The man who hopes in a real manner, he must hope that these questions must be answered in the meaning of the second alternative, through the historical reality.” Christ positively answers the mentioned man’s hope. The Holy Fathers formulated this unconscious waiting for and this man’s fulfilling into Christ in a simpler mode, by declaring that the man had been created for Christ, or that the man’s godlike image is being perfected into Christ.”(Stăniloae 2006: 8)

“Without the coming of Christ our hope for our endless future and for our consummation would be in vain. Our nature could not fulfill by itself that hope of ours. But this hope, inscribed into our being, it cannot deceive us. It must be fulfilled by somebody having the human nature too, but Who to be also God, and, through Him, this hope will be fulfilled in everybody who wants and stays in connection with Him. And this hope had been fulfilled into Christ and through Christ Who is on one hand man and on the other hand He is God, and thus the target which all of us tend towards, it has been reached. Towards this target, through the unity of His human being with us, we are given too, the power to advance eternally, without ceasing to be human beings, strengthened by Him in this quality as humans.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 153)

“Camus reckoned the hope as un unrealistic delusion. The universe is revealed to us as an irrational absurdity, because of the fact too, that it doesn’t justify us any hope. We must accept the lack of hope as the most realistic attitude. But we mustn’t expect the fulfilling of our world as coming from the external universe. There is another existence too, one superior to the present existence in the material universe. The hope belongs to the human being’s nature, for one cannot achieve a human nature and he cannot live a human nature without such a hope. The lack of any hope would have paralyzed any human being’s will for activity. The total lack of hope would have made the human being as spiritually dead all along. The future wouldn’t have been reckoned as made by us too, and that’s why the future it would have been o little interest to us. If we had cogitated the future in such a manner, we would have remained in an attitude of fatalist resignation. If he had hoped only in a future in the present material universe, we would have accepted that our future is the exclusive product of some forces and of some laws which do not depend on us. Vainly Camus reckoned that he renounced to see a certain law within universe, because he still sees a law which the human being has no power upon. Camus admitted a certain hope for fulfilling some material desires, related to the body. But he didn't admit a hope for a future life, one elevated on another plan than that of the purely material and passing satisfactions. In his vision the death had the last word - that's why, the universe would be absurd." (Stăniloae 1995: 131)

"The absurd doesn't master upon universe, except to the ones who do not see in universe but only what regards the body. The Absolute is implied in reducing the universe to material matter and to its laws. This eliminates any meaning from existence. But what is based on, the denial of a such an essential trait of the human being's nature, namely the denial of the hope and of the faith in a meaning of the existence? That is based on the exclusive trust in what happens to the body. That is bases on denying the whole complexity of the spiritual life, which differs the human being from animal. That is based on exclusively trusting the senses, by forgetting that in senses there isn't present only a biological sensation but their work is full with a conscience and with a thinking." (Stăniloae 1995: 131)

"Being obvious, to the human being, the spirit's existence, and that nobody can make an exception from that, the human being is justified to recognize also the hope for a future life after the death of his body. The identity and the uniqueness of the human being, they aren't reduced to body, or, they have their source into body only in a very limited degree. It is more rational to the man to believe that the spirit which his identity is tied to, which he cares for, it doesn't disappear along with the body. If the human being is no longer an object of some blind laws, even in what concerns his body, as participant to his subjectivity, then the human being is superior to those laws. And then he is rightly hoping that his existence isn't totally submitted to such laws. And the human being rightly believes that there is a Subject having full power upon those laws." (Stăniloae 1995: 132)

"The hope is the human beings' desire for seeing fulfilled certain joys of his, produced by other persons. And for these accomplishments cannot be fully achieved in the present material universe, the hope is directed towards a future life and, with that, also towards a supreme eternal Person Who provides that future life and the human being's accomplishment." (Stăniloae 1995: 132)

"Heidegger totally assimilated the hope to the worry. Without any doubt, they are related to one another, or they have something in common. But what would have been so dominating the worry for, upon us, if we hadn't had any certitude that our life extends also after our death? What had we taken care of our life for, if our life would have been so perishing? Actually, one cannot explain the worry without the hope. But the hope, staying at the basis of the worry, cannot be extended only to such a short time as it is given to our life in the present material universe. Only for the man is a hopeful existence, only that's why he tries to reach what he hopes by being worried about. But there is worry and worry, for there is hope and hope. Although, the worry and the hope are tied in their root. There is a worry for the aspects of the life in the present material universe, for there is too, a hope directed towards getting rid of the hardships from the present material universe, and directed also towards providing a better life in the present material universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 132)

"The human being is neither restricted to the hope for getting rid of the hardships from the present material universe, nor to provide for himself a better life here, so that he isn't either restricted to the worry he places in the service of that. If that had been the case, the human being wouldn't have been so much mastered by worry. The human being cannot distinguish by himself, between worry and hope. The fact that the human being isn't ever satisfied with the aspects of his life in the present material universe, it makes him, especially at an old age, to be increasingly more directing his hope, or you could say his care, towards the life from beyond the present material universe, namely towards preparing himself for that life. Thus, most often, the two hopes and the two worries are intertwined." (Stăniloae 1995: 132)

Human Being / Mankind

“The world has a beginning for its meaning if being fulfilled into man, and the mankind had a beginning. And the mankind has a beginning for it moves towards an absolute and it carries the world too. The mankind isn’t from ever, because of in such a case it won’t move towards an absolute. In such a case the mankind would have had the absolute in itself from eternity and it would have remained in it eternally.” (2003: 343)

“According to our faith, the world and the man move for they tend towards a consummate target they do not have it in themselves. And as long they move, it means they still haven’t reached the consummate target they tend towards. They endure the movement, for they haven’t give it to themselves by themselves, and for they haven’t the consummation into themselves, but they have received the movement from the cause that brought them to existence. But this cause has brought them to existence not in the plenitude this cause is, because of in such a case there would be a contradiction that the infinite God to create another infinite next to Himself; but it exercises upon them the attraction of the plenitude they tend towards, and with which they will be imparted to the end, not through their nature but through the communion the man will make himself worthy of, by his effort in liberty, of advancing towards it. This means that the eternal God places Himself in a connection with the temporary world and He remains in connection with the world; it means therefore that the state of becoming, or the temporary state the creation is placed in by the ‘beginning’ it is given, it remains in connection with the eternity. God has descended on the world’s temporal level, without ceasing in the same time to remain in the eternity he wants to elevate the world towards.” (2003: 344)

“Only the man, by consciously using the rationality of the nature and by consciously using the nature’s processes through his work animated by responsibility, he ascends to a life of spiritual communion and to the conscience of some higher meanings and purposes of the nature. Only within man the rationality of indefinite potentialities it receives a meaning, a purpose, or it reaches increasingly fuller to be fulfilled. The nature is useful to the man, not only for his biological existence, but also for spiritual growing up. Only the man, as conscious and rational being, who knows increasingly better the rationality of the nature and its meanings, only the man becomes through the nature more rational himself, or he actualizes, increasingly higher, his rationality. By discovering and by valuing the multiple superimposed rationality of the world, in a free manner, together with his fellow humans, in order to more vast use of the nature’s resources and for understanding the nature’s inexhaustible meanings, the man increases in communion with his fellow humans; and this thing is a source of knowing other increasingly higher meanings. In knowing the rationality of the nature through his rationality, the man discovers his responsibility towards the nature, towards his fellow humans, and towards God; and developing this responsibility it equals the increasingly discovering of the meanings of the world and of the human existence.” (2003: 360-361)

“The world’s rationality is for man and it culminates in man; and not the man is for the world’s rationality. A person thought at the man’s person when creating the world. But like the knowledge about the things progresses and it becomes more nuanced, likewise it progresses also the language in what concerns its richness and nuances. It is a progress towards the infinity of the godlike Word in which are comprised in an undifferentiated manner the infinite roots of the things or their meanings.” (2003: 366)

“The man, as creature, he is contingent to God, and to himself, the man is malleable or contingent is a limited sense, for he hasn’t created on himself, but he can use extremely variously his endless alternative potentialities. (...) The man is contingent to God, but, in the same time, God has placed in man a value of partner.” (2003: 374-375)

“The man isn’t entrusted to somebody as a passive object, like the nature is, for the man has the character of an active contingency, and not the character of a passive contingency as the nature has. The man is a limited and actively contingent, or malleable to himself. God has created the world as totally contingent to Himself, and in report with the man, as passively malleable to the man, in order to be the man able to exercise his free and active malleability in report with the world, by placing into the world alternative passive multiple potentialities, in order the man to be able to partially exercise a creator role even upon himself. The man too creates on himself; the man isn’t only created by God. And the man partially creates the world too. The man has the freedom to actualize one of others of the world’s potentialities, and for God helps the man to do this, God Himself remains in a report of freedom with the world, and with the man God is in a freedom of collaboration report. Thus, within world the freedom of God meets the freedom of the man, not in a collision but in collaboration, when the man takes in account what it is characteristic to the external nature and to his own nature, or when he wants to advance towards his increasing in the infinity of the One Who Is.” (2003: 375)

“Neither the nature nor God are an immovable fatality - or an unmovable wall - to the man. Consequently, any situation is repairable somehow; the man meets a merciful God whenever.” (2003: 375)

“The malleable rationality of the world, full of multiple potentialities, it corresponds to the indefinite potentialities of the rationality, of the imagination, and of the creative and progressive human power.” (2003: 376)

“Adam and Christ are the types for choosing the two alternatives of the man’s report with the nature; the enslaving of the man’s spirit by the sweet fruit of the sensitive part of the nature, or mastering the sensitive part of the nature through spirit, of course, not without the effort of renouncing to the world’s sweetness and not without taking upon oneself the pains of the cross. Only through this the spirit overcomes the nature and transfigures the nature until to the resurrection.” (2003: 376)

“The plants, and in some measure, also the animals, they can live in a nature that is unfolding according to the repetition’s laws. The people who pursuits in their life increasingly higher meanings, in a conscious mode and in a conscious community, they adapt the nature’s laws, in a free manner, to these meanings. The nature proves to be capable of a conscious usage, an elastic usage, through the multiple alternance passed into work. In the virtual feature of the malleability, of its contingency, the nature proves to be made for the free man, led by an ethos of the advancing into an eternal communion. That’s why the nature becomes, in an actual manner, contingent through man. Otherwise, the nature would have been unfolding monotonously in the exclusive and rigid frame of its laws. The man brings always new solutions into nature, solutions which surely do not come out of the exclusive combining of the factors provided by nature on a given moment. The man brings unpredictable solutions, by producing combinations of factors which wouldn’t have taken place by themselves. The man introduces into nature a certain freedom of his, in a continuous growing up.” (2003: 377)

“The model of the completion the man brings it to the nature it is the symbiosis between the spiritual life, full of meanings and conscious feelings, and the physical-chemical laws of the body. The first one doesn’t annul the second ones, but it elevates them on the plan of spiritually living them, and the last ones do not annul the first one, but they constitute a basis for it. The whole reality of the world is elevated on the plan of living it in sentiments, or understanding it in meanings. And these sentiments and meanings lead the people in the attitudes in the decisions, in their moral and efficient responsibilities towards the world.” (2003: 378)

“The nature’s laws have within them elastic or contingent possibility, put at the disposal of the man in order the man to actualize it in diverse modes, according to the needs and to the content of meanings the man has reached at.” (2003: 378)

“All the nature’s forces and things, they are a dynamic and materialized rationality. As conscious rationality, it doesn’t move freely towards goals chosen by itself. The rationality of the nature is only an object submitted to be known and to be guided by the rational, conscious, and free subject, who is the man. In this quality the nature’s rationality it is in a solidarity and continuity with the conscious and free rationality of the man; the nature’s rationality is made for the man’s rationality intervention in it. And as the man’s rationality, in its full meaning, it is the organ of noticing the meanings of the reality and of the human existence, which are unveiled as being increasingly higher, and, in last analysis, or the supreme meaning of the reality and of the human existence, the rationality of the nature serves to this advancing of the human rationality towards the supreme meaning, by hiding in it the possibility of being understood by the human rationality in the frame of these increasingly higher meanings and to be actualized in it in modes which to increasingly more to serve to those ones.” (2003: 378)

“Into man it can take place a transcending of the nature, which isn’t due only to him and it is the less due only to the nature.” (2003: 380)

“According to the Christian conception, without spirit, the world would be locked up in the automatic repetition of some monotonous cycles, narrower or wider. Only the spirit, through his liberty, it surpasses the repetition and it can make the nature to exceed the repetition too. The work has a decisive role in processing the nature, but the work is a feature of the man as a thinking creature. But the work can process the nature dues to the fact that the human spirit is, on one hand, inserted in the material order of the world, through the man’s body. The human spirit has the capacity of some alternative decisions, or of transcending himself, and he can imprint these decisions, through his body, to the external world too. The key of this role stays in the mysterious insertion of the man’s spirit, in the material world, through his body. The whole world is affected by this fact of its insertion in spirit through the human body. Only through the body the man can process the nature, by working. The human spirit can make a decision or another; but only by the fact that he is the spirit of a body, his various decisions can be prolonged in various movements of the body, in the body’s working activity, in which the decisions are prolonged through the body’s organs or through the tools made and wielded also through the body.” (2003: 380-381)

“Inserting the human spirit into body it is the leverage that elevates through work, the whole world, out of it quality of nature submitted to an automatic repetition. In this insertion it stays the source of spiritualizing the entire world; in this it is proven the world as world for man and in this the world fulfills its purpose. A ray of light in this mystery it is cats by the fact that the material world it is a fabric of the rationality materialized as object, which doesn’t chose consciously its paths; and the man is rationality or spirit, as subject aware of himself and aware of the world, and having the capacity to decide and to move out of himself, and therefore he has the capacity of moving the materialized rationality of the body and of the world, which depends on him as some train which can receive various forms. Without the conscience manifested through the body's work, out of the liberty of the spirit, the world wouldn't be or wouldn't appear as contingent. The world is and it is revealed as contingent, for it is in connection with the spirit, inserted through body and through the man's thought work, into nature. The world is contingent for it is for the man, who is on one hand tied to the world, and on the other hand he exceeds the world. There is some continuity between the contingent world and the embodied human spirit." (2003: 381-382)

"The human spirit, as subject in connection with the objective rationality materialized into body and in to the external nature, it can place the rationalities in combining movements chosen by him, the rationalities which by their materialization compose the world, or he can modify the direction of their moving." (2003: 382)

"The world's contingency and the insertion of the spirit in the world, with the spirit's capacity of actualizing the world's contingency, it wouldn't have made any sense if it hadn't been aimed through this a transfiguration of the body and of the world. The man presses on the world the seal of the spiritual level, on each step of his climbing, or the world is elevated within man on the man's spiritual level. To the clean one all the things are clean, and the wise one gathers wisdom out of all things." (2003: 386)

"For it attracts in himself the world's representations and the world's meanings, but on the spiritual level of the man, the man shows in himself the whole world as much as he knows it (and this represents the world in general), made subject on man's level. For the man presses his seal on the world, the man shows the exterior world personalized according to the man's spiritual level. The man is everywhere. Enriching himself through the world, the man presses on the world his own seal, and he extends the seal of his personality upon increasingly extended areas of the world. The world is seen personalized according to the man's spiritual level, in the organs of man's body; the world bears the seal of the spiritual level of the man's body. The man and the body are seen in the man's body, as proof of the body's participation to the human subject and to the world. Even in the hands of the man who is worker and artist, one can see the complex skillfulness of the man's spirit and the signs of the things the man has made." (2003: 387)

"While the man cannot exercise his free work upon the world except through the body, the divine spirit, by the fact that He is infinitely more powerful, he can work also directly upon the world, without stopping, by and large, the work of the nature's factors." (2003: 388)

"The divine spirit works also through the embodied spirit, namely through our being. Thus, the work of the man is strengthened by the power of God and it is in the same time a work of the man and of God, a synergic work. The synergy is the general formula of the work of god within world." (2003: 388)

"Dead people resemble to each other more that the living people do." (2003: 391)

"According to the Christian faith, the man consists of the material body and of what we call soul, which cannot be reduced to matter. The soul crosses through the material body and it is tied to the body, but the soul transcends the body's materiality. The human being must be respected as a being of inestimable value. The human being is "somebody" due to the soul, and it is no longer only "something". What makes the man "somebody" it is this substrate endowed with conscience and with the capacity of conscious and free reactions. In front of the man come into light not only material differences from individual to individual, but also that substrate that differs from the matter. Through that the man manifests himself as somebody conscious and unique. That one sustains in the man the will of being and of eternally consummate himself. And this uniqueness, which cannot be replaced, it shows itself worthy of lasting eternally. We cannot define this substrate in its essence, but we only can describe it in its manifestations, knowing an essential fact about it, namely that it makes the man a conscious and voluntary subject, unique and irreplaceable." (2003: 391-392)

"According to the Christian conception, the man isn't only material body because of, if that had been the case, he wouldn't have represented a factor of creator freedom in relation with the automatic nature, a factor which actualizes the world as contingent reality. But the man isn't either a juxtaposition or pure spirit and of material body. A pure spirit juxtaposed to the body would maintain the spirit as non-partaker to the quality as subject and to the passions occasioned by the coexistence with the body and unable to be spiritualized and incapable of the role of nature's spiritualizing organ." (2003: 399)

"Only as embodied spirit, or as soul, from the first moment of his existence, the human spirit is a factor inserted into world, though remaining different from nature, but being able to freely use the nature." (2003: 399)

"The man, according to the Christian teaching, it is brought to existence in the beginning, as an embodied spirit, or as unity composed of soul and body, through a special creator act of God. To this, there must be the world as nature, but the man isn't the work of the nature, though he is tied to the nature.' (2003: 405)

"The Genesis doesn't tell us that God composed firstly the body and then he breathed breath of life in the man's nostrils, but it tells us only that 'God made the man by taking dust of earth the ground and he breathed in the man's nostrils breath of life and the man was made with living soul' (Gen. 2: 7). There isn't mentioned any temporal succession in the creation of Adam. The man as special being is created simultaneously in his entirety. By mentioning the bifurcate character of the creator act of the man, the Genesis wants only to tell us that the man is composed of two components: of body and of soul, and the body is from the general matter, and the soul is a special kinship with God." (2003: 405).

"The man, as 'living' creature, he essentially comes to existence by the breath of God in his nostrils. By the fact that the man isn't created only of dust of the ground but also by the breath of God, it is obvious that the man has a special position not only in comparison with the nature out of which his body is taken, but also in report with God. Like one takes flour and puts dough in it, so is the man formed out of a part of the nature in which the soul had been introduced, in order than to leaven the whole nature the man comes remains in relation with, or to mediate for the entire nature the Ghost of God, or to be the priest of the entire cosmos. Saint Gregory of Nazianzus says: 'in quality of earth, I am tied to the life from beneath; but by being a godlike particle I bear within me the desire for the future life'. The man will go up through this special relation of the soul with God, to the future life together with his body and with the earth he is in connection with."

"In this conscious and voluntary relation of our being with God, due to the soul kindred with God, it stays the image of God within man. The man is in the image of God, he tends towards God, or he is in a living relation with God. And through this relation the man maintains not-weakened the kinship with God. Even a biological image will remain in its kinship with its model only if there comes to it, from its model, a continuous power, or if between it and its model there is a continuous communion. We notice this phenomenon only amongst people. O frequent convergent relation makes two or more people to resemble one another. But if between a biological image and its model, or between two or more people, there hadn't been a kinship, there would have been possible to speak about any relation which to show and to maintains one as image of another. Thus the man will maintain himself as not-weakened image of God only if, on the basis of a kinship, the man maintains between him and God a living relation, a continuous communion, in which is active not only God but also the man." (2003: 406-407)

“Our being is shown and is maintains as image of God through the living relation, and this relation is possible for God has made the man, from the beginning, kindred with Him and therefore capable of relation with Him. Better said, God has placed the man since the beginning in free and conscious relation with Himself, just by instilling the living soul (see. Cor. 15: 45, where the man is called ‘living soul’ in order to accentuate his unity). This is for the Holy Fathers say that through this instilling God has seeded into man not only the understanding soul kindred with God, but also His grace, as manifestation of His relation with the man, a relation that causes in man his answer to the founder act of the relation with God.” (2003: 407)

“Our being is kindred to God by the received ghost, but our being receives the ghost for is capable of Him, for is capable of conscious relation with God.” (2003: 408)

“The rationality has the tendency to know forever and ever, and the word has the tendency to speak forever and ever.”

“The man was honored by itself the act of his creation, with the quality of image of God, for through it the kinship and the relation with God has been planted within man. But this quality it is being maintained and it is being developed through the continuous relation with God, which the man is capable of and which his soul carves for. The image is a ‘gift’ and a ‘mission’ (Gabe und Aufgabe) as Vişeslavţev says.” (2003: 411)

“In quality of image, the whole man tends towards his model, towards God. (...) The man tends towards God for God is absolute, and the man tends towards absolute for the absolute is the God as Person.” (2003: 411)

“An impersonal absolute isn’t even truly absolute. And a God as person who hadn’t been absolute, he couldn’t have been the fully and eternally satisfying source of the man, and He wouldn’t have ensured the man’s eternal and plenary existence in a consummate communion. And this is asked for by man, this is the man’s desire, which the man cannot disregard or choke. The man isn’t satisfied by remaining in relations with finite realities. The man needs a relation with the infinite reality in which it is includes in the same time the continuous novelty, which isn’t identified only to the always new interest of the man but also to the always new interest of that inexhaustible Person in man. Only in this infinite love the man can rest. ‘Inquietum est cor meum donec requiescat in Te’.” (2003: 411)

“If the man’s innocence from before the ancestral sin had been consolidated through deeds of persevering into that innocence, the spiritual force would have been so great that the corruption law couldn’t have imposed its mastery neither within world nor within man's body. The possibility of the immortality the man had in within himself, by his spirit created in the image of God, it would have become a reality." (2003: 429)

"Before the ancestral sin, the temptations and the passions weren't within man as some roots ready to sprout out with an imperious necessity; their impossibility was given in the body's sensitiveness, a sensitiveness that could have been maintained clean if the man had granted the spirit the preponderant role, as it was also possible to be defiled if the man let this sensitiveness to the thickened preponderantly in a bodily manner. Enjoying a freedom, the fallen into sin man no longer enjoy it, the first man still didn't rejoice a freedom strengthened into good, so that to remain totally firm when facing the temptations of a preponderantly bodily sensitiveness. The man from the beginning could change the state of cleanness he was in, more easily than a man who is consolidated in good by persevering in good, but he was not attracted into such a change by the violence of some tasted pleasures or of some passions which are penetrated deeply in the habituation of the nature." (2003: 429-430)

"God didn't create the man as an automatic piece in the mechanism of a nature that is inflexible in its laws, but as free subject, capable to flex the nature's processes, in order to do through them the willing good, and to show through this his conformity with the good will of God, thus progressing in the resemblance to God. A mechanic framing of the man in the order of a mechanical nature, it would have made meaningless both the man's and the world's creation. But the creation of a nature that can attract the man in an automatism, which to the man's sensitiveness with echoes into spirit it can get proportions of absolute passions, it imposes the man the mission to fight for maintaining and strengthening his freedom, for through his freedom him to set the nature free, and his body, from the automatism of framing within nature with the passionate resonances from within him. The man cannot become a totally alike nature piece, but the man becomes passionate when he falls under nature's mastery, as when the man affirms his mastery upon nature, he becomes virtuous, spiritually fortified. That's why the man has been given the commandment to exercise mastery upon nature, for him to follow this commandment and to affirm his freedom and to strengthen his spirit through it. The commandment doesn't aim the enslaving of the man but it aims the man's strengthening into freedom and into the communion with God. This commandment asks the man for remaining a man and to fortify himself as man, as a being superior to the nature." (2003: 430-431)

"The immortality depended on the attachment to God, on the orientation towards God, even by senses. In the beginning, the man's eyes weren't gazing with cunningness and greediness, of stalking, of grabbing, and the man's mouth wasn't accustomed to offending words, and the man's ears weren't noticing hostile or tempting meanings in the others' words. Out of the man's face was irradiating the light of the confidence and of the kindness. If the man had persisted in this connection with God, the state of immortality would have been consolidated within him." (2003: 434-435)

"Before the sin, being the man with God and with his fellow human in a so-called natural harmony, even if that harmony wasn't consolidated through the virtues achieved with the deed, the man was also in a harmony with the nature. The man's gentleness wasn't chasing away the animals from around him. The man's greediness wasn't defiling and lowering the nature. By seeing God everywhere in the nature, the man felt like he was in a cradle and he wasn't tearing apart the nature's careful mystery with analyses and with violations. The man was seeing through nature beyond nature, and the force of the innocent man's spirit was making malleable the nature's processes. A great sense of solidarity with all the things, it was giving the man a peace with all the things." (2003: 435)

"The Son of God Himself, as model of the man, by making man on Himself, He takes upon Himself this work of man's spiritualization, first in Himself, then in the other people and, through them, of the sensitive universe, which is work of revealing the Godhead through material forms. On this purpose the human being has been given the quality of master upon the material order, quality through which the man is more in the image of God than the angel is, as Saints John Damascene and Gregory Palamas say." (2003: 447)

"The creator gift is related to the mission of the spiritual mastery. By spiritualizing the matter, the man gives the matter the transparency which to reveal the divine spirituality in many forms; more precisely, this is a means of spiritualizing the image as beauty, a beauty that is full when is has within a purity. This gift makes the human being kindred to the Creator Who is in Himself the spiritual beauty. God has brought to existence so many visible forms capable of revealing His spirituality as undefiled and endless beauty." (2003: 448)

"By creating the man, God has created not only spirits, but also spirits who have a manifestation connected to the things' rationalities, and who have the sensitiveness as ultimate expression of theirs. That's why also the rationality of the human spirit it capable of noticing and of comprising the rationalities of the things, and it is capable of sensitiveness. The rationality of the human spirit it notices the rationalities of the things through a sensitiveness of the human body and by this thing itself the human body's sensitiveness it is also characteristic to the spirit, according to the expression of the Holy Fathers about the 'mind's feeling'. Through this feeling, that is characteristic to the human being, the human spirit ties to himself the material order of the existence. Sometimes the mind lets itself to be mastered by this feeling, by enslaving itself to the material things. But the mind's mission is to make the feeling clean. And the Son of God, by assuming the human mind together with the sensitiveness which is naturally tied on the human mind, he ties this sensitiveness on Himself, and He deifies it." (2003: 449)

"The man was given the great mission of mastering the matter through the spirit, of making the matter transparent to the spiritual and godlike order, to actualize new modes or revealing the spirit and of helping the people, firstly the ethic and the esthetic modes." (2003: 463)

"We do not know for how long remained the man in the primordial state. But he didn't succeed in consolidating himself in the obedience to God and to progress in knowing God, for if that had been the case the falling wouldn't have taken place so easily, or it wouldn't have taken place at all." (2003: 486)

"We could deduce that the primordial state lasted for a very short time, because of in this state that is in the middle between obedience and disobedience, the proto-parents must manifest themselves from the beginning either by obeying, or by disobeying. If they had manifested themselves for a while by obeying, they would have started to accustom themselves into good, and the falling would have become more difficult. Therefore, it seems that they let themselves to be quickly tempted by disobedience. The primordial state would indicate rather the state the proto-parents came to existence with, through the creator act of God, and into which they were called to persist and to advance in, as in the normal state of theirs." (2003: 487)

"The man fell out of imprudence and out of the laziness of doing an effort to use his freedom. God wanted the man to grow up in freedom and through his own effort. The freedom, as sign of the spirit's power, it isn't only a gift, but also a result of the effort. The man has been refusing this effort ever since the beginning and he has fallen into the slavery of the easy pleasure of the senses. God has instilled the spirit to the man. But the instilled spirit was in great measure only a potency which had to be actualized by man. By commanding the man not to eat out of the tree of the feeling without being guided by the freedom of the spirit, God actually commanded the man to be strong, to stay free, and to grow up in spirit, or in freedom. This commandment called upon the man's liberty itself." (2003: 499)

"Each individual, by placing his rationality and his work in the service of the egotism, instead of the rationality to serve to the harmony, it has served the fight and the division. Each one wanted to command the others, in order to serve him. Each one has been spiritually impoverished, no longer wanting to listen to the other opinions, to truly know them, to open themselves to them, to spiritually enrich himself from them, and this is because he wanted to enrich himself only from bodily exploiting them, by force, and not from the benevolent generosity of their love. From the desire to use the sensitive nature without work, he advanced to the will of having the nature's fruits by others work." (2003: 505)

"The poverty of the spirit brought the spirit's weakening and death, fact that led to nature's corruption and to physical death. By losing the habituation to see others as free and loving subjects, and those ones by becoming opaque to his spiritual horizons of the existence, by no longer understanding the infinitely superior value of the human subject in comparison to objects, and by not paying respect to the human person, the man neither understood the quality of subject of the foundation of the entire reality, and he reduced that too to a level of a substance, of a law, of an object available to his egotistic-aggressive knowledge. Being reduced to himself as central reality, amidst a mute and deaf world, a not free and an unconscious world, the conscious creature no longer understood either on himself without a blind impulse towards biological satisfactions, and he looked like at an oddity and like at an annoying the life factor, the spirit from within himself, as like at something contrary to the nature, like at a unnatural excrescence, which he mustn't take it too much into account." (2003: 505)

"By getting, in some measure, out of the clear dialogue with God, the conscious creature has lost the occasion of knowing the meaning of the word of God had by the world, and His endless and deifying words related to the basic word of the creation and the flourishing of ever higher meanings on the world's network of meanings." (2003: 505)

"Between the Hypostasis of the Word of Christ and the body assumed by Him, and between the embodied Christ and the mankind's body, between Christ the Head and the Church's Body, there is an infinitely greater difference, but there is an adequacy too, and due to it the Son of God can frame, on Himself, into the mankind, but by doing so, He frames the mankind in Himself and he opens to the mankind the infinite horizons of light and life of the godhead, giving the mankind the possibility of moving in these horizons and of living out of them." (Stăniloae 2006: 90)

"The mankind itself is created as a body, partially in order to be fully accomplished in its quality as body. The mankind is a dialogic body ever before being gathered in Christ, but it has become a much more symphonic body after has been gathered in Christ. This is because, without having a Head, which to be, on one hand, a head from amongst its members and, on the other hand, to be a superior Head of the mankind – the absolute Head – the mankind is unable to fully actualize its quality of body, because the limbs it is composed of, by being equal, the do not easily accept the unity under a head raised from amongst them, for no one can open to them a horizon which to be above them, and no one elevates them to such a horizon and no one places them in connection with the powers of infinite life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 90)

“Having Christ as Head, and being thus constituted as Church, the mankind had by Him the ultimate transcendence in intimate connection with itself, as living and loving Hypostasis of the mankind; the mankind can transcend on itself, being helped by this fundamental Hypostasis, though being a Hypostasis descended amongst the human hypostases; the mankind is through Christ in an endless transcending.” (Stăniloae 2006: 91)

“The Church lives out of another life than the life of the natural mankind, though the last one isn’t abolished, but it is imprinted with the Ghost of the deified body of Christ; better said, the mankind is open to the godlike infinity from Christ’s body and partaker to it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 91)

“The man was capable, by his will and by his connection with all the things, to produce the division in everything, as also between the things and God Who is their ultimate unifier principle. This is because by separating from a man, the man has separated himself from the other man’s mode of seeing the entire reality and from brotherly using the reality, and thus, each man raised against another the whole reality, or they have divided the reality amongst them through strife and fight, always trying to maintain the reality divided, by using the same means. They divided themselves by this, and no one of them is in accord with the whole reality as such.” (Stăniloae 1997: 6-7)

“But the people born after the sin, though they are in some measure born out of the Ghost as well, they are in the most part separated from the Ghost. The Holy Ghost helps to their birth and to their maintaining them in a certain novelty, but in a novelty quite limited, for they aren’t in a full communication with them. For this motif, they become solidified with ease, and by this they die bodily and spiritually. The Ghost is intensely present within them as interminable mobile principle, in order to maintain their spirit partaker to His mobility also the body capable of interminably nourishing its movement out of the cosmic water and out of Ghost. The Ghost no longer blows freely within them, because they have chained themselves through the inferior passions of the natural repetition, being only bodies, but not life too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 24)

“Even the world seen as a whole, God has created it in order Him to reach through the man in everything. This is the man’s specific mission: to be a connection ring between God and the world, a connection rings amongst all the things, through his spirit united with God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 166)

“In his quality as creature of God, the man differs from Creator, but he is also united with the Creator, for he is the created image of the uncreated role-model, and for the man, in order to be able to grow up in freedom in God, he has been made changeable, while God is unchangeable.” (Stăniloae 1997: 303)

“The human nature must be accomplished through movement in freedom, by following its authentic direction. This free movement towards his source, a source searched for as a purpose, it given the human nature its true signification. In his movement the creature always overcomes his finitude, namely the limit he has reached.” (Stăniloae 1997: 303)

“The man is created in the image of godlike Word, of the divine rationality, both in the meaning as rational being and in that of speaking being. This is for these ones do not exist without one another. The man always speaks answering; the man speaks for he has to answer somebody, for he understands what somebody tells him, and for he can give an answer to that one. And he commits deeds, proving his words as true. By this he becomes man and he helps other to become consummate in this quality of theirs, by making himself sensitive and by sensitizing others too. The people find themselves through their being in the need for answering in order they to be actualized as human beings and of making other too to be actualized as human beings. The child learns how to speak and how to do the expected deeds, for he must answer his mother. But she also teaches him how to speak and how to commit the good deeds due to her responsibility towards the supreme forum speaking to her, namely God. The people have been created with the need for answering, and by this they answer the godlike Word. The people are reasoning for they have to actualize their humanity in words and in deeds, they answer making sense, and their answer being right. For the godlike Rationality and the godlike Word have made them rational and speaking, the people have been placed in the indissoluble connection of the speaking and of the rational committing, into communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 308)

“His relating to absolute, his gradual elevation towards absolute, in order to fill up his being and the world with his value and light, it is essential to the man. The man is anchored and rooted in absolute, and he is created for restoring his original connection with the absolute. The absolute is the beginning and the end of the man, it is the man’s target. That’s why the man cannot be cogitated but in relation with the absolute. (...) The man can be defined as a being who must ceaselessly transcend. It isn’t only about a transcending towards the world and towards his fellow humans, but it is a transcending towards what constitutes the real transcendence to the world and to everything belongs to the world.” (Stăniloae 2005: 96)

“The fact that the man, by his nature, he is bond also to a body, but the man is bond also to the purely spiritual God, it places the man in the middle, between nature and God, as a connection ring. That’s why the man can serve both as image of the nature’s forces, namely as idol, when the man’s spirit allows to be dominated by the passions caused by nature through his body, but also as image of the transcendent God, and then the man can be transparent to the unseen God, when the man actualizes and potentiates the communication with God, namely the spiritual presence of God as transcendent or absolutely superior to the man, so that God is reflected through the man’s spirit and body. The human being is iconic by the fact that he can actualize in a culminant mode the human reality of the image of God. Just by the fact that the man is called by Scripture as “image of God”, it shows that the man is destined through his being, not to be an idol or an image of the nature as supreme reality, but the man is destined to be “icon” which opens the sight towards the spiritual limitlessness of God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 223)

“The man is through himself a reality exceeding the nature submitted to some involuntary and unconscious laws. The man is thirsty for the limitlessness and for the freedom which exceed the nature. The man has within himself an infinitely complex life, capable of a liberty that wants to infinitely be prolonged, capable of an always new thinking which exceeds the simple recording of the nature’s laws. The man is a transparent mirror and a channel which the world is communicated through, the conscious, spiritual free, and infinite life of God. The man can always bring something new in the nature which is submitted to the repetition’s laws.” (Stăniloae 2005: 223)

“The man is a being destined to transcend the nature. This is, for the man though being within nature, he cannot be locked up within nature.” (Stăniloae 2005: 224)

“It is hard to make an exact description to this mysterious unity of the contrasts, which the human being is as soul and body, even in this life before resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1995: 87)

“The human being is endlessly richer, deeper, and complex, than to be locked un in universe; the human being has an endlessly higher aspiration, and that’s why his aspiration cannot be satisfied by the universe. This is another meaning of the saying that the human being isn’t made for universe, but the universe is made for the human being. The human being doesn’t have the purpose of narrowing the universe’s limits, but he has in himself the capacity, through spiritual union with God, through cogitation and will, to widen the universe and to make it, not so much during history but at the end of history, as a fully transparent environment, to God Who is the Source of the eternal and unlimited life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 124)

“The person couldn’t have communicated himself to another person, if they hadn’t had the universe as common, in a certain manner, and, in the same time, as seen by each person from his own point of view; the human being wouldn’t have communicated himself sincerely, if the human beings hadn’t have the universe as a common place which each human being works differently in, not in opposition with other persons but in harmony with them, and not for his egotistic use but for the others’ use too.” (Stăniloae 1995: 125)

“The human being is more than one can see in him. The hope isn’t limited to the visible things and to the things one can have during his present life. This shows that the transcending lived by the man it isn’t a simple transcending towards a future of his life in the same material universe, but it is a true transcending towards his existence after his death, in union with the Absolute. And the Absolute, Whom the human being hopes he will be fully satisfied by, He cannot be reached during the life in the present material universe. That’s why, the human being is mastered by an aspiration towards a true transcending, that doesn’t deserve this name when limited to the passing from a moment in time to another moment in time, in the present material universe. The human being is mastered by his aspiration towards infinite; the human being wants to transcend towards infinite.” (Stăniloae 1995: 131)

“The human being is always open towards the future, by never being able to think that he has reached the end of his existence. The human being is ceaselessly moving towards future, towards a live of endless happiness. The human being never stops this movement in his spirit, not even on his death bed. His movement is towards a happy eternity. This is his target. Without this movement towards this target, the human being’s existence cannot be conceived. Without this movement, the human being would have been not only inert or spiritually dead, but also irrational. That’s why Saint Maximos the Confessor said that the will is the rational movement of the human being, or the movement of the rational human being, even if the human being gives a wrong direction to the rationality which his will is imprinted with. The animal doesn’t have worry or hope, for the animal isn’t open towards the future, towards an endless future, for the animal isn’t rational. In case the human being uses correctly the rationality manifested in his will, he hopes that the aspects of his present life, if right, they will help him towards the eternal life; the human being’s worry becomes, thus, the care for achieving the eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 132-133)

“The human nature isn’t a reality locked up in itself. The human nature is connected to the divine being. And the fact that the human nature exists in diverse persons it shows that also in this regard, it happens to the human nature what it is committed into God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 145)

“Between human being, as image of God, and God as the human being’s prototype, there is something resemblant. We have here the same unity of the contrasts which we have seen it as characterizing the human being in many regards. This unity gives the human being the possibility of coming ever-closer to God, so that God to be evermore-present within the human being, but that won’t ever confound them to one another.” (Stăniloae 1995: 180)

“Writing an exhaustive book about man it is impossible. His sadness, his spiritual pain, his joys, his worries, his hopes, his sentiments of friendship, of fear, of antipathy, and of love, they cannot be known except by the man who lives them by directly experiencing his internal life. Another person knows those by being communicated by the ones who lives them, but also by the fact that he experiences the same pains, joy, and worries, in a kindred mode, though not entirely identical. This shows that each person brings his own experience in knowing the internal experience of another, and also the fact that his experience is enriched through another’s experience. This own experience stays also at the basis of the historical “science”, or of the understanding of the documents, which aren’t scientifically known except in their content and as approximate communication of the ones who wrote them.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 31)

“One ascertains within man the presence of a factor superior to the matter’s processes, and the fact that the man isn’t satisfied, except for short moments, with the satisfactions offered him by the material nature of his body. And the most full and lasting bodily satisfactions, they will leave the man in an increasingly sad state, after experiencing each of them, if he limits himself only to those satisfactions. From here it comes the necessity of exceeding those satisfactions. The man doesn’t find true joys except in transcending the satisfactions which the nature offers him. The content of the man’s internal life is composed and produced not only by the positive connection with the nature through body, but also by transcending the nature to the loving connection with other persons. This gives the man’s internal life a higher content. But neither this plan of his internal life it fully satisfies the man. A superior content, a fully satisfying one, is brought within man by transcending that man’s connection with his fellow humans, to the faith in God, the absolute Person capable of providing everything our life needs. The believer has found in this a full and steadfast peace and settlement of his life.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 32)

“The man is a being always aware of his insufficiencies, and of his failures in fulfilling his duties. But the man cannot resign to remain in those failures, and he always tends towards his correction by fulfilling his duties. But the man cannot do that except in relation with others. And this is an endless road. The man cannot say ever that he has accomplished himself and then him to cease to exist. The man is made for continuously accomplishing himself, because of never having the infinity he is searching for, as an achieved infinity.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 33)

“Only the man who lets himself to be overcome by egotism, or who reckons himself as being composed only of a body submitted to the repetition’s laws, he weakens his stretching towards a superior fulfillment and towards always new experiences. Such a man ceases, increasingly more, to be always new. This man is the addicted man who, by spasmodically fulfilling, for short moments, his pleasures offered him by the world, he awakens always in a sadness which he thinks he can get rid of by getting back to the same satisfying of his pleasures. And once he ascertains that the passionate satisfactions offered him by the nature, through the bodily pleasures, they do not offer him a real transcendence, he gradually ascertains that the only transcendence getting him out of sadness it is the communion with another. Thus, he can dispense himself, one at the time, of the material things, better said he gets rid of what he sees in the material things as means of satisfying his addiction, and he retains increasingly more only what widens and deepens his more durable spiritual experience and knowledge, and the communication with others. Without a doubt, this is more than experiencing the pleasures given him by things or by body’s satisfying. Even the nature becomes to him a means of transcending towards a spiritual knowledge, especially when seen as a place of encountering the others. As long as the nature is seen in itself, the close nature becomes owned by the man, in egotistic sense, and the far nature it remains him stranger. In both case the nature leaves the man in loneliness.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 33-34)

“Only while the man is, with his soul, in communication with another, the man is no longer alone. Such a man transcends the nature towards another, or towards others, even when they are not present, for he sees imprinted within nature the presence from yore of some persons whom he communicated with. This transcendence is expresses in the ancestral songs of each people.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 34)

“Neither the nature nor the another’s person give the man the true transcendence. They only can mediate to the man a real transcendence that he needs. They do not give the man what he wants. They do not give the man the fulness of the satisfaction.

This shows us how the man can use all the things during his climbing towards God, but also the fact that he must exceed all those things in order to do that.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 34)

“The harmony amongst the components of the human nature, and between those components and the whole creation and with God, the harmony which the human nature craves for in its depth and which is eternally being consummate, it is felt as characteristic to the human nature’s normalness. This is due to the fact that all the things are the creator work of God, the man being summoned through his own nature to consummate the completing harmony in himself and with God, or the harmony with his fellow humans and with the whole universe in God. The more the man increases in closeness with God-Person, the more the man increases in his harmony with everybody and with all things. A contrary, the mans’ impulse towards fighting everybody and everything, or towards “bellum omnium contra omnes”, it is seen by the Christian faith as a falling of the human being off his normality, or into the sin of the man from the beginning, inherited by all Adam’s descendants, towards the weakening of their humanity. Such impulse cannot bring the man to consummation and to having peace in himself and with all the things.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 40)

“The man is, by and large, a unitary person, but he is in the same time complex in an untold manner. The person’s unity and, in the same time, the person’s complexity, are shown in the fact that a unitary self is manifested in an endless multiplicity of thoughts, of feelings, and of acts, which the person wants to reach through, to his integral expression, but he never reaches an end. The human being tends, through this, towards a plenitude, but he seen that is doesn’t belong to his power to reach it, for he needs everything that exists and he needs God too, on Whom all the things depend. The man is a being of indefinite complexity and destined to eternity, also because he virtually comprises and he tends to actualize and he to ever-more unite, all the contrastive forms of the reality, but without ever reaching the end of this tendency.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 41)

“The man seems to himself as non-comprisable. He always realizes that he participates to infinite, but himself isn’t the infinite. The man always lives, in the same time with his indefinite, also his insufficiency, his relativity, but united with an aspiration towards absolute, towards infinite, which he feels himself connected with. This contrastive aspect can also be expresses like this: the man is a creature of God and he participates to the life of God, but he doesn’t participate to the Being of God. The man isn’t a part of God’s Being, but neither the man is separated from God. The man is created by God, but the man isn’t totally lacking the participation to God and the man isn’t totally separated from God. The man isn’t “thrown in a multitude” as Heidegger said. The man is objectively upheld in existence by the infinite

God, and the man is unable not to tend, subjectively, towards Absolute. But the man can identify the Absolute wrongly, by confounding the Absolute to the world's essence which the man also belongs to, for the man knows himself and he knows the world as indefinite. The absolute cogitated like that, it still isn't the real Absolute, and it cannot really satisfy the man. Besides these, the real Absolute cannot lack the conscience and the freedom, namely the character as Person. The man doesn't tend towards an absolute which is insufficient to some extent, or towards an absolute that cannot comfort him with his conscience about himself, and with a free love, by having a character as Person. That's why the man's transcending towards an immanent absolute it isn't a real transcending, because of not bringing the man in connection with what consummately satisfies the man. Such a false transcending rather narrows the man to an enormous degree, and it forces the man to resign himself with the idea that his death as visible being it is a total death." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 41)

"Through the contrasts united in his being, the man can grow up in knowing that his self is forever inexhaustible mystery, but a mystery which doesn't stand by itself, but it is unite with a self-standing superior mystery, having not insufficiencies in His existence. The more the man knows about himself the more he knows himself as a mystery but, in the same time, the man knows himself as an abyss which he can gather in, and which he can draw out, always new meanings, as poet Pierre Emmanuel said. But not only these meanings appear to be as always non-full, but his self appears to him, in the same time, as insufficient in itself. In experiencing the inexhaustible abyss of my own self, I live, in the same time, my insufficiency, or I live myself as open to an abyss that has no insufficiencies. The man is an inexhaustible mystery whom endlessly irradiates through, the rays of the absolute mystery, which the man depends on. But this can be an occasion for deceit too, to the man, by making him to reckon about Himself that he is one with the absolute Infinite, or that he represents the supreme infinity which he would have it together with the world, as ultimate reality. But this infinity of the man is imprint ted by an insufficiency leading the man, for sure, to the death live as endless spiritual poverty. The man who lets himself to be deceived by it, he pretends not to notice that. By not noticing the paradox between the inexhaustible character of his own self, depending in the same time on a transcendent infinity from beyond himself, such a man transforms his thirst for the transcendent infinity into a thirst for getting power and for getting rich through himself, in an insatiable egotism, manifested in diverse forms: unlimited trust in himself, the insatiable desire for dominating others, the hoarding of as many as possible material goods etc. These are deceits which the man lets himself to be conquered by, despite him being fully aware of their passing character." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 42-43)

“One could say that the divine rationality, that stays at the foundation of the man, it isn’t only that power that makes the man spirit, but it is too, the power that, through spirit, it transforms the cosmos’s rationality in body’s biological rationality (starting from the mother’s womb, who nourishes the new body with the blood loaded with nourishing substances from her food, and continuing to nourish the human being after his birth), the spirit unites these two ones but without confounding them to one another, and by this the spirit, increasingly more, he spiritualizes the body and the world. In the man’s soul there are the powers which organize the material matter in a body and which work through the body. The animal too, it sees through his eyes, as the man does, but the animal doesn’t put anything conscious in the act of the vital eating. The rationality structure within animal, it doesn’t have except the vital powers. The rationality structured within man it is accomplished in a soul that, besides the vital, or biological, powers, he has too, the spiritual powers. That’s why, the man can and he is asked to exceed, increasingly more, through his conscience, his biological feelings, through spiritualized feelings.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 45)

“By and large, the human being is a unity of the contrasts, by the fact that he is creature, but he is too, a dynamic image of the Creator. By this, the human being tends towards an increasingly greater transparency to God. The human being know that he is in extreme dependency on God, by being a creature, but, in the same time, the human being is able to work and cogitate in freedom, as person, and to tend towards an increasingly tighter connection with the supreme Person, in order the human person to be increasingly united with God and to see all things as transparent to God, and without being confounded to God, but by remaining what he is. The movement towards Absolute it maintains the person, by itself, as a mystery in his quality as image of the Absolute, and on the other hand, by being the human person increasingly imbued with God. The Holy Fathers called this dynamic character of the image as likeness. And this is for, on the other hand, the human person is being filled up, through the likeness, with the generous kindness of God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 54)

“The human being is a hypostatical unity - or person - of the element differentiated to the greatest extremity from one another. Neither the union is impeded by those elements, nor the difference is abolished by unity.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 55)

“The man is the existence asking: what am I? But, in order the man to ask this question, he must be aware about himself. Thus, the man is a self always aware about himself, and who always asks the question: what am I? the human being is always accompanied by a light coming out from him, a light that is, in the same time, projected towards himself, a light trying to know increasingly better, what the own self is. The human being calls on himself me, and to the one whom he speaks the human being calls him you, and to the one whom the two speak about of they think at him, they call that him. The “name” given to each man it isn’t a really characterizing name, but it is a name differentiating a person from others. Although, by uttering me, the man expresses the most passionate reality for himself. The human being doesn’t know what this me is, but he lives this me continuously and at maximum. Through me I consciously live myself and I live all things relatedly to me. The second passionate reality and connected to that immediate reality of the me, it is you. You are the one checking me and strengthening me in existence. Through you I verify what I know and what I live, and you are a second content of immediate living. You make me suffer and you hurt me, according to the own self, the most. But you heal me too. And he is the one who was, or the one who will be, in the role of the you, working with me or preparing to me the living me the living you are producing me. This is for I am subject and the first object of the knowledge, and I know all the things through myself, as connected on me. And I know you as the one who knows yourself and who knows all the things related to me or through you. But I know you only through my own self. I know also on myself as a center and I know that you know yourself as a center too. Only in exceeding ourselves we complete our knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 59)

“The continuous knowing about himself, of the man, it is, in the same time, a practical preoccupation with himself; the human being appreciates on himself, he looks at himself with discontent, he judges on himself, he rejoices, he regrets some things and states of his, he urges on himself to some words, deeds, attitudes, and plans, and he stops on himself from other things, as being the center of all of those. He refers all the things to himself. But, by all of those, he is connected to other persons and to the things from outside. The human being wants, especially, to make on himself as he wishes, or as he thinks he must be. He knows about himself and he wants on himself, but he doesn’t know himself entirely; and he sees that he is in a certain way, but he wants to develop this way of being, of his, namely he wants to change on himself. The self continuously moves and changes, while still remaining identical.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 59-60)

“In all his preoccupations, the human being has as foundation the self-awareness and, as motif, it has the question about what he is and what he must become. This means that the self-awareness isn’t also a satisfactory knowledge about himself, and the ascertainment that, partially, of what he is, it doesn’t mean also being satisfied with what he is. Especially into the more thoughtful persons, the discontent related to what they know about themselves and with what they see that they are, it is caused by an insufficiency they know as theirs, but this imposes too, a continuous questioning, on the purpose of better knowledge on themselves and of getting closer to what they thing that they must be. Thus, the human being continuously asks on himself theoretically and practically, about himself, but he never can answer satisfactorily. But just through continuously questioning about himself and through the unsatisfactory answers, the human being always transcends on himself. He transcends of himself in the sense that he searches for a fulfillment and for an answer, beyond himself, because of not finding out, from himself, the full answer. In the question about himself it is included also the question about a supreme existence, which the man realizes that he depends on.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 60)

“Only the human being asks about himself, and he still cannot answer satisfactorily. But, knowing and asking about himself it is a very important thing. (...) Even in the fact of never satisfactorily answering the question about what he is, it is shown the fact that the man is more than everything that can be defined, that the man can never comprise on himself, no matter how many new answers and characterizations he would give about himself, and to himself. The human being manifests in this the awareness about his incomprehensibility. But he knows that he depends on something that exceeds his power of comprising. By this, he adds to himself the awareness that he has his being in dependency on an infinite which differs from him, which is above his power of comprising, and which imprints to the human existence an incomprehensibility too.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 60)

“It has been said that the human being is a mystery; the human being is, properly said, apophatic or inexpressible.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 60)

“The human being is a mystery who knows about his existence as mystery and who is capable to ask questions about himself. And he even must ask questions about himself. Being aware of the fact that he is a mystery, the human being is in the same time aware of the fact that he can progress and he must progress in knowing his mystery. But, in the same time, the human being is aware of never reaching the end of his mystery, for he realizes that his roots are upheld by an Infinite which he is tied to and which all the things depend on. The human being is a light lightening into darkness. Socrates formulates the sentence: “I know that I know nothing”. This is a sentence referring, in the first place, to the human being, namely a sentence the man tells it about himself. But even Socrates’s negation has something positive in it: the human being knows that he doesn’t know anything. (...) To this we can add: the human being is a self or a me constantly asking questions about himself, and who is discontent of not knowing enough on himself or because he cannot define himself. The human being can never fully satisfactorily answer his own questions about himself, but he must continuously ask those questions. The fact that the human being doesn’t cease asking, continuously, questions about himself, it shows that he knows that he is a self as such, who always asks questions about himself, and who, though, he understand a few things about himself, and who constantly hopes to understand more, but will never be satisfied with what he will answer and who will always declare that he will remain, further, discontent, and that he will continue to ask questions. By this, the human being know that he is more than he knows and sees about himself. He knows that he is and that is it is a mystery exceeding anything the human being succeeds to know about himself. He is a mystery lived in a conscious manner. The human being knows that he is a subject knowing something, so that he is a person.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 60-61)

“The human being is, on one hand, a mystery, and on the other hand he has, in the self-awareness and in the self-experiencing, a light unceasingly projected from within himself, towards himself and towards the supreme mystery which he knows that he depends on. The self-awareness ceaselessly accompanies the human being, as a conscience wanting to know increasingly more about himself. Only when sleeping, this conscience doesn’t work. In the same time, through the self-awareness, the human being doesn’t know anything about himself, or he only knows that he exists, but, through it, the human being differs from everybody and from everything. This is for he sees around him other persons too, and he sees a world of things which he is in a necessary connection with. So, the human being can discern amongst mysteries, while being also connected to them. The human being notices them as mysteries, though through an insufficiently definitory knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 61)

“Through his self-awareness, the human being often examines on himself, in his distinctive traits which differs him from others, but he never reaches to understand what he is, though he lives as different from others. The human being knows that he exists and that he differs from all the things, but he doesn’t exhaustively know what he is and what differs him from others. If the man had been only a material body, he would quickly have finished with the self-awareness. The conscience and the self-awareness they increase, by continuously enriching him with the knowledge about the objects’ world and about the other people, but the human being never reaches to a full understanding of himself, as either of the other persons and of the whole world, though by living and by observing them he knows on himself, and on them, and on the things, known to a certain extent. The most unknown remains the Mystery Whom all the things depend on, together with himself, though, on the other hand, the human being knows about His existence through thinking and through a certain living on Him as The One Who all the things depend on. The human being is enriched not only through what he is communicated by others, but also through the objects’ world, due to the fact that through his self-awareness and through the awareness about the things, he sees himself as higher that they are, and also by the fact that he often finds meanings even in their materiality, meanings exceeding this materiality and the human being's power, and which raise questions to him: where they are coming from?; what they stay together like?; what their purpose is? And as the man cannot but ask on himself about these, the world's things depend, somehow, on him, increasing his mystery; the human being exists in connection with the things, and he must exercise his function as their light, in order to illuminate upon himself. But the human being cannot do this in a sufficient mode. He is the things' light, he doesn't need them in order to fulfill this function of his, while the things are created in order to contribute to making the human being, through the light projected upon them, and also through the light he discovers within things, more self-aware. The world depends of the human being, but not in its existence and structures; and the human being depends on the world, not in his existence but in the necessity of valuing the world and of more fully self-valuing. So, both the human being and the world depend on one another in the light which they give to each other, but they also depend on a Subject superior to both of them: the world and the human being depend on one another on the purpose of the reciprocal valuing. For the man sees the helplessness of the world's self-valuing, and he sees also his helplessness of crossing over some limits in valuing the world, the human being realizes that the world isn't the ultimate reality and that neither he is the world's ultimate master, but above both of them there is a superior Subject. The supreme Word Who created the rational world as object and the human being as rational subjective being, He continues to endlessly shape each one of them, through the world He tells to the human being through the world and through the man's fellow human beings." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 61-62)

"The human being is a light through which he firstly illuminated on himself, out from himself, but still realizing that he doesn't do that out of himself, in the last analysis. The human being lightens on himself but in relation with other persons and in connection with the world; and by being helped by them. And we've just said that the human being lightens on himself and he partially lightens the world, as a light springing out from his luminous darkness. But not only out of the luminous darkness of his, but also out of the One Whom the human being depends on, and out of all the words That One tells the human being through the world and through the fellow humans, or out of the whole those ones' existence. All the things are illuminated and all the things remain mysteries. The Absolute which all the things depend on He is the supreme light and, in the same time, He is the supreme darkness or mystery. The closest to the man is the mystery of his own self. This mystery characterizes and it is the essence of the human being. But the man, despite knowing this, he won't reach his essence or foundation. The human being is identical to himself and, in the same time, by being his own self-aware, there is upheld a certain duality, especially for one can see through his self a foundation that it differs from the self. From here comes also the name of conscience, which expresses the nature of a knowledge which the human being isn't alone within, so that he never reaches the sentiment of a total loneliness. Or, in his loneliness, the human being is tormented by his own self and by another person; the human being needs to meet another person, or he knows that even he is separated from everything and from everybody, still somewhere is Somebody differing from himself. In this conscience of the human being, it is manifested the fact that in his own self there is present that Subject from above his own self. The human being's own self it upholds his awareness about his own self, but the human being's own self escapes from being fully known. The human being is a dual-singular existence, who, on one hand, he is a shown luminous that, and on the other hand, he is non-comprisable source of light. Through this duality the human being exceeds on himself. This is for he realizes that his own self is a source of light by what it is within it and beyond it. The human being's own self it always upholds the human being's interest in it. The human being's own self in in a dialogue which doesn't take place only between the self and the human being, but it is a dialogue constantly fueled by Somebody Who is above it. The own self of the human being never totally surrenders to the awareness about it, as proof that it cannot exist the mystery of the One Who is above it. The knower self constantly advances in knowing on himself but never reaches to comprise the own foundation." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 62-63)

"The human being's own self, as reality never exhausted by knowledge, it is an enrichment source for an endless knowledge. And this shows the man as united, in his own self, with the infinite source of the reality and of the luminous light, namely with God Who is the endless life and an inexhaustible source of spiritual enrichment and of knowledge. Of this connection with the God infinite in life and in light it consists the mystery of the human person. The human being continuously sips from the endless life and light of God, just through his own self, but he still remains far from the end of the full life and light. The human being remains a distinct person, but still tied to God Who is the source of the life and of the light. The human being isn't God, but he is in communication with God, and that's why the human being is never fully known, for otherwise one should fully know God Himself. The human being is an abyss whose end won't ever be reached, for this abyss isn't his own abyss, but it is God's abyss, as a place which the man is sunken within. To the self it appears, through the mystery of the known and knower self, a Third supreme Self. The human being is by this too, an image of the Trinity." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 63)

"The human being's nature, though it is one, it is composed both of soul and of body. And this composition of the human being's nature gives the person the possibility to unit within himself the whole stretch of the reality, from God to the seen things." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 83)

“Generally speaking, the newly conceived human being isn’t only a synthesis of his parents’ bodies and souls, or of the powers existing in those ones. The new body that is being formed, according to the soul existing in the body since the beginning, he has a uniqueness too, due to his new soul. In this is shown the creator power of God Whose imagination is so rich that it isn’t forced to repeat Himself in creating the new human beings. This is for in each person God places the seal of a unique and eternal value. Each person gives something new in eternity, for never it will be communicated his mystery of divine origin, and for he won’t ever be merged to another person. All the persons are enriched in eternity through all the persons. Each person’s uniqueness, but also the need of each person for the other persons, it condemns both the individualistic separatism and the attempt to uniformize the persons or to merge them in the great mass. In the uniqueness of each person and in the eternal need for communion amongst the persons, it is manifested the infinite spiritual richness of God.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 86)

“Each soul comes from God, but he is also in a connection with the parents conceiving him and giving him birth, and his body is influenced by the soul organizing the body, and vice versa. God didn’t want to bring a new human being to existence without the collaboration of his parents, or without the new person to be, since the beginning of his forming, in connections felt by his parents as love, since the beginning, like the new human person feel too, since the moment of the apparition of his conscience. And these connections contribute too, to the new human being’s uniqueness. Each human being is determined as unique person, also through unique relations he is in with other people from around him, and in diverse circumstances of his life.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 86)

“By and large, in the fact that the body and the soul compose a unique being, it is shown that the human being isn’t only material. The human being’s body is a material matter, organized and spiritually elevated, crossed through and made a complex organism of the spirit, and in the spirit, there are all the powers organizing the body and manifesting through body. If the man had been only material matter, how would have been preserved in the human beings’ conscience or memory, as steadfastly actualized deposit, or potential, all the things happened to him? The spirit united with the body makes the human being an inexhaustible and unique deposit in his multiple manifestations, and it makes him an unfathomable mystery to the knowledge. This makes each human being as a unique person, not reduced to uniform and repeatable laws. Through spirit, the body’s movements and many processes within body, they become wanted, felt, and consciously chosen.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 86)

“We believe that there is, besides the insufficient existence which we live within, in this life, a superior existence and which our being has an unquenchable aspiration towards. Actually, the existence which we live in, it shows, on one hand, its insufficiency, and on the other hand, our being is imprinted with the aspiration towards a consummate existence in even its insufficiency and temporality. In a way, our being is shown as connected to the pretemporal consummation.” (Stăniloae 1995: 5)

“Regarding the human conscience, even its own domain of knowledge doesn’t stay under its control. Neither are under the human being’s control the time’s processes, which belong to the human being’s structure. All the less are under human conscience’s control the nature’s processes. The human conscience is gradually enriched, in time, by knowing the nature’s phenomena external to the human being, but also by communicating with other human consciences. Even the time, which the human conscience’s enrichment depends on, it shows the human conscience’s lack of fullness, and that doesn’t reach, in time, its fullness, namely that the fullness requires, in order to be achieved, the exceeding of the time. All the less the human conscience knows its foundations in the eternal and plenary existence. Only the plenary existence, creator of the spiritual and of the material universe It has also the full conscience of Itself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 9)

“One can ask the question: why the human being, as creature, he wasn’t made as consummate from the beginning? Why the human being has been created in order to reach the consummation by travelling a road to it? If the Son and the Holy Ghost receive their existence as consummate, out of the Father, why the people do not receive their existence as consummate, out of creation?

We can answer this question like this: the people would have had the plenary or consummate existence since the beginning, if they had been born or proceeded out of the being of God, as the Son and the Holy Ghost did, and this would have meant that there wouldn’t have been only one Son Whom the absolute paternal love to be focused on, which to be overpoured upon us too, when the Son makes Himself as Brother with us, into humanity. That’s why, by being brought to existence through a creator power of the Holy Trinity, and out of nothing, the people couldn’t have had, since the beginning, the consummation they would have had it, if they had received the godlike being, but the people can advance in consummation, through an ever-tighter connection with God.

One could also ask: why the people aren’t given, through work, the whole consummation since the beginning?

We can answer this: a work doesn’t have in it everything the being has, so that a work cannot give the created man the being itself, like the human being too, he cannot give, through work, to another, his being itself, as he gives it to the born child. It is a wonderful thing that God produces persons, through work, as the human being cannot do. The human being's person was created, at its turn, out of nothing. But the person produced through God's work isn't one in being with the divine Person Who gives the human being the existence through making or through work. That's why the human person neither is one with the divine Persons Who come to existence by birth or by proceeding out of the Father, receiving, by this, the divine being itself. Here we have again, the importance of the distinction operated between the godlike being and the godlike work, thoroughly explained by Saint Gregory Palamas. Without this distinction, one cannot explain the creation out of nothing, of the thing and of the human creatures, as distinct from God. If the case had been different, all of them would have been of the same essence, in pantheistic sense. And all of them would have been condemned to imperfection and death, definitively, even if considered as divine." (Stăniloae 1995: 32)

"The human persons neither can receiving, during their existence, the divine being, so that, they cannot have, on any given moment, the existence's plenitude. The human persons receive goals of existence through a continuous work of God and of theirs, especially out of the continuous communication between the divine being's works and the human being's works. In Jesus Christ, the human work and the divine work are united in one Person. And out of this union of the two works in only one Person, in Christ, the human persons receive, at their turn, the godlike work, which, through the union with the human work of theirs, it gives the human persons the power of advancing in the union with God, feeling increasingly more, how, out of the divine being, their being is communicated the work of the divine being." (Stăniloae 1995: 33)

"The human person, though created out of nothing, through the divine work, it is brought to existence, upheld in existence, and helped in his development, through other godlike works than the works referring to things. Even in the work of creating the human being, there are intertwined several works. It is one the work of creating the body through the "hands" of God, and is another the work of "breathing" the soul within that body, though between these two works there is a solidarity. This is for through one is the work God creates an understanding soul, and another is the God's work helping the human being to achieve understanding and love. It is true that all the other things are imparted with the God's love, but there is a very big difference between the impartation of the material things and the impartation of the conscious persons; and there is an even greater difference between the impartation of the average believers and the impartation of the saints. The ones living only sensitively, or not even sensitively, they do not receive the power of "living in a deified mode". Only the persons "are worthy of an actual impartation" (Saint Gregory Palamas, About Participation, at Priest Dumitru Stăniloae, The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas Sibiu, 1938, p. 213). In God's being there are countless powers, and God uses His works in diverse degrees." (Stăniloae 1995: 33)

"The human being deepens himself/herself, with his/her rationality, within universe, as the Son deepens Himself, together with the Ghost, into the being He receives from the Father, by having on himself, and the universe, as imprinted by the Son and by the Ghost. The human being thinks at what is himself/herself and the universe tied to him/her, as shadow of the being given by the Father to the Son, for the Son thinks at Himself and at everything He has from the Father. The human person, gratefully becomes aware of his/her meanings, and of universe's meanings, received from the Father, through the Son, for the human being received those meanings illuminated in their model by the Son and Word of God, and accompanied by the joy maintained within him/her by the Ghost. The human being, by knowing on himself/herself, and the universe, he/she meets the Son of God Who projects the meanings, and the original thankfulness for those meanings, within Himself, for He has the Ghost. The human being knows on himself/herself, and the world, through the Son and together with the Son, and he/she feels the thankfulness towards the Father for his/her existence, and for the universe's existence, through the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 51)

"The human persons have received, from the Son, the seal of the filial Hypostasis, unveiling the light of the divine being received by the Son from the Father, and the universe, at its turn, it bears imprinted within itself the shadows of the meanings of the divine being, as received by the Son from the Father and as revealed within the Son. The universe isn't a chaos, neither is the man unwilling to discover the universe's meanings, all the way down to their roots, in the meanings of the divine being, and of himself/herself, in the meanings of the Son and Word of Word, for neither the Son and Word of God lacks the original quality revealing the meanings and of the gratitude, for receiving from the Father a full-of-meanings being, in order the Father's being to be revealed through the Son. The universe is luminous "light" (the Romanian word *lumina*¹⁶⁸ expresses this directly, but this is for the universe is given, as gift, to a seer and to a searcher for light, within universe and within himself/herself, a searcher for a light that doesn't come from himself/herself. The universe and the human being are luminous light, and the human being is searcher for light, but not because they are luminous light by themselves, but for they come from a Giver Who has the whole light within Himself and, that's why, the human being, by searching the luminous light all the way up to the luminous light's end he/she must search for God Who is the infinite Source of the light or the Source of the infinite light. The Word of God is imprinted within us, as the

¹⁶⁸ Coming from Latin: lumen (E. l. t.'s n.).

One Whom we have been created through, in God's image. Wanting to understand on ourselves, and the universe related to us, the Father has created us - the through His Word - as knower rationality and word expressing meanings discovered by this rationality within universe, to God and to the fellow humans, for God hasn't created through His Word only one human being in His image, but God has created many human beings, in order to be also within people a communion, as it is within the Holy Trinity, but a communion more easily accessible to the human being. This is also for the human being to be able to easily work the love they are asked to show it to God too, and in order all the human beings to be able to contribute to the understanding by each human being, of the so rich universe, and by this to understand God, as consummate communion of love." (Stăniloae 1995: 52)

"The human being as creature isn't the image of the Son like the Son is the image of the Father. This is for the human being isn't born out of the Son's being, like the Son is born out of the Father's being, but the human being is a creature. By being "in the image of the Son and Word", and not "the image of the Son and Word", the human being is created to aspire towards the Father in union with the Son and through the Son, in order the human being not to direct himself exclusively toward the Son, but through the Son towards the Father. The Son imprints His seal - as Son of the Father - upon the human being, in order the human being to be, at his/her turn, son of the Father, not according to God's being, but by the origin the human being has it from the Father. The human being is son of the Father, and he/she aspires towards his/her life's origin as person, by his/her nature, a nature that isn't out of the Father's being, as the Only Begotten Son is; but he/she has too, as origin and as foundation, the Father's power and work. But the human being had that by the fact that he/she is created by the Father, through the Son, and for he/she has received the seal of the Ghost." (Stăniloae 1995: 52)

"The Son is the Word of God too, or the Rationality, or the hypostatical Wisdom of God. The Son has placed His seal on the human being, also for he has endowed the human being, by creation, in his nature, with rationality, or with wisdom, with the rationality that moves towards infinity and towards the wise, all-comprising, non-unilateral, and profound understanding of all things, namely understanding about God Whom all the things have their reason and explanation within. Thus, in the human being's rationality it is placed the aspiration to actually know God, and to know all thing within God. Actually, to the human being's aspiration for knowing all the things, of not stopping at anything finite, neither to a sum of the finite things, it must correspond an objective from above all finite things, an all-satisfying objective, of the thirst for knowledge, of the human rationality. The human being aspires, through his/her rationality, to know the limitless Person, for only in Person the limitless is lived in a concretized mode and is experienced as real life. A reflecting of the limitless Person concretized as life, the human being has it in his own person and in others' persons. That's why, knowing on himself/herself, as knowing on others too, in a mode that isn't only a theoretical mode, but it is an experimental mode, it serves the human being as means which he/she ascends towards God through, God being the source of the eternal life. But knowing the nature serves to the human being towards knowing God too. The nature serves as such a means especially when the human being raises questions referring to the nature's origin, an origin that cannot be from the nature itself, and questions referring to the foundation and to the ultimate meaning of the nature, as also referring to the nature's connections with the mystery of the indefinable person. The nature proves to be given to the human being as means for advancing, by knowing the nature, towards the Word Who imprinted within nature His Rationality, a rationality accessible, to a certain extent, to the human rationality too. Thus, the nature can become transparent to God. But the human being, by knowing the nature as multiple gifts from God, given to him/her, he/she reaches through the increasingly profound rational knowledge of the nature, also to know the love from God Who has given the nature. Likewise, the human being reaches, by increasingly profound knowledge on his/her fellow humans, in the affectionate connection that bonds them and that makes them happy, and it warms them up and it illuminates their lives, to knowing the love from God Who has given them their existence and Who continuously enriches their existence through nature and through their fellow humans." (Stăniloae 1995: 53)

"The human being didn't go to this clean signification of the creation, namely towards discovering the creation's transparence for God. By this, neither he went towards the discovery of the spiritual mystery of his and of his fellow humans, a mystery that could have opened the depths towards the God-Person. The human being was tempted to remain to the superficial thickness of the nature, of his/her own, and of his/her fellow humans, which satisfies the him/her with the purely material pleasures given him/her by the purely material surface of the universe. The human being has limited himself to bodily use the nature, a fact that offers him/her some pleasure which he/her reckons as good, while those pleasure actually bring him/her evil consequences, and they lead to bringing the body from under the spirit's power and to bring the body on the level of its decomposition, all the way to death. The human being, thus, he/she has left the nature covered as "tree of life", by seeing the nature only as "tree of knowledge of the good and of the evil". This brought the human being out from under the conscious connection with the Son and Word of God, from within the true rationality imprinted by the Son of God to the creation and to the human beings, and also it has brought the human being out of the filial sentiments towards God and out from within the conscience maintained within the human being, by the Son, that the universe is a gift from the heavenly Father, and out from within rejoicing of this fact, joy given by the Ghost. This egotistic and blind addiction to the purely material surface of the universe, it has brought also an increasingly greater division and fight amongst people. Even Adam and Eva, they blame on one another, for their falling off the spiritual life in communion with God, as a fact that the communion between them weakened.” (Stăniloae 1995: 53-54)

“Christ promotes each human being to the full humanity, or to the deification according to the grace, but in union with all the people, for He wants to comprise everybody within Himself. This is for each human being is thought by God from eternity, as irreplaceable person in union with all persons. And each human being will eternally carry the state he/she has achieved in his/her efforts while living in time, in union with others. The person isn’t a product of an evolution submitted to some impersonal and uniform law, and destroyed by the evolution of an eternal time, a time that would have lacked the true happiness that the eternity gives the human person. The human being isn’t the toy of the time, but the human being helped by God, he/she uses the time, by developing himself, over time, beyond the time, in the happiness of the eternal communion with his/her fellow humans, and with the God in Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 65)

“The man is the purpose of the world and not vice versa.” (Stăniloae 2003: 11)

“(…) in order to use them (the inferior things from the nature, t. n.), the man organizes and processes the world’s data, placing his seal on them. This world’s adaptation to the man’s needs, always increasing and more refined needs, it needs, in the first place, to be known the things by the man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 14)

“In our conception we are made for eternity, for we are aspiring - like we would be choking – to infinite, for absolute.” (Stăniloae 2003: 14)

“The creature cannot become infinite by any addition. The infinity is transcendent to the creature, but in the same time the creature is conditioned by infinity, by participating to infinity by grace.” (Stăniloae 2003: 167-168)

“The unity in himself and his relation with all the things, it makes the man able to be the true connection ring, the true given center of the world, and also the center leading the world towards an increasing unity. On the other hand, by being the human being in union with God, on the measure this union increases it unites also the world increasingly more in the union with God. If God hadn’t been an absolute simple unity, but he had been in the same time the source of so many rationalities and creator and consummator acts of the world, the world wouldn't have been either diverse or having its unity (...)" (Stăniloae 2003: 174)

"The human being has the capacity of unite all things with one another and them with God because in his thinking all the things meet each other, and through his will the human being can accomplish a unity in him, a harmony with everybody and with God. That's why the human being can be called "the big world" (macrocosm) for he can spiritually comprise and master all the things." (Stăniloae 2003: 174)

"The man who believes, he firstly unifies himself in himself, by surpassing the division between soul and body and amongst his diverse tendencies. This can be accomplished by strengthening the spirit, a fact that equals the setting free of the body and of the spirit from the passions which weaken the man and divide the man in himself and in the reports with his fellow humans and with God." (Stăniloae 2003: 175)

"The man becomes, or becomes again, the factor of world's unification only on the measure he liberates himself from the passions which separate the people. The virtual union of everybody it is gradually actualized and it is progressing upwards, namely the man leads all the things towards their union in God. The believer, liberated from passions, he surpasses his separation from his fellow human, and then he surpasses the separation between him and the sensitive world, which he gathers it and he spiritualizes it in himself, and then he surpasses the separation between creation and God, by gathering the creation into God." (Stăniloae 2003: 216)

"The Eastern Tradition (...) admits four things: the accessibility of God it is revealed through the divine energies; the human is capable, through purification of passions, to become the environment of manifestation of the divine; the human it has been elevated in Christ on a maximum level of deification, or of being penetrated by divine, but without ceasing to be human; the divine is thus than can manifest through the purified human." (Stăniloae 2003: 217)

"The created beings are wonderful, for they are capable of receiving God whole, within them. God have created a being that is capable to become god by grace, a nature capable of being, on this purpose, the nature of a divine hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2003: 227)

"The human nature has God as subsistence basis, or, what makes the man capable of maintaining himself as an immortal and profound person, it is the divine spirit which strengthens the man's spirit." (Stăniloae 2003: 425)

“The natural powers towards good are being actualized also within the humanity which Christ extends Himself in, with His body, through the work of the Holy Ghost which irradiates out of Him. In his situation is the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 130)

“In the all-comprising Mystery of the union of God with the creation, each component has character of mystery, for it is connected with all the other components and all together are connected to God. No one is confounded to another, but it is kept in a connection with all the others, through the godlike Logos. The man has a special position in this great Mystery. The man is the image and the main organ of the great and dynamic Mystery of the union of the Logos with the entire creation, for, on one hand, right His being is the union of the spirit with the matter, and by this He unites within Himself the whole creation and the creation with God. The human spirit transfigures the matter which he is united from the beginning with, by organizing as body, as environment of the spirit’s work. In the man’s mystery, all his parts and functions are mysteries, for they participate to the man’s mystery as a whole. Mystery is the material eye which sees, mystery is the word uttered by man, as joining between sound and meaning, as filling up the sound with meaning. Mystery is the man’s face, matter lightened by thinking. The man has within himself the elements of the entire creation, and he even unites within himself, in a particular manner, the entire creation. This is for the man’s conscience tends to comprise the whole creation and through his technically extended eye, the man stretches himself to ever new distances, and if the rationality irradiates out of his brain, somehow, everywhere his rationality stretches to, there something of the energy of the brain’s matter stretches itself too. The man is the ring of the creation, or the true macrocosm, said Saint Maximos the Confessor, the man being the conscious head of the rational and unitary fabric of the world. But the man has this feature for he doesn’t stop either at the edges of the created world, but he surpasses them through aspiration and thinking, by participating to God Himself and by being open to His endless light. Only by this the man projects within world and upon the world a light and an irradiation from above the world, and an always new light. Only thus the man endlessly deepens the meaning of the world, or the world’s richness of meanings. Thus, the man accomplishes more than any other unity from within the world, the paradoxical character of the Mystery, by uniting in himself the spirit as conscious rationality with the matter as unconscious materialized rationality, the simplicity with the composition, the subjectivity with the objectivity, the definite with the indefinite, and even the created with the uncreated. By this, the man is created for bringing from the part of the creature too, a decisive contribution to maintain and to consummate the all-comprising mystery of the union of God with the creation, or to be the conscious and voluntary means through which God maintains and consummates this union. That’s why the man was the last to be introduced amongst creatures, as some kind of natural ring (σύνδεσμος) of the extremities of the whole, , through his own parts, and like one who brings, in unity, to himself, the things which are separated, according to their natures, by big distances, for, by firstly starting from his own division, through the union that gathers all the things in God as their cause, and then by gradually advancing in his ascension, to reach his target through all of them, by uniting them with God, in Whom there is no division.” (Stăniloae 1997: 5-6)

“Florensky says that the human being, by locking himself up in himself, he alters himself in such a measure that he is no longer an objective reality to others.” By getting accustomed to no longer vibrate when he says you, the human being no longer vibrates when he is called as you. He buries himself in a total indifference, in a death towards any relation. He no longer says but “me, me, and me”. “That one to whom there no longer exist any you, he no longer is you to others. He is neither you to God, nor God is a You to him. He has become an empty shell (Schale), as H.-P. Blavatsky calls the spirits, a “skin”, without a substance, something illusory, purely subjective, and just because of that he affirms only himself, desperately. The one who doesn’t no another reality and he sticks to his own self as to a unique reality, without being able to satisfactorily have this one too, he is obsessed with his self more than a phantasm. He has got out of reality “in the most outer darkness”, where he sees nothing. A true you, an objective reality he cannot be given except by the community with God. God has given the human being the power for this communion, but the development of the communion it depends on the human being’s contribution too. The human being cannot give himself the communion by himself, just because this would mean that he affirms himself and he doesn’t want to get out of himself, by forgetting about himself, in order to him truly exist as affirmed by others, for he affirms others too; in order him to exist in God, by affirming God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 179)

“Through the subject quality, the man is into some measure causa sui, in the sense that himself is the ultimate forum and source of his acts, and not an external or internal force which does not listen him. This is the reason why he is the one who creates, choosing one of many self-accomplishing possibilities. He is not causa sui in an absolute manner, because he does not give himself also the existence like a departure point, neither the possibilities which to be fulfilled.

But even if the man is not causa sui in an absolute manner, he surpasses, through his subject quality, the objects. The object does not exist per se, and it does not have an interior existence and self-determination. The object is the victim of the subject because of being the subject’s passive material. The object exists only for the subject, and it has an existence noticed only by the subject. The object is a tool without any internal resonance, and having only an external resonance. The object has lesser existence than the subject. To realize about the existence, it is a way to exist more and to have an extra power.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The human being called to be instrument of the heavenly initiative and to save the world, had to know the state of lust related to the tendency after procreation. And such a state cannot be free but into the purity, in the absolute virginity.

In fact, this should have been the report of the Cosmos, in general, towards God, its Creator. But the man diverted the existence from its structure.

Only into the woman it was preserved this structure of the creation like being an instrument at the disposition of God.

Due to this fact, it was an actual humanity, an individual one, but not into the individual.

According to John Damascene: “the humanity which the Word has taken, by embodying Himself, it is not an abstract humanity, neither is an actual humanity like that existing in all the people taken collectively, but it is an individual humanity, which it is not, though, by itself an individual, a person, not being individual and a person except into the Word and through the Word”¹⁶⁹.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If the man cannot fulfill either even more modest purposes, only through his human powers, it is even surer that the salvation cannot be obtained by the man except from God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Given the fact that the man really grows up to the rank of a subject responsible towards God and towards his fellow humans, through faith, and also the faith is the bridge which connects, in the most mysterious and intimate way, the soul of whom transmits it and of whom receives it, the prophet who produces it he presents himself like the highest one from the teachers. Different from the sight, the faith endorses the man to his fellow human. Through sight, through science, the sinful ones cannot get out from their sin, which consists of pride, of egotism, and in the isolated receiving and tasting of a spiritual good. Only the faith brings them into communion, and only the faith gets them out from the sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁶⁹ This is the summary which is made by Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, tome VII, article Hypostatique (Union), column 503, to the following text: “The nature is understood either abstract – because it doesn’t exist by itself – or common into all the hypostases of the same species, by uniting them and it is called nature considered in the species, or integrally, by adding of the accidents, like they exist into a hypostasis and it is named nature considered into the individual; it is the same with the one considered into species. God-the Word embodied, He has not taken any nature which is understood in an abstract way – because this is not an embodiment, but a deception and appearance of embodiment – and neither the one considered into the species – because He has not taken all the hypostases – but He has taken the one considered into individual, which is the same with the one considered into species – because He has taken the first fruits of our heaven”. The Dogmatic, Third Book, chapter 11, p. 172.

“The exclusion by the Christian teaching of the extreme theses – that of the identity, and that one of the absolute separation - it comes out from the man’s character as creature, and from the character of creation of the whole world. And the character as creature of those ones it is a necessary consequence of the absolute character of the supreme Being. If God is the reality Whose power cannot be surpassed by any other power, this power not narrowed by any superior power, it must be shown in the reports of God with the world too. The world cannot be to God a necessary destiny, a continuously variable train, which He must wear forever. The world cannot be an emanation or an involuntary unfolding of His Being. Because, if that had been the case, what he would have shown His sovereignty – above any necessity and law - in?” (Stăniloae 1992: 14-15)

“Rejecting the creature as symbol of God it means, in last analysis, to reject even the human image of Christ, as reflecting His godhead, or even the relation of His humanity with His godhead within Him. And the iconoclasts were consequent, by rejecting the Christ’s icon on the reason that it only represents His humanity, while the icons’ defenders, by defending the symbol, they created to themselves a wider basis for defending the Christ’s icon, as representation of God-the Man.” (Stăniloae 2005: 102)

“Though the Lord was born above nature, His nature not only that didn’t get out of its definition, but it came back – getting beautified – to its mode from the beginning, as after it was created by its Maker, getting rid of the ugliness introduced by sin and returning, to say so, to itself. Thus, the most characteristic “mode” of the created nature, it is that of being and actively transparent environment to its Maker. Practically, it is impossible to distinguish between creature and its Creator. The creature lives and it is powerful through Him. The creature shows its real beauty, its authentical beauty, in the light of God. The ugliness is an unnatural state of the creature. And the ugliness, of the crooking of the creature’s face, it comes out of the weakening of the creature’s transparence and of the work of God through creature.” (Stăniloae 2005: 176)

“The man is a unity of some multiple and various alternatives, in endless elevation of this quality. We are going to present here some of its forms:

a. The man is, by and large, a unitary person and, in the same time, an unutterable complex one. The unity of the human person and, in the same time, the complexity of the human person, are shown in the fact that a unitary self is manifested in an endless multiplicity of thoughts, of feelings, of acts, which the human person wants to reach through, at integrally accomplishing and expressing himself, but never being able to. The man tends through this to a plenitude, but he knows that isn't in his power to reach that, and that is beyond his powers. The man cannot define himself and, in the same time, he sees his insufficiency.

b. The man appears to himself, by this, as one impossible to be comprised, but, in the same time, he realizes that he is held in a frame which he cannot exit from. Both through the aspect from the paragraph "a" and from the paragraph "b", the man realizes that he participates to the infinite, but he realizes too, in the same time, that he isn't infinite. The man always lives his insufficiency, his relativity, but he does that while aspiring to infinite, which the man feels himself as tied to, and which the man communicates with, in diverse modes."

c. The man increases, through both mentioned aspects, in his self-knowledge, but also in knowing that his self is a never exhaustible mystery, but a mystery that doesn't stand by itself, but it is united with the truly infinite mystery. The more the man knows about himself, the more he knows that he is an abyss which he gets out the knowledge of other and other meanings. In experiencing the concrete but unfathomable abyss of my own self, by being in the same time marked by my insufficiency, I live my dependency on another deeper abyss, on a superior abyss, which I think about that is no longer marked by the insufficiency of my abyss. I ceaselessly tend towards that abyss, but I won't ever comprise it.

d. Related to the awareness of my own mystery I live also the partially cognoscible mystery of the world. This is for I cannot separate the experiencing my own self and experiencing the world. But I still differ from the world. In searching for the mystery, I am turning myself here towards me and there towards the world. I need the world, but I differ myself from the world too. Also, I see the mystery of the world, on one hand as cognoscible, but on the other hand I see it as non-cognoscible and inexhaustible. But I know the world's mystery as a mystery unaware of itself, and that isn't preoccupied with itself. And, by that, the world's mystery it seems to me, on the other hand, as even more insufficient in itself, but as not produced by me, and therefore as depending on a higher mystery. Still, I need the world too.

e. Albert Camus replaced the term mystery for that one of absurd. He attributed, especially to the world, the character of being absurd. More precisely, he sees the absurd in the reports between conscience and the world's irrationality. He attributed the man's conscience a certain rationality. But he saw the absurd in the fact that the rationality of the conscience doesn't see in the world the rationality which it is searching for, as neither in our life within world, a life ending in death, as everything that is more absurd. Any attempt to overcome this absurd of the report between the conscience searching for the rational and the irrational world, Camus saw it as an ‘irrational’ simplification (the suicide, the killing of another man, the illusion of the value in rationally organizing the life, or the faith in God). But we reckon that, if the man simply impeded himself with the conscience that the world is absurd, then he wouldn’t ask any question about the world’s meaning. But Camus thought that we must reconcile ourselves with the conscience lack of meaning of the world and of our lives. But we cannot do that. If we did that, it would mean no longer accepting either the rationality of our conscience, or to consider it as an illusion. But what one can reach the conclusion that the world is absurd through, if not through the fact that he looks at the world from a position of the rationality or because he sees the world as contradicting the man’s rational thirst for a meaning? We believe that out of this impasse, of out of this total contradiction, which should paralyze any human thinking, we are brought out, without being us fixed by it, in the platitude of some too easy and unilateral overlooking the existence’s problems, by considering our own selves and the world as mysteries, which unveil to us, in the same time, some meanings of the existence. Thus, the existence united within itself, as two alternatives, the mystery and the meaning.

Even in the renunciation of the ones who consider the existence as absurd, they renouncing to any attempt to say what the existence’s absurdity consist of, it is implied the recognition of the existence as mystery, which doesn’t allow us saying for sure, not even the fact that the existence is absurd. Recognizing the existence as being a mystery it is shown also in the need for always exceeding our level of knowing about existence.

Out of the existence’s character as mystery, we bring out, as we do not bring out of its character as absurd, some meanings. But these meanings do not exhaust the existence’s mystery. They are meanings to us, but there are insufficient meanings. That’s why, just in these meanings it shines the existence’s mystery. We live this mystery as a spiritual nucleus and impossible to divide in component elements, locked up inside its walls, but irradiating, through its pores, the light of some meanings and powers.

The world’s existence as mystery it allows us, for instance, to ascertain, though, that within world there are conscious persons, differing from things. And these persons are meanings, or they are at least searching for meaning and, in the same time, they are inexhaustible mystery in knowledge and in living. Living the existence as mystery, it allows us to recognize as a great value, with an inexhaustible depth of meanings, amongst others, a person’s sacrifice for another person. So, in the same time, both the persona and the sacrifice seem to us as mysteries, and not as absurd manifestations. By and large, the fact itself of being within world, of the man endowed with conscience, it hides some meanings which are, in the same time, inexhaustible mysteries, and which aren’t some opaque absurdities which no meaning spring out of. Or even the opaqueness, which some thinkers identify to the absurd, it asks the man a multitude of questions. If these questions were purposeless, of absurd, why would us continue to ask them? Or, why wouldn't us be able not to ask them? And, for we ought to ask those questions, we must deduce that our being itself and the world's existence, despite the whole opaqueness which we will attribute to, they hide within themselves some meanings requiring to be searched for and unveiled. Even the death, reckoned as absurd, it cannot be reconciled with a certain meaning but, when reckoned as mystery, it can be so, and it even asks for being its meaning searched for.

The reality's aspect as absurd, it is imposed to us, actually, when we stop at what is superficial, opaque, and purely material within world and man, when we do not see the man's spiritual dimension, and a meaning of the world answering that dimension. The man's and the world's existence seem absurd when the world and the man exist only in order the man to feed and to satisfy his body out of the world, until the man dies definitively. The absurd occurs when not recognizing a meaning, namely of a profound and inexhaustible meaning, which always incites to be searched for. The absurd is the reducing of the human existence to the satisfying of some passions of the perishable body. We can get rid of the sensation that the man's and the world's existence is absurd, only through the unavoidable conscience that this existence has a meaning within, but not a limited, as superficial meaning, not a meaning in the existence locked up in itself. When Camus saw the absurd in reducing the existence to a meaning, he thought at the limited, superficial, and opaque meaning of a material existence. Actually, reducing the existence to such a "meaning", it shows it as being absurd.

The mystery proves the spiritual, profound, indefinable, and inexhaustible character of the existence. Just endlessly searching for the mystery's existence it gives the existence a meaning. In considering the existence as absurd reality, the existence is not seen as a unity of the contraries, but it is reduced to a simplistic unit, of inferior character, in what is shown as a simplification and getting superficial of the thinking itself, until the resignation with the simplistic attitude of renouncing to any understanding of the existence, by declaring it as absurdity, which one cannot find any meaning in. We have here the ultimate conclusion which one reaches at by reducing the reality to the world of the senses, a diminution that doesn't see the all-comprising unity of the contraries, which the connection with the Absolute Person cannot miss from.

This Absolute is the unfathomable mystery. Not seeing Him, but seeing everything as absurd, it means renouncing to the effort of exercising the human dignity as thinking being, created in order to tend towards uniting with the Absolute, towards transfiguring all the existing things in the maximum living of the mystery, a mystery seen as source of infinite meanings and of powers capable of providing the man a happy, and endless life.

The thinking from the last centuries tries to see in existence only the rational, and that reduced the existence to a superficial aspect. Recently, the thinkers crossed to the opposite extreme – they see the existence only as absurd, and that too, it reduces the existence to a superficial opaqueness. Only in the constantly proven fact that in everything we know there is, on one hand, a rational meaning, and on the other hand there is a revelatory meaning as mystery, which one can never finish knowing it, it is shown the fact that the existence is an unfathomable mystery but, in the same time, it is an endless bosom of meanings.

f. The fact that the man has a unitary but complex existence, an existence advancing in the self-knowledge, but that remains, though, always a mystery, it is explained by the fact that the man has, as the highest peak of his being, the thinking and understanding mind, which always understands something, but which tries to understand even more, by advancing in the mystery of an absolute light, which end, the man cannot even reach at. But this is explained also by the fact that the man is, through his body united with his soul, also united with the whole world, and the world endlessly attracts the man in the ambience of the infinite world of the Absolute Person, or of God, Whom the man advances into, and Whose light and Mystery the man explains himself in. By this, both the man and the world, they enrich and unveil their meanings and these meanings are shown as increasingly deeper in their mystery.

g. Thus, the man is given to himself as understanding being, but he lives, also, with the need to know on himself, not as an isolated being, but in relation with the world, and with his and the world's Creator who continuously makes the light to spring out in the man's mind, in the mind's relation with the world. The man wants to know on himself and he cannot do that without knowing the world; but the man never can reach the end of this knowledge of himself and of the world. The man owes, by having on this purpose the freedom too, to know on himself and to lead the world; the man owes not only to know on himself and to know all the things which he is related to, but also to continuously consummate on himself. The preoccupation with himself and with the world it isn't, therefore, only a theoretical one. The Christendom says that the man it has been brought to existence, together with the world, out of nothing, but in order the man to make on himself further - a making united with the knowledge of the self, with the help of God and of the man's fellow humans – until reaching the level as God, not by nature but by impartation with God or by grace.

h. The man shows himself, thus, both in his thirst for knowledge and in his thirst for consummating on himself, as being thirsty for Absolute, but as never reaching the identity with the Absolute. The man is a pilgrim or a spiritual meteorite, in continuous movement between world and God, a conscious and free meteorite, always being on his way. The man is within world and he wants to be above the world; the man needs the world, but he needs the world as a road which he never remained himself definitively in a stage, but the man spiritually ascends always higher. The man must overcome the egotistic attachment to the world, not by annulling the world but by making the world transparent and by sanctifying the world, by getting rid of his passions related to the world and by using the world, as a gift, for others, and as a means of penetrating and of seeing the Absolute through the world, a means increasingly penetrated by the Holy Ghost through the man's own ghost, and this is for on the measure we increasingly remove our passions related to the world, the world becomes increasingly transparent to God.

i. In this sense, the man is given his body in his care, but he must take care not only to support his body but also to not reckon his body as the ultimate reality. The man must do everything that is more useful to his body, to prepare his body in order to be, after resurrection, fully obeying his spirit and transparent to the spirit and, through spirit, transparent to God. The spirit doesn't want to exclude the body and the world, from the unity of the alternatives which is the man's being. Only the body tends to exclude the spirit, when the body is left by itself. The man must remain to a unity of the alternatives; he must strive to stop his body and the world from their tendency to exclusively dominate him, from the tendency of annulling the man as unity of alternatives in union with the Absolute.

j. Another unity of contrasts within man, it consists of the fact that, as preoccupied is the man with his eternity, as much he must be a spiritual bread for others. The man must alternate the mediation at his own self, or the preoccupation with his own self, with the self-giving. Here isn't about a static equilibrium, which one must keep between the two preoccupations. But the man enriches on himself not only by giving spiritual bread to others, but also, with an unshaded cherishing, by receiving others as spiritual bread for him. The unity of the alternatives consists here of strengthening the component which is the man's own life by promoting the component which is the another's life, and by him being promoted by another. So, the alternatives' unity means the unity between two or amongst several. Better said, the alternatives' unity implies, as we've seen from the previous paragraphs, the relation with the Absolute, as One Who have created us to be in connection with others. The more you come closer to Absolute, the more you promote your own existence through other's existence and vice versa.

The fact of spiritually nourishing on myself by nourishing another, it is explained amongst people through their unity as being. But not only through this, but also by the fact that, through our union as persons, we maintain ourselves and we increase in the connection of our beings with the being of the Holy Trinity, and from the consummate unity of the being of the Holy Trinity it is deepened the unity of being amongst people, through the creator, upholder, and savior Word.

k. The man speaks to others in order to tell them what he thinks at, but also in order to determine them to tell him what they think at. The man speaks to other for he needs them to speak to him. The man speaks for he is a thinking being. But the man wouldn't have been able to thing if he hadn't learnt from the other's thinking; the man wouldn't have been able to think only from himself, but he is enabled to think out of the world given to him in order him to think a communion with others and, by that, learning from the One Who has given them the world as a common good. The man is a thinking, speaking being, but also together-thinking with the ones of the same being with him, and out of the power of the One in Whose image they are and through Whom the world it has been thought and created.

l. By and large, one can say that the world and the man are absurd, when they are reckoned as being the ultimate reality, in the pantheistic sense which all the philosophies conceive the world and the man in. The world and the man make sense, and they are full of inexhaustible mystery too, when they are seen as having their existence into God and as advancing in His richness of life - His richness of life being the target of the man and of the world -, when they have God as light. Otherwise, despite the whole rationality from within them, the man and the world would have been absurd – as Eugene Ionesco said, or as meaningless – as Emil Cioran said.

m. This shows that not the rationality, as consequent formal cogitation or as mode of organizing the things, it unveils the world's, and the man's light, but that is being done by the rationalities which the people use the things' rationalities through, towards the love amongst them, on the purpose of preparing themselves for the happy life in the eternal communion. And this shows that all the things have been made by a Creator Who has made all of them in a rational unity out of His love and out of His kindness, in order they to be imparted with His kindness and with His love – the people manifesting their kindness also amongst themselves. A rationality that doesn't put itself in the service of the good, it becomes absurd.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 17-26)

“The man is a rational and speaking or communicative being, and inexhaustible, and that's why thirsty for immortality and capable of immortality.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 15)

“The man never has enough of a certain communication with others, even when he perverts that communication in a bragging and in the desire of being ceaselessly praised by somebody, deceiving himself just by that with an apparent infinity of his, even if he takes as support for this communication an increasingly empty language or a language increasingly liar. The man can show his ceaseless thirst for progress in ceaselessly searching for others' shortcomings and of his pretended qualities.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 15-16)

“The man can be image of God and he is destined, through nature, to immortality, for the man has a soul differing from the body composed out of matter. The body couldn't be thirsty for the endless and always new knowledge about the infinite God, neither for the relation of immaterial love with the immaterial God - and therefore eternal -, and for the understanding with his fellow humans and for communication with them. The man gets thirsty for that for he sees in God, and also in his fellow humans, an endless spiritual depth and complexity, and he sees at his fellow human a thirst for knowledge similar to his one, united at them too, with the thirst for eternity. The man realizes that the true infinity, namely the true content of a knowledge truly new eternally, that content cannot be except a Person Who isn't submitted to the human shortcomings, and Who can give Himself as a gift, willingly, and infinitely." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16)

Icon

“In the Byzantine painting there is an icon presenting the persons who reached in Paradise as being together in the bosom of Abraham. The head of Abraham, which is represented as higher than everybody’s, and under which all the persons are gathered together, it doesn’t annul the other persons’ heads as being distinct. Abraham is head to all the ones who believe for He was the first who knew God as Person, and he believed in Him and in the promise of the future salvation in Christ. Abraham was the first to see higher and further, and who saw, even if from distance, the infinite horizons in Christ. In this sense, other people too, they can be heads for others, by their higher understanding and by their greater love for God and for people. But all such people are only types of the true Head, of the supreme Head Who is Christ. This is for Christ sees higher than anyone, He sees and He has in Himself the godlike infinity, and he leads us to the Kingdom of Heavens. “In His light we will see light” (Hebr. 2: 10).” (Stăniloae 2006: 91)

“We honor the saints and the Lord’s Mother through the icons which represent them. But because we honor them for the fact that Christ shines within them, likewise we honor the icons for they represent the saints and the Lord’s Mother in their quality as dwelling places of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 226)

“If we honor the saints’ icons for the fact that they are dwelling places of Christ, all the more we will be right to paint and to honor the icon of Christ Himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 226)

“The icon is neither idol identifying God to a created and manufactured image, nor a symbol carrying a power of God in itself, but the icon is the representation of God Who has made Himself man, and Who still hasn’t ceased to be according to His nature different from the created nature. That’s why the icon was possible only after God made Himself man and He made out of the human face the face of His uncreated Hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1997: 227)

“By the fact that God Himself has taken human face, God made Himself visible as person, making His humanity transparent to His godhead that remained different from His humanity. This gave the possibility for the saints too, who fully have Christ within them, to reflect Christ and therefore their icons to represent them as Christ bearers. Thus, all the icons are essentially reduced to the fact that the Son of God has made Himself man and He showed Himself through human face.” (Stăniloae 1997: 227)

“Only the embodiment of the Word it has made the human face to be transparent for the infinite light of God. Only His embodiment made to be shown in a seen manner, through the defined human face, the untold but real infinite of the godlike Person of the Word. The interdiction from Exodus (20: 4) and Deuteronomy, it had the role of shunning us from identifying the created things as being, as such, God, or even the human face in itself to be identified to the face of God. The told interdiction was drawing the attention upon the divine apophatic, upon the absence of God, before God-the Word has made Himself man, in any other purely human face. That interdiction shunned us in an anticipated manner, from identifying the human nature in Christ to the godlike nature, and it was showing us that the human face of Christ is the face of God-the Word through the initiative of God-the Father, and not through a nature birth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 227-228)

“Through embodiment, God Himself has made out of the human face a face of His, and he has given all the faces, entering the interior communion with His face, the possibility of nourishing out of the tree of life, which is Him (Apoc. 22: 2).” (Stăniloae 1997: 228)

“We paint the icon of Christ not only in order to remember the human face of God Who has been once on earth, but in order to make visible to us, through the mediation of the art, His face existing even now and which will always be in a connection with us, assuring us that our faces too will resurrect to an eternal communion with Him. We want to always have the icon of His face, for His face always lasts and it is in connection with us and we want that through His icon to elevate our mind and heart to His unseen but living face and for we want that, when we will meet His face in the life to come, we to be familiarized with it, or to easily recognize it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 228)

“The fact that the Son of God has made His own human face, in order to give this face the interior dimension of the infinity, in order to manifest through it His godlike transcendence, and that He has made His human face eternal, it shows that the human face, by and large, it has in itself the capacity of becoming visible image of God; this fact also shows that the Son of God is the role model of the human image, that God has an image too, a form of manifestation with the human face is created according to, a visible expression of the human spirit. Then, by keeping it eternally, He remains in connection with all the ones who believe in him, like any living face is directed towards other faces.” (Stăniloae 1997: 228)

“Of course, the human face is by itself in the cosmic process an irreducible apparition to it, something unique, unrepeatable, “an opening towards transcendence” (Olivier Clement), a continuous transcending, searching for the true transcendence. Although, the human face through itself, though transcending the cosmic process, it is closed up by death, namely through the cosmic process.” (Stăniloae 1997: 228)

“But the indefinite human face of Christ is transparent to the infinite depth of God; His face is filled up with the divine transcendence. And by not being closed up by death, His face remains eternally turned towards us. Through its relative transcendence and which is closed up by the death, one can see the absolute transcendence of God, transcendence that makes it to overcome the death and to remain open for eternity. “Meeting Christ it means meeting a face which will never be closed up” (Olivier Clement) and out of the communion with Christ’s face our face will receive too the power for resurrecting forever. Christ has restored thus, in Himself, the eternity of the human face. But this shows that Him, through embodiment, he has reestablished the human face in its full conformity with the role model, reestablishing that was possible only through the union of the role model with it, for the role model has made His own human image in Himself, and through Himself this role model is always imprinted in the ones who believe in him, namely who stay in communion with Him, filling their image up with the life which his face has been filled up with.” (Stăniloae 1997: 228-229)

“The Hypostasis of the heavenly Son, by being in the image of the Father as filial expression of the divine nature, He has made Himself also hypostasis of the human image created according to him as role model, or of the human face. He has in Himself both the human image and His godlike model, not separated, but the role model crossing through and elevating, lightening and transfiguring His human image, image having its most accentuated expression in face, and entering the eternal connection with all the faces. The Son’s Hypostasis, by assuming the human face He gives the human face the personal hypostatical characteristics, making it different from the face of any other man, but keeping the general features of the human nature.” (Stăniloae 1997: 229)

“The Christ’s human it is inscribed in a way into body and in another way into soul. As soul it is circumscribed only in the sense that it has some determined personal characteristics, differing from man to man. And the human face unites the circumscribing in both senses. As such, the human face is a paradox: a very limited material surface is transparent to a indefinitely, complex, and always in movement and rich spiritual life, thought personally differing from those of other persons.” (Stăniloae 1997: 229)

“Through the same human face of Jesus, though “circumscribed”, it irradiates not only the human soul’s life, but also the not-circumscribed godhead that limitlessly surpasses the human indefinite of the face, or the human soul’s life manifested through them; better said, the same Hypostasis manifests through the circumscribed feature of His human face the not-circumscribed infinity of His godhead.” (Stăniloae 1997: 230)

“God Who irradiates through the assumed humanity he is the Person of the Word, differing from the Person of the Father and from the Person of the Holy Ghost. Even through this he gives the assumed human nature personal traits and He doesn’t take it in its generality, which neither can exist in. For the people are in the image of the Son of God, they generally have His image of son. And so, he has it too as man. According to this unique particularity, as unitary and unique Hypostasis, Christ is painted in icon. And as the representation of the simple man, it suggests through the material face circumscribed which the painter paints, the indefinitely complex life of the soul, so that it presents the persons which that life belongs to, likewise the Savior’s icon suggests through the image painted by the painter, not only His indefinite human soul’s life, but also His consummately not-circumscribed godhead, for it presents His unique Person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 230)

“The painter suggests the Christ’s consummately not-circumscribed godhead not through his own talent, but through the fact that he presents Jesus with the unique signs of His acts: born in manger, with the star above, and with the angels around, with His Mother and with Josef watching over Him, crucified on the cross between two thieves, breaking open the locks of the hell and resurrecting, working some wonders known from Gospels etc. In these facts it is presented the Person of the Son of God Who has embodied Himself and Who has saved us through His crucifixion and resurrection, but there are expressed also imperishable love and power like no man have of has, namely the not-circumscribing of His love and power in precise deeds, which characterize only Him, in a visible manner, and which therefore circumscribe Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 230)

“Paul Evdokimov and Olivier Clement insisted upon the fact that God, and therefore God-the Word too, He isn’t without a form. Against the poverty of content of the excessive spiritualism one must affirm that in God the absence of the image it would be a lack of plenitude. God is the Form of the forms, the Icon of the icons, the all-comprising Archetype. The apophatic isn’t a pure negation; it wants to say that God is a Meta-Icon, according to the terminology of Dionysus: “a Hyper-Icon”. Dionysus the Areopagite doesn't say only that God is above all affirmations, but also that God is above all negations." (Stăniloae 1997: 230)

"The divine existence isn't only the source of all the words, but it is also the source of all images. As such, the divine existence isn't only the supreme Word, but it is also the supreme Image, and beyond image. Only the one who subsists is able to talk. In the Old Testament God often speaks out of clouds, out of fire (Exod. 2: 2, 5: 24-25; Deut. 4: 12), or He shows Himself while speaking (Isa. 6: 4; Ezek. 1: 26). Even when in the soul's hearing of the prophet it resounds the word without the prophet seeing the subsistence of God – namely His image – the presence of the subsistence of God is being felt as voluntary point where the word has come from. God is spiritually felt, as speaking, by the fact that the man feels the impulse to answer with a precise word, or with a precise deed, on each occasion." (Stăniloae 1997: 231)

"Itself the subsistence of God, felt as departure point of the word heard spiritually, it is an invisible Image, a real deep of the entire subsistence which takes forms, which receives an order from the deeps which is full of the virtuality of all the forms, out of the virtual bosom of all the images." (Stăniloae 1997: 231-232)

"In the Old Testament, despite thoroughly trying not to express God through images, the prophets sometimes see God in a form or another. Moses sees "the place where the God of Israel stood and the things from under His feet, as a brick of sapphire and as the image of the clear sky" (Exod. 24: 10), meaning that a form of God had given a form to the place where He stood. Moses also sees "the image of the Lord's glory, as a fire burning on the mountain top" (Exod. 24: 18), namely Moses sees a form emanating out of God." (Stăniloae 1997: 232)

"God shows Himself to the prophet from after Moses in a more determined Form. Isaiah sees God sitting on a very high chair, surrounded with glory and Seraphs (Isa. 6: 1-3). Ezekiel sees God as a human image (Ezek. 1: 26); Daniel, likewise (Dan. 7: 9, 13: 10: 5-6). These were the anticipations of the Son of Man seen in Apocalypse, this time founded on His showing as man in history." (Stăniloae 1997: 232)

"The most adequate, the most expressive, the most communicative of meanings image, of the supreme Image, it is the man or the human face. This is for through the human face it can be manifested the supreme spirituality, or the form of the supreme spirituality. Only through the man's personal face, which expresses the personal self-awareness, and the awareness on all things, the openness and the love for everybody and everything, the possibility of expressing the will and the self-affirming, it can be expressed in the most adequate mode the divine personal spirituality. Only the man knows God, especially within himself, and he can rejoice for his salvation while being aware of the communication with God. That's why the man's face, as the most adequate image of God, it is impropriated by God-the Word, in order Him to enter the communion with the people, in order Him to communicate Himself to them as God, in order Him to communicate the people the interior living of God by the human." (Stăniloae 1997: 232)

"The human face made eternal and elevated to the maximum transparency, to the maximum expression of the self-awareness and of awareness of everything, to the maximum expression of the love, of the interior living of God, in Christ's face, the spirituality of the Son of God, or the form of this spirituality and its communicability, they have found their most adequate expression, elevating it in the same time to the highest conformation with its Role-Model. The Son of God has taken the man's face for the man's face is face of communion; for through the man's face it is expressed the spirituality lived inward in order to be communicated to others too. And thus, through the man's face Christ entered the maximum communion with all the people and He eternally remains in this communion, and he reestablished at maximum the communion amongst people." (Stăniloae 1997: 232)

"The believers want not only to have the word of Christ until the end of time, a word inexhaustible in love, but also His human face and, through it, the loving face of His godlike spirituality, the irradiating face of maximum and interminable communion between God and the believers. Out of this face of interminable love it starts His word of inexhaustible love too, who's meaning never comes to an end. This is for the believers want not only to theoretically know that the word preached to them it is the word of Christ, but they want to relate it in a real manner to the face of Christ, as departure point of that word. This face is otherwise itself an inexhaustible plenitude of words, as the face of the endless love wanting to express itself. That's why too, the Christ's face represented in icons it speaks about Him, It expresses Him, and it is an endless word of Him. It was said that the icons are a Bible of the ones who cannot read, or of the ones who do not have the time for reading." (Stăniloae 1997: 232-233)

"By the fact that Christ's face is shown in the Orthodox icon while strictly observing the iconographic canon of the oldest tradition, one can say that it has defended the Orthodox believers like it didn't defend others the assiduous reading of the Scripture, against understanding Christ arbitrarily. Through the Orthodox icon ceaselessly and strictly remained on the line of the traditional canon, from the beginning of the Christendom, the Orthodox believers have remained not only unitarily understanding Christ, but also to understanding Him like in the times close to the Apostles, and in the places of the region where The Lord live and worked. And Christ shown in this icon is a profoundly spiritual Christ. The Orthodox icon has been thus, together with the spiritual-patristic and spiritual-ascetic literature, the most important guide of the most zealous believers in their forming on the line of a spiritual life of living together with Christ and with the Holy Ghost. The most formed themselves, in this sense, the saints, in whose icons it is presented the same mode of spiritual living, which they strived to follow Christ through. In these icons is affirmed also a sense of the salvation differing from the one of the external justifications, through the satisfying sacrifice or through the expiation sacrifice of Christ. Through those icons it is shown the deification which the ones who believe in Christ are elevated to, deification which opens the horizon of the future age.” (Stăniloae 1997: 233)

“The Byzantine style of the icons it affirms until today the actual Christian spirituality, and those days this style starts to be cherished everywhere, not because of being the style of the Byzantine époque, but for it is the style of the authentic transfiguration and spiritual thinness of the man in God, outside which there cannot be an authentic Christian spirituality. This is, in case of Christ, besides the unique personal aspect which Christ is presented in icons in, the sole “objective” mode which the non-circumscribing of Christ’s godhead is suggested in, excepting the cases which a painter fuller of Holy Ghost succeeds in suggesting through his talent something of this non-circumscription.” (Stăniloae 1997: 233)

“The believers know that the icon speaks to them and it guides them on the line of the life of Christ as role-model, not only as a teaching about the authentic Christ; they are also convinced that through icons they enter the real contact with Christ, and thus they relate the words they are told about Christ in Church, to Christ Himself Who is alive and present within Church, in any place where they turn their sight towards the icon of Christ and they worship Him with faith.” (Stăniloae 1997: 233)

“The key problem for theologically explaining the icons’ role in Orthodoxy is: what real and present connection is between the living Person of Christ and His icon, and how this connection is established?” (Stăniloae 1997: 234)

“The definition given by the Seventh Ecumenical Synod affirms that the worshipping granted to the icon it “crosses”, it “goes up” from icon to the represented person, to the prototype. This expression is usually interpreted as a willing moving of the mind from icon to prototype, as from a thing to a totally separated reality. But this “crossing” has a deeper meaning. The one who believes in Christ he is unable not to do the crossing from His icon, of from the saints’ icons, to His or to their living reality. In this mind’s necessity of crossing from the icon to the living reality of the icon’s prototype it is also implied a work of Christ upon the one who looks with faith at His icon, or at the saints’. Like the word about Christ determined within the one who hears it the need for thinking at Christ, this materialized word which is the icon, it determines in the one who looks at it the need for thinking at Christ, like on a more general plan any word of somebody about something it causes in the one who hears it the need for answer, adopting an attitude towards what is said to him and towards the one saying it. Here is hidden an ontological connection between image and the reality expressed in it, like between a word and what is said through that word, or the person saying that word, or between that person and the one hearing what is being said. This connection, for there is in the first place an ontological connection between reality and its image or its word, or about the reality for there is no reality not having in it implied its image or the word about it, if it is a conscious reality. So, the conscious respective reality is impossible not to be interested in the effect produced by its image, or by its word, within the one touched by them, by the fact that they are addressed to him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 234)

“If the luminous shadow is connected to the body itself through some material rays starting from that body, then somebody’s image is connected to his reality through the spiritual rays which somebody necessarily projects his image through, as least in others’ souls.” (Stăniloae 1997: 234-235)

“When one looks at the icon, the faithful soul speaks to Christ and he worships Him, though Christ isn’t one with His icon – like the mother watching the picture of her son speaks to him, though she doesn’t confound her son to his picture. The icon and the prototype are comprised with the mind simultaneously, but without being confounded; better said, the icon is forgotten while living the direct relation with the prototype.” (Stăniloae 1997: 235)

“The connection between Christ and His icon is more clearly explained by the prayer for sanctifying the icon of Christ, from the Euchologion of the Orthodox Church. In this prayer it is mentioned about the touching of the face of Christ with the scarf sent by Him to Avgar from Edessa, which He has left imprinted His face on, through His power, and that’s why His power through that scarf it healed, the one whom He sent it. This is for, according to the things we said previously, somebody’s word or image and his subject are connected through an irradiation of power. Then, we ask in that prayer: “O, You Good Master, look with mercy at us and at this icon... and send upon it Your heavenly blessing and the gift of the All-Holy Ghost and bless it and sanctify it and give it healing power and power of banishing all the devilish craftsmanship: fill it up with the blessing and the strength of the Holy not-made-by-human-hand-image, which from the touching of the all-holy and all-clean face of Your beloved Son it has gained plentifully, as through it the powers and the wonders for strengthening the right-faith and the salvation of Your faithful people to be worked from.” (Stăniloae 1997: 235-236)

“It is asked for the present icon to be imparted with the non-made by hand power, given to the icon by touching the Christ’s face; So that the power of that icon to be prolonged to this icon too. Then the prayer ends with the affirmation that before the icon is worshipped God in Trinity: “For to You, the Almighty, and to Your One Begotten Son and to Your Holy Ghost, kneeling before this icon and faithfully calling on You and by praying us thoroughly, to be us heard and the mercy of Your love for people to find and also to gain”. The Holy Trinity called upon in prayer, by descending before the icon, it elevates the one whom the looking at the icon causes him to call on God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 236)

“The saints too are in a connection with their icons, by the special fact that they are full of Christ, and the energies of the holy Ghost which they are full of are projected through this out of them upon their icons too. Through icons we ascend to honoring the saints in whom we see the result of the Christ’s work and His present work.” (Stăniloae 1997: 236)

“Amongst the problems arisen by image as means of the Revelation, two are the problems which we are interested in: the kinds of the images which God reveals Himself through; and the mode which the images are born in the mind of the organ of the Revelation, under the divine influence, namely their objective-subjective character, unlike in the case of a myth which is a product of the imagination and which fills up an objective void. This shows us that the images are the unavoidable mode of Gods’ unveiling towards the human spirit.” (Stăniloae 2005: 23)

“We reckon that the revealed images are unavoidably produced on the meeting point between spirit and the seen shape; the image isn’t else but the way of spirit’s apparition through a seen shape. Being himself an embodied spirit, the man cannot notice and express the spirit in his purity, but only through the screen of a seen shape. The human spirit himself is grown together with such a screen, and he is in an indissoluble bond with the whole world of visible shapes, which he knows and expresses his knowledge and his reflection through. The man cannot notice and express the spiritual reality – though he is an embodied spirit – in itself. The material reality, which doesn’t irradiates a spiritual reality through, it isn’t presented in images, but directly, scientifically. Only when taken as support for expressing a spiritual reality, a seen shape receives its function as image.” (Stăniloae 2005: 24-25)

“The divine reality, as spiritual reality by excellence, it has the quality as not being possible to notice it or to express it in itself. This is especially because any access of the man to it, or any reaching of the man at it, it is a touching by the man who notices and expresses his spirit and any spiritual reality in shapes borrowed from the material, visible world. Only a totally apophatic theology (of the silence, of denying any enunciation regarding God) it is free of images.” (Stăniloae 2005: 25)

“Let’s see the kinds of images of the Revelation. On the plan of the Revelation there are several categories of images. Some images of purely ontological, namely definitive unities, constituted through the real and definitive dwelling of the divine spirit in a seen shape. This is something analogue to the human face or to the human body, which are images of the spirit definitively united with them. These ones are the results of the acts on some moments of the Revelation. In this sense, the most real, the most vivid, and the most ontological image of the Godhead it was the Christ’s humanity, and image achieved through the act of the embodiment. And the icon, so highly honored in Orthodoxy, it means expressing - through the art’s means - this image of God assumed by the Son of God. Christ as Man is His human image as God, He being in the same time God Himself. The embodiment isn’t a myth, it isn’t a human subjective imagining, but it has achieved a real and definitive union of the divine spirituality with the human visible reality. We do not have in Christ the unveiled divine reality and that’s why we cannot comprise and express the divine reality in its plenitude of infinite complexity and richness. But the living image which is His humanity it doesn’t completely cover, either, the divine reality, but it reveals the divine reality on the measure which the human possibility can comprise it.” (Stăniloae 2005: 25)

“In state or resurrection Christ as man is, also, a human image of the divine life unsubmitted to the death, an image which the Godhead is even more transparent in. The resurrected Christ doesn’t forsake even now His character as image of God, for if that had been the case, he would have forsaken the humanity itself. And the Apostles were shown this human image of the divine life unsubmitted to the death.” (Stăniloae 2005: 25)

“The Christ’s ascent to heavens it is an image of the ascent of the human resurrected in Christ, on the level of the divine glory. What this divine glory is in itself it cannot be comprised or expressed by the man. The Apostles saw it in the image of the ascending Lord’s body and in the snow-white brightness of the Lord’s body of Mount Tabor. All of these are divine-human realities, spiritual level of the human towards the divine, not in myths, namely not in subjective and without content imaginings.

The divine-human realities express realities above our understanding, and that's why we must avoid understanding them in a narrow manner, or to reduce them to the level of some objects, to that much as it is visible of them. They have spiritual abyssal depths, but these depths are correctly, though very summarily, expressed by the terms: embodiment, resurrection, ascent to heavens etc." (Stăniloae 2005: 26)

"Before Christ, in the Old Testament, God didn't dwell in this full degree in a created, human form. God appeared in a seen form, in the Old Testament, only passingly and through one or another of His energies. Those were a different kind of images of the divine Revelation. So were the cloud, or the pillar of fire, leading the Israelites through desert (Exod. XIII: 21-22), the fire that consumed the Elijah's offering, or the breeze of wind shown also to him (II Samuel XIX: 12). Some of these presences of God are more steadfast, but these ones two are only presences through energy, from distance, and not embodiment as Person, which to make possible a continuous manifestation of God, through unequivocal acts as Person. So was the presence in the Law's Ark, in the Book placed in it, and by and large in the Law's tent, seen by Moses on Mount Sinai. So were some images having a more reduced divine presence in them, having the character as images rather by the fact that they were the product of some divine acts and they were the materialization of some means for satisfying the spiritual needs, or the signs of the divine benevolence, as there were the stone, or the manna etc." (Stăniloae 2005: 26)

"Saint Gregory of Nyssa said somewhere that the angels do not need imagination for the divine reality seen by them it is above any imagination. Maybe that's why the spiritual Fathers (for instance Diadochus of Photice) warn against any images, imaginings, visions, for in Christ the Christians have more than any imagination. The spiritual Fathers warn us even against the images of the visions having Christ as object, for through faith and living we know about the theandric deeps of Christ more than we could be helped the images and the visions about Him." (Stăniloae 2005: 28-29)

"Farrer speaks about some sort of "rebirth of the images" through Christ, and he gives as illustration for that the speech and the writing of the Apostles. Limiting this to Apostles, Farrer is right. What exceeds this, we reckon that this rebirth can be understood only in some senses. One is that Christ becomes the true image of God, and another is that Christ is the center of all verbal images. We will see further other senses too. By no means after Christ and after Apostles there would have been promoted a work of the imagination in the sense of visions and imaginings about Christ, or independent of Christ." (Stăniloae 2005: 29)

“Christ has brought a “rebirth of the images”, firstly for He has given a real character to the image of God, and secondly, for all our words about God have nothing else to do except describing Christ, for He is the true image of God. The word remains, as in the whole history of the Revelation, for the Revelation in Christ too, indispensable, and the word’s main function is to describe the human image with its diverse acts, which God has Revealed Himself through, in Christ. Without this image and without its diverse acts, the word would be incapable of describing the whole richness and power of the divinity Who reveals Himself. But also vice versa, the acts, the images, and the visions of the Revelation in Christ, they would remain often unnoticed, and not-understood, without words. By and large, the words, by expressing divine acts and presences manifested in images and visions, they wear in themselves the imprint of the imaginative expression, always being less than the acts and the images comprise. The word “God is strong” it is an imaginative expression, for an act of His powerful work it has been experienced. Of course, the religious thinking sometimes detached the imaginative word from the image or from the vision itself, and maybe God unveiled Himself sometimes by describing Himself only in such imaginative words. Anyway, there is hard to find a word about God which to not have an imaginative character, which to not start from a sensitive form.” (Stăniloae 2005: 29)

“The icons and the Holy Mysteries are continuously keeping present and working in the conscience and in the life of the believers, the real ontological image of God, image that is Christ, or, more precisely, the humanity of Christ. They are modes of continuous efficacy of the central and definitive image of the culminant Revelation in the human life.

The word of the preaching must stay in tight connection with them, as it stood also in the time when God revealed Himself through that image, or through its moments, acts, and stages.” (Stăniloae 2005: 30-31)

“We do not occupy ourselves, here, with the fundamental and objective image of the divine Revelation, namely with the Person and the acts of Christ, which has been constituted outside the human subjectivity, through the objective work of God; neither with the passing images produced by the manifestation of God through some exterior, visible forms, as in the Old Testament, which also were done outside the human subjectivity. The human subjectivity had no creator contribution regarding those images, but it only noticed through the divine work in the human subjectivity the divine presence in those external, objective images. In this knowledge of the divine presence in those images, objectively made, it consists of, in those cases, the inspiration of the human organs, which recognize for the first time the divine presence in those images, or the faith of the ones impropriating this knowledge from the inspired organs.” (Stăniloae 2005: 31)

“The objective fund of these two types of images it is provided, in a certain sense, by recognizing their exteriority, not only by an organ of the Revelation, but by several of them, or even by all the ones admitting their primordial witness. On the role of the subjectivity in recognizing the objective reality of these images we are going to say some things after treating a previous question. This matter is formulated in two questions: a) What is subjective and what is objective in these two kinds of images taking entirely place in the interior of the human subjectivity? b) What one can achieve like, the surety of the objective fund present in these images?” (Stăniloae 2005: 31)

“By the fact that the Christendom is the religion of revealing God in the human “substantial mode”, by the fact that all the revealed images are born out of the touching of the human embodied spirit by the divine spirit, it is shown that in Christendom, the man has been elevated on the highest level of noticing God, on the level of noticing God as reality differing from object, as spiritual reality, but a reality that cannot be revealed and noticed except through the mediation of the sensitive images. This is for the man is on one hand, as spirit, superior to objects, but on the other hand, as embodied spirit, the man is a substantial image and the whole his spiritual life is bond to images. The images have the form needed for manifesting the human spirit, and the human spirit is in the image of God. The man cannot notice God except through images, through symbols. The human images are the highest form of noticing the divine spirit, for, as images which the human spirit is expressed in, they are in the same time symbols of the divine spirit, according to whose model is the human spirit.” (Stăniloae 2005: 41)

“On one hand, the man cannot avoid the images in his thinking referring to God, and on the other hand it depends on his spiritual level that these images to be myths to him, non-conform to God, or symbols of God Who is above the objects’ world.

The unavoidability of the biblical images has been highlighted by the Reformed dogmatist Emil Brunner, like this:

“For cogitation, which tries to achieve some truths out of thinking at himself and at the world which it lives in, and therefore it rejects to be bon to something historical – the Revelation, the history of the salvation – even the idea of a God Who is Person, namely of a divine You Who speaks to us, it is mythical. This cogitation is faced by the faith that knows itself as tied to this historical event, for in this event the faith knows the Revelation and the self-communication of God. What hits is given what we want to call as “fundamental myths”, which are identical in their content to the content of the preaching.” (Stăniloae 2005: 41-42)

“The Christian Revelation, as encounter between God and man, achieved through means resulted out of this encounter, it aims to grow the man up out of the ambience and in the ambience of the source that is God, Who, since He is free and unconditioned, He must be Person too. The experience of this bond and of this communion of the man with the Source and of his growing out of that Source, it is unavoidably expressed in images, but these images express in the most adequate possible mode, for our bodily condition, a true reality.” (Stăniloae 2005: 43)

“The Sunday which it was committed the solemn act of honoring the Holy Icons on, the first Sunday of the Easter Lent, it is called the Orthodoxy’s Sunday.” (Stăniloae 2005: 49)

“We do not know how was the Son of God before His embodiment, neither how the Father and the Holy Ghost are. In other words, we do not know how the Godhead is in Himself, but we know that the Son’s Godhead after His embodiment is no longer a reality separated from the human body and face. We do not know how is the Godhead in Himself but we know now that the Son’s Godhead was shown to the people and they were shown the Son’s Godhead through the real countenance of man and only through that.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“When the pagans imagined the deities as human beings, they were in a double error: the deities didn’t exist, and if they had existed, the pagans wouldn’t have been able to induce the history of a real embodiment of a deity. Jesus Christ lived on a precise moment of the history, but as embodied God, a man that proved to be, in the same time, God. The historicity of Jesus Christ, as the embodied Son of God, it differs the faith in Him from any other myth, a myth being only a poetical materialization of some ideas, of a constant process belonging to the nature. The embodiment of God as historical fact confessed with assertiveness and even paying with the life for that. The Christians, when looking with the eyes of their faith at the Son of God, as manifesting through human face, they are in the fullest conformity with the divine truth and with the history.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The problem of the icon in Christendom it can be expressed by the question: may be Jesus Christ, God-the man, expressed in painted image? In other words, might a painter contemporary to Jesus, of even a photographer, if this art had existent back then, capture Him in image?” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The iconoclasts affirmed that only the humanity of Christ could have been seen, and not also His Godhead, and the image of Christ’s humanity cannot be identified to the image of Christ Himself, for in such a case we would have melted His humanity with His Godhead (and this means Monophysite heresy), or we could have considered Jesus as man, as separated from Jesus as God (and this means Nestorian heresy). The iconoclasts were wrong. Christ's humanity cannot either be separated from His Godhead, or merged to His Godhead. His humanity necessarily and non-separately comprises the Godhead." (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

"Could the people living around Christ to see on His face, in His sight, that He was more than a man, that He was God-man?

The answer cannot be except affirmative, for otherwise were could they have taken the certitude that Jesus was God and the power of receiving even death for this certitude of theirs? They saw something in Jesus, something that exceeded everything that was human. It is true that not anybody who passed by Him saw His Godhead in his human countenance. In order to see that it was necessary the faith too. But anybody could receive the faith if they wouldn't be stubborn in closing their eyes and in denying the suprahuman element which was emanating, which was assaulting him out of the Jesus's Person. But no matter what the faith would have been produced like, it is a fact that those having the faith, when looking at Jesus, they were saying, through all His human manifestations, the Godhead. If somebody asked: what it is possible like, to be seen the Godhead through body? we would ask him: What it is possible like, to see through the material body, the spiritual reality of the soul?" (Stăniloae 2005: 52-53)

"If the man's soul shapes the matter in order to form to himself a body which to be able to manifest the godlike spirit through, according to Whom is created the spirit, being able to manifest so adequately through the soul, the godlike spirit can also manifest through the human body which shows the soul. The organs and the traits of the human body are indirectly shaped by adequate means of manifestation of the Godhead. The Godhead isn't totally inaccessible. What God would look then like a man for, and what He would have embodied Himself for? Thus, nothing opposed the Apostles to see the Godhead of Jesus Christ. But if the Apostles were seeing the Godhead of Jesus through His human face, of course that if had been presented to them, after Christ's death, or while the Apostles weren't with Him, a portrait of Christ, that portrait would have suggested Him the whole divine-human Person of Jesus. This is for the mystery of each portrait consists of the power of a few lines of suggesting the living reality of the original. The ones who stood around Jesus of course they experienced His Godhead out of His word, and when they would have seen the portrait there would have missed an important means, namely His word, which they would have realized the Godhead of the portrait's subject. But the portrait of a known person it has the power of suggesting even what a person cannot manifest in the moment of looking at his portrait. The way of speaking, the brightness of his eyes, they awake in the looker the memory of the moments which these manifestations were accompanied on, by the sound of the speech.” (Stăniloae 2005: 54)

“The power of a known person’s portrait it consists of the fact that it stimulates the looker memory and that adds to the portrait’s motionless lines all the elements of the original’s life. A mother looking at the portrait of her far away son, she starts actually speaking to him. The eyes of that portrait start moving, the mouth starts speaking, the whole image gets animated. The mother forgets about being in front of a portrait. Through the collaboration between the portrait and the memory of the sight, there appears in the front of her conscience her son in the whole reality’s vivacity.” (Stăniloae 2005: 54)

“Even if there hadn’t remained after Jesus’s ascent a portrait of Him, the Apostles surely tried to describe Him to the believers, who were craving to know as much as possible out Jesus and His countenance Whose characteristic traits have remained as a steadfast asset transmitted, on one hand, through the oral tradition, and on the other hand through very early attempts of describing Him in pictures.” (Stăniloae 2005: 55)

“We aren’t wrong affirming that the present image of Jesus from the Orthodox Church, which avoids the renewals, it presents elements characteristic to His face, which have been preserved through tradition since the Apostles’ time. It is a fact, the scrupulousness which the books of Church painting describe with, the details one must take in account while painting the face of Jesus, but presenting the Jesus’s divinity flowing out from within His image it is an extremely hard thing to achieve. Only a great talent and a deep life of religious purity can bring here a serious contribution. Not always the ones who painted or who are painting the image of Christ are endowed with a great talent and are found worthy to receive a supra-natural inspiration, especially because, on the measure the Church has been extending, the piety of the Christians has been imposing an increasingly numerous multiplications of His image. Out of this motif, and maybe due to other motifs too, it is probably that after the first Christian centuries, after it has vainly tried to temper the pious zeal of the uninspired multiplication of the image of Jesus, the Church started to impose the traditional elements of this image not only as a frame which the painter must fill it up with the internal force of the divinity, but almost as the sole traits which the painter must paint when trying to suggest the image of Jesus. The Church considered that, if the painter cannot paint more in the adequate direction of Jesus’s countenance, he better not to paint more either in the direction incompatible with His image. Thus, it has been imposed the schematic image of the Jesus’s image and of all the saints. In some icons this schematism is brought so far than we almost do not have except the lines of the human image without any internal life, like there are, for instance, the old icons painted on glass from the Romanian peasants' houses." (Stăniloae 2005: 55-56)

"This schematization is justified also by other reasons than the motioned necessity. Jesus. Though He was man, He wasn't' like any other man, namely he wasn't' like the other men who are only men. His humanity was sinless and it was worn by the godlike hypostasis. So, the Jesus's face won't present a natural humanity, as we can find at the concrete people. His face must express in icons only the general, the abstract traits of the humanity, letting aside everything we can encounter in the known faces of the natural people. There will be drawn only the foundation lines, only the formal frame of the humanity. In this way, the painter will avoid affecting with some sinful element the countenance of Jesus, and the flight of the believer soul towards the heavenly Jesus Christ won't be impeded by the likeness of the image on that icon to some concrete man. The portrait which only that much is presented in, out of the humanity of Jesus, it surely will be in truth, in the general conformity with His countenance, though won't be in the whole truth." (Stăniloae 2005: 56)

"We must specify here also that through these traits of general humanity of Jesus's image, there isn't accomplished only a reduction of the natural and sinful element of the humanity, but it is achieved also a positive expression of the virtues which constitute the true humanity, the humanity elevated again to its normal structure, through the divine presence. The schematic image of Jesus is the concretization of the ethical virtues in the degree which they aren't being generated in, by any man's natural countenance. The seriousness of His face, the purity of His sight, the calm manhood, the ascetic character of His traits, they express the combination of all the virtues which the man must tend towards, and they exteriorize the model man in the Christian meaning. If the historical humanity of Jesus is the sinless humanity and the concretization of all the virtues in the supreme degree, His image, as presented in the Byzantine iconography, it will present everything that can be closer to His real image from history and from heavens; in any case, this is a frame that can animate in the most adequate manner the living reality of Jesus." (Stăniloae 2005: 56-57)

"The Godhead as model of the human spirit must be in the direction of the supreme efforts of the man's spiritual elevation. The man is on the peaks of his possibilities in his ethical accomplishment, in this elevation towards the virtues which he has overcome his egotism through, and which he has intensified to the ultimate degree through, his responsibility for others. These are the states and the tensions which the man resembles more to God through. Their manifestation is also the maximum manifestation of the presence of God, due also to the fact that on these ethical heights the man cannot reach without the help from God and without the presence of God.

Thus, the traits which the face of Jesus is expressed with, as combination and concretization – which cannot be found at the natural people – of the human virtues, of the supreme peaks of the humanity which cannot be reached only through man, and these traits express in the same time a presence above nature out of His being, a divine presence.” (Stăniloae 2005: 57)

“Through the schematic traits of Jesus used in icons it is aimed not the simple general humanity unaffected by sin, but it is aimed the general humanity of the supreme ethical values, which no natural man has been elevated to, but only Jesus Christ reached them, due to His Godhead.” (Stăniloae 2005: 57)

“We say the same thing about the image of the Virgin Mary as presented in the Orthodox icons. She is not a copy of the countenance of a woman encountered in the natural and concrete world, but Her image expresses the supreme ethical values of the general femininity: The unaffected by sin maternity, namely the attributes of Mother and Virgin in the same time, as we cannot find at any other woman. Of course, the traits of the Birth Giver of God, they must be warmer as those of Jesus Christ too, for the maternity is affection, and the purity is beauty, while the ascetic traits cannot express such states. Just this makes us grant the whole our admiration to the Orthodox style of the icons of the Lord’s Mother, which, having to present such feminine and material features, full of life and of warmth, it still hasn’t fall in the naturalism of the western iconography and therefore it hasn’t confounded the image of the Lord’s Mother to the image of some woman, but it has preserved Her singular and as adequate as possible to Her real one, image.” (Stăniloae 2005: 57-58)

“Jesus Christ has brought to the supreme degree, the value of the man consisting of the humanity’s ethical character, by accomplishing the people’s salvation through the sacrifice of His life. When giving to Christ the attribute as Savior, we recognize that he has achieved the supreme ethical performance, the supreme unfolding of the real man’s virtues, as the Jesus’s character as Savior it is expressed in Icon by his countenance as crucified, or in other moments reminding us about His crucifixion, as there is His resurrection, His ascent to heavens etc. But while the schematic character traits, of Jesus’s icon, aiming as main target defending Him against the natural man’s sin and expressing the ethical virtues, it suggests in the same time, secondarily and implicitly the presence of the divinity in Him, through the fact of the crucifixion, of the resurrection, of the ascent to heavens, the main accent is put on the Godhead from within Him, and only in subsidiary it is added a new highlighting of the ethical consummation of Jesus.” (Stăniloae 2005: 58)

“If in the schematization with ethical negative and positive purpose, the Church has found an unparalleled means which to be expressed through, as as possible as non-erroneous image of Christ, representing Him either in the moments of His supra-human acts, or surrounded by the supra-natural symbols, as there is, for instance, the aura around His head, or the angels next to Him, the Church reckoned it as the most appropriate mode of positively suggesting His Godhead, which is the hardest to be expressed as phycological spiritual force.” (Stăniloae 2005: 58)

“This image of Christ, being formed on the information provided by the tradition, by the main data of the Gospels, and by the impression which Jesus created upon some people contemporary to Him, it has the gift of not sinning against His real face from history and from heavens, and it doesn’t deviate the attention of the believer who looks at it, towards known faces of people, but, on the opposite, it forms an appropriate frame, though a minimalistic frame, of the real and living face of Jesus which this fame – through the contribution of the believer’s faith – it can be filled up with and it can be animated by.” (Stăniloae 2005: 58)

“The portrait of a known person gets animated in front of us also through the contribution brought by our memory. But almost always gets animated in front of us also the portrait of an unknown person, the memory’s role being take now by our imagination as stimulated and directed by the expressive traits of that portrait. But the imagination has a true power on when having at its basis the news or the conviction about the reality of the person we see in that portrait.” (Stăniloae 2005: 58-59)

“In front of the Jesus’s icon, the believer brings, instead of memory, his conviction on the Jesus’s existence on the basis of the memory of the people who knew Jesus, and this is a mediated memory equal to having faith in Him. Crossed through by the faith in the Jesus’s reality, and full with the rich information about Him which the believer has it from Gospels and from the Church’s preaching, and also by being driven by an endless love for Christ and by trust in His help, the believer places what he knows about Jesus in the frame offered by icon and he animates Jesus from icon with his love, so that he is, towards the icon of Jesus, as those people from old who knew Jesus, and now, at his turn, he waits for Jesus with loving impatience.” (Stăniloae 2005: 59)

“Out of the scheme offered by icon as a frame sufficiently adequate to the Jesus’s face, and out of what the believers brings in his soul as fruit of the Gospel and of the Church’s preaching, which are combined with the frame offered by icon, it springs out the living image of Jesus, increased in likeness to His real face.” (Stăniloae 2005: 59)

“For the sufficient conformity of the frame offered by icon to the real face of the Savior, it pleads also the fact that, no matter how much would vary in the Orthodox environment the icons of Jesus, there still is a great resemblance amongst them, so that even if nothing was written on one or on another, anybody would realize that that icon represents Jesus.” (Stăniloae 2005: 59)

“Whet the connection is, between the Jesus’s icon and His real person, and what nature the honoring of the icon is of? The Seventh Ecumenical Synod formulated that “the honoring of the icon crosses to the original and the one who worships the icon he worships the person of the painted one” According to this formulation, the real face of Jesus would be beyond icon, in heavens. “The icon is an object occasioning us the memory”, said Saint John Damascene, namely the icon drives our mind towards the real Person of Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 59)

“We though believe that the believer looking at the icon he shouldn’t want to look at that icon only for a moment, and then his mind should get far from that icon, by being elevated to an independent spiritual sight of Jesus. God isn’t spatially far from us, but spiritually. In the moments of the faith’s intensity, He shows Himself to us in the place where we are. The situation of the believer in the front of the icon it is like the situation of a mother to whom not the picture is the reality of her son, but who still shouldn’t take her eyes away from that picture in order to see with her memory the living image of her son, but the picture’s traits themselves they start becoming animated. We cannot fully decipher the mystery of the icon. The icon isn’t the same with the living presence of the original, but in the same time it isn’t to us so indifferent as any other object. There is a general feeling within Church and amongst the believer people, that where the image of God is there, you no longer are allowed to behave as everywhere else. The image of God, as also when His name is uttered, it banishes away, from around, the unclean ghosts. This fact is partially explained also by the state of psychological order generated by the hearing of the divine name of seeing the image of God, but it isn’t less true that there must be also an objective force in His name and in His image, a force able to create such psychological states. God accompanies - in an impossible to understand way - His name and His image. If God is living reality, living Person, He watches with interests the uttering of His name and the painting of His image, like an interest sparks in us when we hear that somebody utters our name of when we know that there is some preoccupation with our image. Only by admitting a living connection between Jesus’s icon and His personal reality, one can explain the bowing down to earth in front of His icon and kissing His icon piously. Of course, by admitting a certain communication between Jesus’s image and His work as Person, we do not divinize the icon as material matter. Jesus’s image is beyond the material matter, though necessarily expressed through matter, as also His name is beyond the material sound of the words, though it absolutely needs this instrument in order to be materialized to our hearing.” (Stăniloae 2005: 61)

“About a certain connection between the image of Christ and His reality as Person, the Church confesses categorically, by affirming that it is established through the act of the icons’ consecration. The wonders which the Church and the people believe about, that they are committed through icons, these wonders are a confirmation of this connection. In the prayer for consecrating an icon the Father is asked to fill that icon up “with the blessing and with the power of the not-made by human hand Holy Image, which He has plentifully gained through touching the all-holy and the all-clean face of His Son; let work through it powers and wonders for strengthening the right-faith and for the salvation of Your believer people”. It is hinted here the image imprinted on the scarf sent to Abgar, through which that one was healed and consequently required that, as it was then also to be now too. The Lord is asked to touch His image on the icon and to give the icon healing power. And if the Lord touches His face painted on that icon, or if he makes out of the image painted on that icon His own image, it is obviously that His image will be imprinted on that icon (a similar conception about the consecration of the icon is sustained by Serge Bulgakov in his book: The Consecration of the Icon). (Stăniloae 2005: 61)

“The Orthodox Church’s belief about a certain connection between icon and the reality of the Lord as Person, it is framed in the wider general Orthodox conception about the need for and the reality of consecrating some object or part of the nature. In a certain sense, there are consecrated the vessels for the religious services, and in another sense are consecrated the houses, the courtyards, the domestic animals, the crops etc. namely everything that is put ad God’s disposition, but also everything the man uses. Through that, it is aimed the banishing away of some evil forces from those objects or from that part of the nature and dressing them up in the divine power.” (Stăniloae 2005: 61)

“The modern scientific results which have reduced the material matter to an energy, it makes us understanding the justness of the Orthodox conception about the possibility that some forces from beyond nature to be dwelling the material energy and to be using it as an instrument. For these forces have a moral character, they are, of course, carried by personal beings. For how many times don’t we feel in the surrounding natural environment that it resists our strivings or that exercises upon us some evil influences?” (Stăniloae 2005: 61)

“Through the frequency which the Jesus’s image in churches and in the Christians’ houses it keeps awaken our conscience about His historicity, of the embodiment of the Son of God. In the prayer for consecrating the icon, it is said that the icon is “for remembering the embodiment”. Due to icons, the Christian doesn’t forget even for a moment that the Son of God has become man, that he lived in history, and that He committed those acts presented in the icon. Let’s imagine that painting the Son of God as man it is by no means allowed; the result will be that the people’s imagination won’t have anything to stick to, and the Jesus’s historical reality will become increasingly abstract and darkened in the Christian conscience. Despite all the data offered by Gospels, the psychological act of placing the Son of God in history, in the concrete, imaginable existence, it will become increasingly difficult to fulfill; the existence of Jesus will appear to us as something impossible. If Jesus cannot be painted, then it won’t be possible to cogitate Jesus as having a human face, and then itself His existence within history couldn’t be suggested any longer.” (Stăniloae 2005: 62)

“Through the icon of Christ and of the icons of the Saints, we sanctify the sight, namely the first hearing as it was called by Saint Damascene, as through words we sanctify the hearing too.” (Stăniloae 2005: 62)

“The denial of the historicity of Jesus we meet is only, and this is a significant aspect, at a part of the Protestant theology, namely where the dogma of the icon had been rejected. But again, we must notice here that even amongst the Protestant believers, painting the image of Christ it doesn’t totally lack, and this is a proof that the Christian world cannot totally renounce at it, and the absolute removal of His image cannot be done except there where the faith in Him has totally disappeared.” (Stăniloae 2005: 62)

“The reality of God meets us from outside and from there too it is being preached to us, penetrating to our knowledge through the intellectual senses, through the organs which through the material perceptions are able to discern their spiritual core. God doesn’t arise rightly within us, but He makes Himself known to us out of the relations we have with other people, through communications shrouded in the material element, crossing through our intellectual-material senses. We find out about God and our faith in Him is born especially for others’ words, which are preached to our ear. We cannot evade the material element even in the most spiritual preoccupations. If we do not have anything against the word as intellectual-material means which the knowledge of God and the faith in Him is generated within us through, we couldn’t have anything against the icon, which, as the word too, it is a material means for communicating some intellectual realities. A contrary, only a preaching done to us through icon it is a complete preaching. If we haven’t been granted only the sense’s organ, as superior intellectual sense, but we have also been granted the sight too, it surely it has this too a role amongst the highest endeavors of the knowledge.

Of course, when looking at object from nature, s also when hearing impersonal noises, we do not impropriate the knowledge of some spiritual realities. But when looking at the human face, or to its picture, we impropriate a spiritual content being expressed through it, jus like hearing human words. In front of the natural man of or of his image, though transmitting us, through sight, a spiritual content, this content doesn't sanctify our sight, like hearing the words of the natural man doesn't sanctify our hearing either. That's why, in order to sanctify our sight and for knowing the realities from beyond nature, we need icons which to represent images of persons exceeding the face of the natural man. Like the holy words, namely the evangelical and the churchly words differ from the word of the natural preoccupations, producing within us the certitude of the transcendent realities, likewise the image of Jesus, of the image of the Saint, these images must differ from the images of the natural people. Of course, the image of the icon still uses human traits, like the intellectual evangelical contents still use human words. But in both these cases, there is a content transfiguring them, imprinting on them a seal from above man, without removing from them their human intelligible character." (Stăniloae 2005: 62-63)

"It isn't difficult to illustrate how much the Orthodox conception about icon, about suggesting God through the seen elements, it has imprinted its seal on the soul of our people. Our people's art isn't naturalistic and our people's aesthetic isn't indifferent from religious and ethical point of view, as those belonging to the peoples dominated by skepticism regarding the icon's dogma. It has been noticed that our people don't reproduce in the adornments of their clothes, in the wood sculpture, in all their artistical imaginings, the nature, but they schematize the nature according to the icon's model. They do not sew the land's flowers on their shirts, but by exceeding the concrete world, they search for the general and fundamental geometrical shapes of the existence. They do not search in their art for the sinful joy related to the memory of the figures and of the realities which produced pleasure to their bodies, but they search for the mystery and they try to get elevated in the mystery's sphere, beyond the sinful states. The schematization is imposed by the motifs which we have identified as imposing the icon painter to schematize the Person of Jesus. The art in the life of our people it unites the aesthetical function with the ethical one and the religious one. The art must sanctify their sight, to purify their sight of the visions recalling the sin; their art must imagine the true, pure beauty from the world to come. With religious thrill and scrupulousness, as under the burden of a grave responsibility, the popular artist tries to make visible some lines and to the transparence of the material elements, another world than that of the natures, a world which is owes to preach it and through which to sanctify the sight of his fellow humans." (Stăniloae 2005: 64-65)

“Through their art, our people shows that not in nature it is its ideal of life, but beyond nature. That’s why they try to distinguish themselves from nature even through their vestments. Not only the vestments’ adornment differs them from the concrete countenances of the nature but their colors too. The western peoples dress themselves up in gray, gloomy, dark colors, which confound them to nature. It suffices though, to look over the field of a Romanian village that has kept the Romanian way of dressing up, on a working day, and we will clearly distinguish the human beings, though there is not disharmony between their clothes and the landscape. We can affirm that, while the western peoples have a naturalistic ideal of getting close to nature, our people have a personalistic ideal, by placing the person above nature. They have had towards this, amongst other teachers, the Orthodox icon, which doesn’t place the image of Christ or of the saints in the middle of the nature, as in the West’s paintings, and that’s why the colors of the orthodox icons distinguish from nature.” (Stăniloae 2005: 65)

“The symbol by and large, in the Christian meaning of the word, it has its foundation in differing the world from God, but in the same time in the world’s connection with God as its creator. The symbol, in this generally Christian meaning, it can be any of the things and any being, in any time, and therefore today too.” (Stăniloae 2005: 69)

“Not the symbol, by and large, it is a bridge towards icon, but only the prophetic symbol, which the messianic waiting was kept through, in the Old Testament, that one constitutes the way leading towards icon, which will be the representation of the truth Himself, only anticipated in the prophetic symbols of the Old Law.” (Stăniloae 2005: 69)

“But for, on the other hand, the modality the world was given through creation, it didn’t exclude, but it let the Embodiment possible, and the possibility received through falling made it even more desired, the world included the possibility of offering prophetic symbols of the Embodiment and, at the fulfillment of time, a human nature capable of being received by the Word’s Hypostasis and therefore capable of constituting, in union with this hypostasis, the prototype for the Embodied Word.” (Stăniloae 2005: 71)

“The things from the world are, ever since the world’s creation, symbols of God by and large and capable of becoming prophetic symbols of the Words’ Embodiment, namely anticipation of the icon, but they actually become such symbols only by being chosen by God, after the world’s falling into sin. That’s why, often they aren’t elevated in their pure naturalness to the purpose of messianic symbols, but only after they are added a power which they don’t have it exclusively by their nature. Thus, the Aaron’s staff became symbol of the renewed man, of Christ, after it miraculously budded out leaves. And the lamb stabbed on the Passover of the Old Law, it receives a power from above nature: in the initial moment of its instituting as messianic symbol, and after that, for everywhere and all time, a power manifested on unseen plan, by maintaining the Israelites in a special bond to God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 72)

“The prophetic symbols still were a wall, too less transparent, between man and God, being rather erected a separating wall which only the Embodiment of the Word brought it down. In this sense they still are only symbols, namely things separated from God and which separate us from God. Only the icon has proven that the separation between God and the world has ceased in a point of it, and, consequently, God has come closer to the whole world. (...) Saint John called the Law as prefiguration of the icon. The exact icon of the truth it was the humanity of the Son of God and then its representation.” (Stăniloae 2005: 73)

“The Holy Fathers declared that the prophetic symbols of the Old Testament were removed from cult through the coming of the truth. For those prophetic symbols upheld the hope in the Embodiment of the Son. But we, who have known the fulfillment of the hope, we no longer need our hope to be upheld through them.” (Stăniloae 2005: 74)

“For the icon exists with symbols in general sense and with certain special symbols, only the prophetic symbols went out of use.” (Stăniloae 2005: 74)

“Through the Embodiment of the Word, special elements, taken as means and vessels of the grace of Christ, they gain, in comparison to the symbols of the Old Testament, an infinitely increased degree of godlike presence.” (Stăniloae 2005: 74)

“The icon coexists with those thinned symbols, which are filled up with the divine presence of God-the Word, as He came into body. This is for the icon represents the One Who fills these symbols with His presence and Who highlights their meaning. The icon, by presenting God-the Word, as He came to people in human body, it brings at its turn, on one hand, as He does, a removal of the wall from the middle of the old law’s symbol composed of things, and on the other hand, it brings a thinning of the symbols, a more accentuated presence of the godlike power within them.” (Stăniloae 2005: 75)

“The non-embodied God cannot be presented as He is, but only through some prefiguration, or materializations of His traits and actions. These ones are symbols. These symbols do not exclude a certain work of our imagination. This is for the inadequation degree between them and the divine reality, it is very big. The icon presents the real human face of God

Who has really take this face. Consequently, it no longer gives so much room to the human imagination, but it corresponds to the objective reality. Of course, the godhead itself is infinitely above any human face. But the human face is no less the face itself of God-the Word. And, as much as the human face expresses His Hypostasis Himself, as much the icon presents the divine Hypostasis Himself.” (Stăniloae 2005: 76)

“The prophetic symbols, though they were anticipations of the icon (and the symbols, by and large, they are reasons of the icon’s possibility), they do not become themselves as icon, namely as icon’s prototype. This is for not themselves are assumed in the Word’s Hypostasis, but the human face, respectively the human nature. The icon is the representation of the Word Who has taken human face. Thus, the prophetic symbols are anticipations of the icon, as representation of the Word Who later took a human face.” (Stăniloae 2005: 76)

“Only the human nature has this prestige of constituting, by being assumed in the Hypostasis of the Word, the prototype of the icon. The other elements of the world are at their turn present in this prototype, only because they contribute to the material constitution of the human nature.

This preeminence of the human nature is founded on the fact that only the human nature has been made “in the image” (“in the icon”) of God. Through his spirituality, through his character of subject, the man reflects and he makes possible a more adequate manifestation of the divine Subject through his face.” (Stăniloae 2005: 76)

“The man’s portrait still isn’t the icon of God, but the man is the built portrait “in the image of God”, or “in God’s icon”. For he is a special living subject, the man, though in the image of God, or even as image of God, he has an own existence, so that his portrait presents the own existence of this subject, and not the divine subject.

We can have such an image only if the environment which God shows Himself through, and which must belong to the icon’s prototype, it will belong to the divine Subject Himself, not constituting an individual human subject. On the other hand, if the icon of the Divine Subject cannot be concretized except for He will take a seen countenance, what other seen countenance more adequate to Himself could he take than the human nature created in His image? So, the human nature, without being in its existence a self-standing prototype of the Word’s icon, by the fact that the human nature is “in the image” of God, it is the only one able, by being assumed in the Word’s Hypostasis, to make Him visible prototype of His icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 76-77)

“The Son of God, by taking the human nature, which is “in His image”, the human nature no longer is in Him a self-standing image of the Word, but it is the Image of the Word’s Hypostasis, for the Word’s Hypostasis Himself has made Himself “in the image” of His divine Image, without ceasing to be the divine archetype of this Image of His, assumed by Him.” (Stăniloae 2005: 77)

“The godlike image imprinted in the human nature it is concretely materialized in a self-standing image, when the human nature composed a usual human hypostasis, or as image of the Word Himself, when the human nature doesn’t constitute an apart subject, but it is taken in the Word’s Hypostasis. The image being a virtuality in human nature it is concretely materialized as expression of the subject. And as the subject is an apart human being, of the divine Subject with human nature, the image is the expression of the human subject and not of the divine Subject. In Christ the divine image being in the human nature, it is actualized as image of the Word. This is for He has made Himself man, human subject, without ceasing to be the archetypal divine subject too. He has made Himself as His visible image Himself, by uniting in Himself. In this sense Saint Apostle Paul said that: He “took a servant countenance” (Philippians 2: 7), and the Holy Fathers said that He took the “in the image”. His human image is no Himself, and not an apart human subject. So that by being Him represented in icon, as type-subject, it is represented the archetype-Subject Himself, given the fact that it isn’t another the image-subject and another the archetypal-Subject, but they are one and the same.” (Stăniloae 2005: 77)

“Christ isn’t only a symbol of the Godhead, as the man himself is, but He is God Himself in a seen way. We could say that Christ is His own Symbol, as Saint Maximos the Confessor said, for the same One is both unseen God and seen man, or unseen God with a seen image. This is for the Man Jesus isn’t whatever hypostasis but, but He is the Hypostasis of the Word Himself. That’s why we do not transcend from the man Jesus to God-the Word, as from a godlike symbol differing from Him, for the One represented as man is the divine Hypostasis Himself. Of course, the icon of Christ isn’t one with its prototype, and in this sense, it takes place a transcending from it to its prototype. But nu a transcending like to another person, but the prototype isn’t a person different from the person represented in icon. It is about a transcending only like from the image of a person to that person’s reality.” (Stăniloae 2005: 78)

“It is the biggest privilege of the human face that, by being “in the image” of God, it can represent the Word’s Hypostasis in a visible mode, in prototype and in icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 78)

“It is the man’s greatest glory that God has made Himself man, that God has made Himself seen as man; the visibility becomes here the environment of the highest spirituality. The human visibility can become God's visibility, not of the divine Being, of course, but of the divine Hypostasis. And this has become the human visibility, actually, into Christ. "I saw His glory, glory like of One born out of the Father, full of grace and of truth", exclaimed Saint John the Evangelist (Jn. 1: 14). And Apostle Philip, when heralding to Nathanael that he saw the Lord, he called that one too, to come and to see: "come and see" (Jn. 1: 47). And this is what we confess in all times through icon." (Stăniloae 2005: 78)

"Through icon, as representation of the Embodied God, the Orthodox Church confesses about the assuming of the human nature in the hypostasis of the Word of God, and therefore about the salvation of our nature. The icon "spring out of the teaching about salvation". (Stăniloae 2005: 81)

"The Church has highlighted the ground of its teaching about icons, when was facing the objections raised by iconoclasts; and as the same objects are raised by the icons' adversaries from all times, likewise the grounds highlighted by the Church in that struggle, they are valid in all times." (Stăniloae 2005: 81)

"The representatives of the Orthodoxy brought all kinds of argument in support of icons, but all these arguments derive out of a sole one: out of the Embodiment of the Word. This is the luminous hearth giving power to all the other arguments and considerations, and around which all the other ones move." (Stăniloae 2005: 81)

"The evolution of the iconoclasm from forbidding the icon only on mosaic forbiddance to using Christological arguments, it was determined by the answers of the icons' defenders. The resorting of the iconoclasts to the mosaic interdiction of being made carved image, or idol, and the interdiction to be that worshipped, it was valid as long as God didn't make Himself man. Thus, Saint John Damascene said: "Yore, God, the bodiless and shapeless One, wasn't by any means represented in icon. But now, after He showed Himself in body and after He lives amongst people, I represent in icon what it is seen of God". Facing this argument, the iconoclasts tried to demonstrate that, even embodied, God cannot be represented in icon. That's why, the icons' defender no longer could to simply affirm that the embodiment of God offers the ground for painting Him in icon, but they must prove, against the iconoclasts' arguments, that the icon of Christ represents – actually – His Person, and not an image having nothing to do with Him. With this, the struggle for icons brought in discussion a whole series of subtle Christological problems, or it has unfolded from another angle the whole Christological problem." (Stăniloae 2005: 83)

“The symbol allowed and commanded by the Old Testament had a provisory and prophetic function. They were preparing the world for Christ, together with Whom the icon will enter its function. They had roles of types of the truth to come. The Holy Fathers wrote a lot on this signification of the Symbols of the Old Testament. They were giving knowledge about God, but only a reduced, obscure knowledge, because God Himself isn’t revealed in them but only as in shadows, for He fully Revealed Himself in Christ, in Whom God came in the maximum closeness and light. The icon, by representing Christ for the ones who didn’t see Him, it represents this great increase in knowing God. The history of the Revelation or of the salvation, it has thus two stages and to them correspond the symbol and the icon. But the history has been moving after the falling into sin, also outside the connection with God, in a purely immanent flowing. This happened until the calling of Abraham, to the whole mankind, and after that it happened to all the peoples except the chosen people, and since Christ, it has been happening to all pagan peoples. This movement of the history outside the Revelation and outside the savior work of God, it finds its expression in worshipping the idols. Thus, reckoned as a whole, the history moves between idol, symbol, and icon, each of these ones expressing a certain report with God: the idol expresses a negative and illusory report, of getting stranger to God; the symbol and the icon represent the preparation stage and the stage of accomplishing the salvation. The idol, the symbol, and the icon correspond, respectively: to the paganism, to the Old Testament, and to the New Testament. That’s why the icon hasn’t totally removed the symbol from use, like the New Testament hasn’t done it to the Old Testament, or, knowing of God into Christ it hasn’t made useless knowing God out of nature, or the knowing the godlike work from within Christ through diverse material means. But all these symbols, including the symbols from the Old Testament, they have received through the coming of God into body, a transparency, a clarity which they never had before.” (Stăniloae 2005: 83-84)

“Given this framing of the distinction between idol and symbol in the history culminating into Christ, we understand why this argument, used by the defenders of the icons, against the argument of the mosaic interdiction concerning the carved image, an argument initially used by iconoclasts, it doesn’t stay by itself, but it has been, since the beginning, interwoven with the argument of the Lord’s Embodiment, and why – after the iconoclasts moved the discussion on Christological grounds – the icons’ defenders didn’t stop using, besides the argument of the Lord’s Embodiment, also the argument of the distinction between symbol and icon. They used the two arguments together all the time, for the iconoclasts continued to argue their affirmation that the icon is an idol not only by using Christological arguments, but by still using the argument of the mosaic interdiction to make a carved image of God – namely they didn’t recognize any representation of God, because of considering all of these representations as idols. The struggle between the two parties was a struggle from irreconcilable positions. It was, namely, the struggle pro or contra a Revelation of God, a Revelation done through other means than through Word. Or it was, implicitly, a struggle pro or contra the Embodiment of God into Christ, a struggle for Christology. While the icons' defenders recognized the Revelation of God through the environment of the creature, they didn't considered the creature as locked up in himself, neither considered they any attempt to represent God through creature as carving and idol, and in the unfolding of the Revelation they recognized a growing up from symbol to the Embodiment of God and to the icon corresponding to the Embodiment - the iconoclasts didn't recognize, actually, any Revelation of God through creature, namely they didn't either recognized the Revelation into Christ, and that's why they reduced both the symbol and the icon to idol. The iconoclasts recognized only a Revelation through word, resemblant to the Protestants from later." (Stăniloae 2005: 84-85)

"When the images are of God, when in these images are mirrored His glory and His power, when through these images one brings worshipping to God, namely when these images are symbols of the divine transcendence, these images are pleasant to God and commanded by Him; only when through images one brings worshipping to the creation, or to the devil who stops the man from searching for God, only when those images are idols, then they are forbidden." (Stăniloae 2005: 95)

"This antinomy stays at the basis of the icon. On one hand, the icon represents the godhead, who made, on Himself, as seen world, and on the other hand, the icon doesn't represent the Godhead, for the Godhead is inaccessible and imageless. The icon is the "visibility of the invisible, the imagining of the unimaginable"." (Stăniloae 2005: 105)

"The idea that the prototypes are mediator between the divine indeterminacy and the seen things as their images, it is expressed also by Saint Damascene when, on one hand, he called the prototypes as "icons" of the divine Being, and, on the other hand, he called the seen things as "icons" of the prototypes." (Stăniloae 2005: 111)

"When through Christ is born and strengthened the faith in God, as differing from creation, when to the ones who believe there is no longer the danger of stopping themselves to things, and now they are able to look through things towards God, the interdiction from the Old Testament, of not making carved image, it loses its actuality." (Stăniloae 2005: 114)

"God-the Word, through His Embodiment, He has become a visible prototype, a historical one, of the Christian icon. So, the Christian icon isn't the product of an imagination, but it has a real basis. The icon is the image of God Who has taken human countenance, who has become a historical person, and Who has kept His human image forever and ever.” (Stăniloae 2005: 119)

“Jesus Christ is being worshipped not only in Himself, but also in His Christians icons, namely Christ is prototype to His Christian icons, for He is the unique man being in the same time God; like Him, there isn’t anybody and anywhere. He is the only specimen of a unique species. Besides, even the average human individual is, by his spirit, by his personal character, an irreplaceable unicum. That’s why his portrait is of interest. All the more is unicum the Man Who, in the same time, is God. That’s why too, Patriarch Nicephorus said that: while the symbols are many, the icon is one, for One is the icon’s prototype. The presence of God in Jesus Christ is a unique presence; His presence it isn’t a presence repeated in all people, or a presence extended always and everywhere. That’s why the more palpitant thing for all people and on all times, it is to at least have the image of the One in Whom God has shown Himself in this supreme and unique mode. From here comes the character of Jesus Christ as prototype of the Christian icon. Christ is prototype to the icon form exclusively Him is embodied God. But this presupposes that Jesus Christ isn’t a prototype of the icon as man separated from God, but as man Who is God as well.” (Stăniloae 2005: 119)

“The icon doesn’t lack any relation with the One presented in the icon. That’s why, the honoring given to the icon if passes to the prototype, as the icons’ defenders said.” (Stăniloae 2005: 123)

“The icon participates, somehow, to the archetype, namely it has a relation with the archetype.” (Stăniloae 2005: 123)

“Nicephorus knew, as all the icons’ defenders did, an existential icon, of an icon which is “of-the-same-being” with the archetype: the son to the father. But this icon isn’t that one produced by art or by craftsmanship, namely the icon in a strict sense, which was questioned, but it is the natural icon. While the iconoclasts confounded those, the icons’ defenders discerned between those, following the conception of Saint Basil the Great. By discerning this, they had the possibility of avoiding to identify the icon to the idol. This is for a natural icon emanated out of prototype, it will be of-the-same-being with the prototype, so that it will be godlike if the prototype is godlike, and it will be created if the prototype is created. Therefore, there is no danger of investing with godlike attributes a created natural icon. Thus occurs the paradox: the natural Icon, though it is a hypostasis differing from its prototype, it is united with it according to the being, while the icon produces by a craftsmanship, though representing the prototype, it is separated from the prototype according to the being, being only like its prototype but separated from it.” (Stăniloae 2005: 125)

“The icon produced by art it has an own substance but it hasn’t an own hypostasis, an own form, and an own name, while the natura icon has an own hypostasis, but it hasn’t an own being.” (Stăniloae 2005: 125)

“From the Son to the Father, the believer makes a transcending as from hypostasis to hypostasis, but not as from nature to nature; from icon to Christ the believer makes a transcending as from nature (wood, colors etc.) to nature, but not as from hypostasis to hypostasis, because the icon doesn’t speak by itself about a hypostasis. The believer, by looking at the icon, he doesn’t think at other hypostasis than that one represented in that icon, but the believer thinks at the existential prototypical reality, which differs from the icon’s matter.” (Stăniloae 2005: 125)

“We have said that the icon produced by art, it is icon in a stricter sense than the natural icon, for it is by excellence image or icon or a natural reality, and it isn’t another reality of-the-same-being with the prototypical reality. But the icon produced by art is possible as image, as icon of the reality of God, for God-the Word, by making Himself man, He has taken a seen countenance that can be reproduced, namely He has made Himself as historical prototype of the icon. The icon is possible for the godlike archetype has taken His human image, making Himself historical prototype of the icon. The icon represents the human, objective, and historical image of the embodied God. In this regard, the icon shows us a clearer image of God than the symbol does – which is constituted of things. Through symbol one must to a transcending not only from the created nature to the uncreated nature, but also from a seen “image” to an unseen image, to an imageless reality. The icon is witness to the condescendence of God, Who has take human image for eternity, and the human image can be represented in icon, and He has made this image as His own, on the basis that the human nature, being in the image of God, it can become His own image. The icon represents eidos or morphe of God, due to the fact that God has embodied Himself, while the symbol constituted of things lets us to subjectively imagine Him, for the symbol cannot anchor anything by itself. The icon is “a result of the art whom an image has been given after imitating the archetype”. The symbol of the Old Testament was too, a presence of the power of God, and some symbols of the Church, as there are the Holy Mysteries, they have a presence of God more accentuated than in icons. The icon’s specificity is that of presenting us His real image which God has taken to Himself, due to the fact that He has embodied Himself. Through icon, we ceaselessly confess, aprioristically and directly, that God has embodied Himself.” (Stăniloae 2005: 125-126)

“The icon participates to the “form” and to the “name” of its prototype, but it doesn’t participate to the prototype’s being. Sometimes, Nicephorus seems to affirm that by participating to form, the icon participates to the prototype’s hypostasis too, namely to the hypostasis of Christ. But he didn’t say that aprioristically. The less it was that said by the Seventh Ecumenical Synod, which doesn’t mention either the participation to the form, but it only mentioned the participation to the name, and it even said that the icon doesn’t participate, by any means, to any of the prototype’s features, but only to the name.” (Stăniloae 2005: 126)

“The icon is a likeness of the hypostasis. But the icon isn’t a likeness of the natures. Just because it is a representation through art, the icon is a likeness to the hypostases, but not of the natures, because of being made of another material. If the icon had been made of the same material, they would have been alike according to their natures. But because in such a case, the nature or the natures would have been rounded in the icon in a new concrete existence, the icon wouldn’t have been a likeness of the same hypostasis, but it would have been a different hypostasis, as it happens by birth. But the art produced religious icon isn’t, actually, a different hypostasis, for in itself is nothing, but it is a representation of a hypostasis. Just because the icon doesn’t have its own being, like the represented hypostasis, the icon is a likeness to a hypostasis, namely the icon represents a hypostasis and it is not a hypostasis by itself.” (Stăniloae 2005: 127)

“The icon represents the hypostasis but it doesn’t reproduce the hypostasis in his nature, for one cannot touch the hypostasis’s nature in icon. If it had been so, the icon wouldn’t have been icon, but prototype. But the represented hypostasis has his nature in his prototypical existence, and not in icon. This is said by the icon too: by representing the hypostasis, the icon says, in the same time, that the hypostasis isn’t with his nature in icon, the hypostasis isn’t as living reality in icon, but the hypostasis remains different from icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 127)

“But if the icon, though not being the hypostasis himself, namely by not being the hypostasis in his being, it still indicates the hypostasis as a reality differing from icon, then the icon won’t be an indication of the nature in itself. The icon has the gift of indicating the hypostasis and this means that the icon indicates the hypostasis’s reality as nature subsisting beyond icon. But the icon doesn’t indicate a non-hypostatical nature, because the nature doesn’t exist in itself, in order to be prototype to the icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 128)

“Of course, in icon it isn’t represented the godlike, as didn’t visibly appeared either in the prototype Christ. Only the human is represented in icon, as only the human is visible in the prototype too. But as the human in Christ has become the own image of God-the Word, His organ of manifestation, not only as man but also as God, likewise the icon, by representing the Christ's human, it makes known to us, but not in a visible manner, through human, the Christ's godlike. Certain circumstance of Christ's life, and certain of His deeds, though visible, cannot be explained otherwise but by the fact that He was God too. Those deeds distinguished Him from all people, they elevated Him above all people, they made known the One Who was God too. And as the ones seeing those deeds at Christ, they knew (without seeing) His godhead too, likewise the ones seeing those deeds represented in icon, they know His godhead too (without seeing it). Thus, through the hypostasis of Christ, which manifested visibly, in certain circumstances and in certain of His deeds, it was seen His human nature and it was known His Godhead. And the icon by representing this concrete hypostasis, manifested in the circumstances and in the deeds which distinguished Him from all people, it shows that Christ is in the same time God, and He isn't a hypostasis having only a human nature." (Stăniloae 2005: 129)

"Saint Theodore the Studite, by saying that the icon represents the Hypostasis of Christ, and not the natures in abstract, he wanted to say that the icon represents the Logos Who has shown Himself concretely, as the Man Who did certain and certain unique deeds, as an individualized man, but a man individualized not only like all the other human beings, but also in a mode differing Him from all the other people. When the believer sees This Man in icon, the believer knows how to discern Him from any other human being; the believer knows that Christ is the Man Who is, in the same time, the Embodied Son of God." (Stăniloae 2005: 129)

"The icon represents the Logos Who has become a historical Man, and different from any other man. It is a parallel to the oral or writing preaching, which, by always representing the history of the deeds and of the life of the Savior, it doesn't reproduce on each time the subject who tied then to another character – for none of these is possible –, but as always gathering in mind the One Who did them. And as absurd will be to refuse the telling of the Savior's deeds and life, on the reason that telling them we cannot reproduce Him in His historical fullness, or as absurd will be to deny any connection of the Savior's deeds with the Person of the Savior, equally absurd it is to refuse the ceaseless repetition of representing the diverse moments of Christ's life, in icons. On each time, the believer "honors in icon the hypostasis" of the One painted in icon, on Christ, as the Seventh Ecumenical Synod said, namely the historical hypostasis, as too, the deeds which the believer hears about in sermon, they refer to Christ. And he doesn't make this reference arbitrarily, for the deeds he hears in word are which are repeated in icons, those deeds belong exclusively to the unique prototype Who is Christ, but also on the basis of the fact that the Lord is – according to His promise – everywhere, where one preaches about Him by word, and therefore He is everywhere, where He is preached through icon. The icons are not broken apart from prototype, for the memory and the history aren't broken apart from the prototype staying at its origin. The icon is the seen historical “echo” of the Prototype Christ, of the embodiment of the God-the Word. It is an echo which the mankind no longer can get totally rid of, as it equally can no longer get rid of the memory of the embodiment of God-the Word. This gives us a new understanding of the reason why the icon bears the name of the prototype. As it is justified to consider the deeds repeated through preaching, that those deeds belong to Christ, it is equally justified to consider that the One seen in icon as committing a certain deed, a deed committed only by Christ, to be called as Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 130)

“The parallel between the preaching about Christ and the representing of Christ in icons do not make one another as redundant, rather one makes clearer the other one.” (Stăniloae 2005: 131)

“The words need the things, or, in the absence of the things they word need the things’ icons. This is for the words produce in mind the images of the things, as proof to the fact that they potentially belong to icons. And the things or their objective icons are a fulfilling of the words. This is for the words take the mind, on a detour, to the knowing of the things, whilst the icons do that on a direct way.” (Stăniloae 2005: 132)

“The icon implies the word, and the word implies the icon. But the icon is a clearer image of the thing. Both of them, icon and word, are different from prototype. As such, the icon produces its effect only by awakening the memory, the onlooker’s thoughts – and the word likewise. Neither the icon nor the word is the reality itself, but they establish the connection with the reality itself.” (Stăniloae 2005: 133)

“The word and the icon are bridges between past or distanced in space things and the man’s memory. They have their basis in an objective reality, a past or spatially distanced reality, but also in the man’s memory, representing the unavoidable bond between them. Once a man has known a reality, he won’t be able to forget it. The man keeps an image of that reality, an image that he presents in word and image, and that he passes it to his descendants. What once happens, it won’t ever sink in total nothingness. What a man known that it is somewhere, it is indelibly preserved in his memory. The unerasable and eternal connection of the man with the things which sometime existed, or which exist somewhere, but also the impossibility of having all of them always present, they are expressed by man through word and image, through word as concentrated image, and through image as unfolded word. The image is the imprint of the reality upon the man's conscience, and the word or the exteriorized icon, they are the expression of that reality." (Stăniloae 2005: 133)

"What we especially want to keep in mind, from the substantial and suggestive argumentation of Patriarch Nicephorus, it is the idea that the word too, it is the icon of the thing, but it is an indirect, potential icon. The word unavoidably awakens, though in an indirect way, in mind, the icon of the reality it expresses. The mind cannot restrain itself from this impulse. But somebody's name is a word, the resumptive and all-comprising word, which points to him. As such, the name potentially comprises the icon of that somebody. When the believers hear the name of Jesus, their mind cannot stop itself from representing His image." (Stăniloae 2005: 135)

"On icon isn't written: The Icon of Christ, but it is written: Christ. This is for the name of Christ, either we hear it or we utter it, either we see it written, it awakens the immediate memory about Him, and it leads our thought in worshipping ghost directly to Him, having within us the effects of a true prayer. By writing on icon the name of Christ, the believer's thought is immediately elevated through icon, to Christ Himself in a real state of prayer." (Stăniloae 2005: 135)

"The icon is too, what the name is: a means for elevating the thought in ghost of prayer to Christ. That's why, associating the icon and the name, it accomplished such a powerful means. In both the icon and the name, it is comprised the concentrated Gospel, or the contemporaneity, in time, with the Revelation. Both of them are means of keeping Christ in memory according to His face and to His word. When we see in icon the Birth of Christ, we remember that the Son of God has made Himself man for our salvation, and we say: "Glory to You, Lord". We learn out of icon what we learn out of Gospel too. Like we repeat through writing and uttering, the Lord's words, and thus we prolong His words in history, likewise we reproduce through icon the Savior's deed. (...) We must bear the Son in God during history, in the entirety of His manifestation. And this doesn't mean only a theoretical bearing of Christ, but it is a bearing towards worshipping Him and praying at Him. And this is the tradition: the integral keeping by believers, of the historical Christ, in order they to be in connection of worshipping and of prayer with Christ from heavens. That's why Christ came into history, in order to keep us bonded with Him, in all times, through His icon, through His name, through His words in history. The tradition means preserving the Revelation in its quality as fire thrown from heavens on earth. And only by adding the icon to the word, the Revelation will be preserved in the heat of its fire, as also in its unaltered content, in other words, what the Revelation is since its first moment. Where there is no icon, the worshipping and the prayer weaken, and there also intervenes the variety of misinterpretations. The Protestant world has lost the tradition both as ghost of prayer and as integral and always unaltered prolongation of the Revelation within history.” (Stăniloae 2005: 135-136)

“The connection between name and icon was understood by the right sense of the Church. The iconoclasts were dominated by an apophatic attitude towards Christ, by a restraining of the mind from any cogitation at Christ in His concrete historical life. The iconoclasts claimed that God cannot be known except in a totally interior mode, by the ones clean in their hearts. And this was because Christ, by ascending to heavens, He forsook the “image” (morphe) and He elevated Himself “above the human nature”, by mixing the human nature in the glory of the godhead.” (Stăniloae 2005: 137)

“Once the Word deigned to embody Himself, to enter concrete situations, to keep forever His human face, our mind no longer has the possibility and the justification for an apophatic attitude – univocal one – towards Jesus. We won’t have the feeling of the connection with the godhead if we avoid the words and the face of Jesus. Of course, the icon is a preservation of this face through memory, and not an apparition in the present time. (...) We owe that through these words and through the icon of His face, to feel the connection with His godhead too: the cataphatic must ceaselessly be accompanied by apophatic too. But the apophatic is occasioned and made possible by cataphatic. Only by hearing the word of Christ and by seeing His icon, we can feel His godhead. Christ is the way and the ladder towards Christ as God. And in Him, as God, we see the Father. That’s why the Savior says: “The one who has seen me, he has seen the Father” (Jn. 14: 9). And that’s why Patriarch Nicephorus says that who doesn’t admit the icon of Christ, he doesn’t admit that Christ is the icon of the Father, understanding that only by looking at His seen face, our soul exceeds the visible, our soul transcends to the invisible godhead, by noticing the living bond between the human face of Christ as prototype of His icon – produced by art – and hypostasis – bearer of this face as natural icon of the Father. Thus, in the historical Christ we live the presence of His godhead. And this is occasioned to us by the icon of Christ. Although it represents a historical prototype, the icon of Christ must suggest, through this prototype, that God Himself penetrated into history, that He made on Himself direct subject of deeds into history, that this prototype means the entering into history of the godlike subject in order to transfigure the history.” (Stăniloae 2005: 138-139)

“The fact that the prototype has a historical character it makes possible representing Christ. But if this prototype had been only historical, His image wouldn’t have been an icon, but it would have been a portrait, and no power could make this portrait to be reproduced during history. The icon is witness not only to the fact that there was in history a man called Jesus, but it is witness to the fact that this man has been the embodiment of God-the Word. In addition to this, the icon is witness that this historical prototype hasn't existed only in a historical time, but he lives forever in a supra-historical existence. Only that is why the icon is worshipped, or through icon is worshipped the One Who is represented by icon. And only that's why the icon is an unavoidable necessity. The icon is the product of the faith upheld in people by the One Who has embodied Himself, through His power which doesn't forsake the history. Thus, the icon of Jesus must be different from a portrait, even if that portrait would represent the historical reality as real as possible. The icon must suggest that its prototype isn't only a man who live into history, but He is God Who has made Himself man and Who remains Savior to the end of the world." (Stăniloae 2005: 139)

"Like the man is a speaking being, likewise he is a being receiving images and making images. Properly-said, these ones are a sole feature. Two things must be especially highlighted related to this capacity and to this need of the man: a) the man gathers through images, as through words too, the world's things, of better said their rationalities, in himself, and he grows up through them; b) by receiving the things' images with the interest of understanding them and of expressing the things, the man isn't a display or a passive copyist of the things' natural countenance, but the man tries to unveil the things and to represent them, in his endeavor or understanding the things better. Representing the reality in images and in words it has a history, for its understanding it has a history. This means that through the images of the things and through the words naming the things, the man exceeds the things' pure materiality. This mainly regards the human portraits." (Stăniloae 2005: 142)

"The iconoclasts weren't content to reject only the icon, by rejecting the difference between icon and prototype, but they even affirmed that Jesus cannot be a prototype to the icon. Actually, between the first aspect and the second aspect there is a tight connection. On the affirming that the icon is one with its prototype it depends the affirming about the impossibility of circumscribing Christ in icon, namely the affirmation about the impossibility to be Christ prototype to the icon." (Stăniloae 2005: 143)

"Ostrogorsky affirmed that the iconoclasts adopted an orientalist-magical stance, when arguing that the icon must be identical to the prototype. Actually, they weren't followers of the magic. They reckoned that in icon must be represented, adequately, the reality. But even a person has something incomprehensible, through his soul. All the more, Christ has this character through His human nature. And because of not being possible to represent this character, one must renounce to any icon, because of being the icon a dead subject "speechless and soulless". This wanted to say the iconoclasts when relentlessly repeating that Jesus Christ cannot be prototype to the icon, for He cannot be circumscribed, for He is shapeless. They believed that the upholders of the icons, by the fact that they worship the icons, they admit such a representation of the uncircumscribed reality of Christ, or that they reckon Christ as circumscribed in His totality, and, due to that, as possible to be represented alive, in icon. Therefore, the iconoclasts attributed to icons a magical, idolater conception.” (Stăniloae 2005: 143)

“Because of not understanding the difference between icon and prototype, the iconoclasts reproached the icons’ defenders the separation they did between the humanity and the godhead of Christ, or between the human body and soul, because both the godhead and the human soul are impossible to be circumscribed, and Jesus in His concrete existence is animated, while the icon is inanimate.” (Stăniloae 2005: 144)

“We consider the icon, on one hand, as a proof of Christ’s existence and as a natural consequence of His existence, and on the other hand we consider the icon as necessarily attracting the mind to Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 144)

“By giving to religious icon a relative worshipping, that one coincides to the worshipping given to Christ as adoration. The attitude in front of the icon is a mysterious unity in duality. This is for on one hand the believer addresses himself to the prototype, and on the other hand he does that through icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 144)

“Through the religious icon we worship Christ, like we worship Him while not looking at a religious icon; either we think at Christ in Himself or we see Him in icon, the worshipping we give Him is one. In this sense, the relative worshipping given to icon it coincides to the adoration given to Christ. But this is only for we think at the image represented in the religious icon, and not at the icon itself as transparent to Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 147)

“Of course, the analogy between the “essence” contemplated in a thing or in a person and the “image” contemplated in the religious icon or in any other representation is valid only up to a certain point. The “essence” contemplated in a thing or in the prototypical person it is in themselves, it is the shape founding the reality itself, of that thing or of that person, it is their “essential form”. Outside the respective thing or the respective person, that’ essential form” doesn’t exist except in thinking. A contrary, in a religious icon or in a representation of the prototypical person (or of a thing) there isn’t present the “essence” of that person (or of that thing), but only his “image” in strict sense, which isn’t as a “essential form” in that representation, giving to that representation a living reality, because of being a form lacking the essence. That’s why the image contemplated in that representation it has a real existence outside that representation too, it is not only cogitated, it exists as “essential image” of a prototypical reality differing from its representation. That’s why from the religious icon (and from any representation) to prototype, one must not only transcend as from the material phenomenality to the transcendental of the image, but as from an image represented to an essential image existing beyond the represented image. The prototype isn’t only transcendental relatedly to the matter which it is represented in, but the prototype is transcendent. In this regard, the icon, and by and large by representation, it belongs to the symbol’s category. The prototype, according to His essence, he isn’t in the religious icon, or the icon isn’t one, according to the essence, with the prototype, but the prototype as essence is beyond the religious icon. On the other hand, though, if one transcends from the religious icon as matter, one won’t transcend from icon as image. One transcends only from the religious icon’s materiality, or of the image represented in a matter differing from the image, to the essence characteristic to the image, to the image’s real existence; the real image of the One Who is worshipped it doesn’t differ from the image contemplated in the religious icon. The image is the bridged between the real prototypical existence in the essence characteristic to the represented One, and the representation of the prototype in a matter differing from it. In this regard the icon differs from symbol, because the symbol it differs from the “image” of the symbolized.” (Stăniloae 2005: 149-150)

“The bridge between icon and prototype is real, and it isn’t a purely subjective invention, though it needs the support of the worshipper’s mind. The bridge is not produced by the mind, but it cannot dispense itself of mind, in its concrete accomplishing. Better said, the mind ascertains the bridge, the mind vehiculates it, the minds cannot avoid ascertaining it and concretizing it. Not the Christ’s prototype by itself it imprints His image in the foreign matter, but the man’s mind does that, by painting the icon. But the Christ’s image painted by man in the matter that is foreign to Christ’s image, it is borne by man in his memory, not because he wants to, but because any believer must to, by inheriting it from the previous generations which taught him by word, by Scripture, and by other icons. And the previous generations had the Christ’s image, in the last analysis, from the Apostles, who saw Christ in His prototypical reality.” (Stăniloae 2005: 150)

“The icon is based, in the last analysis, on the fact that, as any seen prototype it imprints its image in the man’s mind, likewise the prototype of Christ has imprinted His image in the Apostles’ memory, and through them in the memory of all the following generations of believers. Is this a detaching of the image from prototype? Does the memory bear an image of the prototype as detached from the prototype? One cannot say that. The mind is connected to prototype by memory. The mind thinks at prototype through the image it bears, but the mind cannot think at the prototype without the image. The image is reinvigorated by the prototype's life, but without being identical to the prototype, according to the being." (Stăniloae 2005: 150-151)

"In icon the craftsman fixes in another material what it has been fixed in the matter of his memory. The side of the bridge from himself which extends in his memory to the prototype of Christ, he concretizes it in an external material, but aiming to reinvigorate Christ's image in his memory and in the memory of other people. Through the image from the religious icon the man's memory is that one connected to the prototype. Through this image one can see the prototype; this image is reinvigorated by the fact that the man remembers the prototype's life. Like we bear the name of Christ within us, within our memory, given us by our forerunners' memory, as the received it from Apostles, through word and through writing, and by ourselves passing it to others through word and through writing, likewise we bear with us the Christ's image and we give it to others as inheritance, by describing it and by painting it. And like by hearing and by memorizing His name, by uttering and by writing His name, we think at the One Himself Who bear that Name and we worship Him, for we connect in our memory to Himself, likewise we do each time when we see His image. The transcendentality of the image in the religious icon's matter it implies in itself the transcendentality of the person which the icon differs from, but in the same time the icon is a means which we live the connection through, with the real Person." (Stăniloae 2005: 151)

"The iconoclasts declared that Christ doesn't like His icon. In this affirmation it is implied the idea that God despises His embodiment and therefore also His descent to us, namely His kenosis." (Stăniloae 2005: 151)

"Saint Theodore the Studite reckoned that denying Christ the possibility of being painted in religious icons it means denying all His bodily features, and this is Docetism." (Stăniloae 2005: 163)

"The solidarity of the features belonging to a nature, it is due to the fact that that nature subsists in a unitary hypostasis, In the case of Christ, the divine hypostasis organizes in a solidary manner all the features of the human natures too. The icons' defenders affirm that the visible traits of the image do not stand by themselves, but they are organized in a body by a spiritual subject, and in the case of Christ the bodily traits are organized by the godlike Hypostasis. He can be seen, He is active through His visible, and He is sensitive through His face." (Stăniloae 2005: 163)

"The iconoclasts argued that the Christ's humanity was transformed (metebale) after His Resurrection in the glory of God. Neither on Tabor the Apostles could look at the Christ's face when it was filled up with the godlike glory from within Him. How could they, consequently, after he left the mortality and the corruption? “He transformed Himself and He became immortal and incorruptible. Therefore, even the countenance of servant, by reaching thus, it has been transformed in His untold light, in the light due to God-the Word, which “the eye hasn’t seen it and the ear hasn’t heard it and at the man’s heart it hasn’t ascended” (1 Cor. 2: 9). So, what could someone reach like, the things impossible to understand? What could somebody paint like, the icon of an image (morphes) so beautifully and so non-comprised, if the godlike being could be called as image and as intelligible?” (Stăniloae 2005: 165)

“Even if there cannot be represented in the religious icon an image of Christ as he would show Himself now, though, by being represented the image he has during His life on earth, and as he shown it after His resurrection as dressed up in immortality, for we know that this is the image he has it now, one isn’t wrong when affirming that the icon represents and image the Lord has it now. That’s why the image of Christ from the religious icon it isn’t only an image of the past, only serving for refreshing Him in our memory, but it is an image which the Lord continues to have it even now, and therefore it is an image which we ascend through, with our thought, to Christ, and which is even now with the body which we paint in the religious icon. The Christ’s religious icon unites, in a bipolar manner, the historical with the eschatological, the life on earth with the full of glory life from heavens. In icon it is represented the historical life as transfigured and made eternal.” (Stăniloae 2005: 165)

“The godlike offshoot (the godlike image), by springing out of virginal root, “He didn’t change the nature”. For He constitutes the nature’s most appropriate image. “He didn’t forsake the natural power and the common and irreproachable affects..., but He preserved consummate and existential, the definition of His humanity everywhere; and by having all our things, He committed the things from above us, showing the mode of the theandric work”. Not only that the supreme image of His most own image doesn’t alter this one, but this one too, it appears to be the most adequate image or environment of His, namely of His work revealed in creation. Through this image of His, He gains the greatest victories in the man’s favor, these ones being in the same time victories of His most characteristic image.” (Stăniloae 2005: 170-171)

“Somehow, the human image defeated the death’s force, through the powers coming to it out of the supreme and fundamental image, to say so: organically tied to it, from the hypostatical Logos, as out of its own foundation or source. He defeated the force of His decomposition, or of His death, through the force coming from inside, from the hypostasis who made it in His image, and Who became its own hypostasis, Who restored it, somehow in the power and in the beauty which, though coming out of God, they were coming as out of a source that became its own, by becoming power and beauty to it.” (Stăniloae 2005: 171)

“The godlike nature, though shapeless, it is the source of all shapes. The godlike nature isn’t only shapeless, but it is above any shape, it is a “hyper-icon”. God, without having an actual determination, He is the Source of all determinations works. All the images have their origin in God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 178)

“The iconoclasts, by reckoning Lord’s human nature as shapeless, they deny not only the existence of the body, but they also deny the existence of the soul, because of denying the soul as dynamic reality giving the body a shape, and the flesh which the soul gives a shape to.” (Stăniloae 2005: 179)

“The circumscribing of Christ not being that of an abstract humanity, namely a purely thought one, but by being a circumscribing of His humanity, it is a circumscribing referring to the hypostasis of Christ Himself, though this hypostasis is uncircumscribed according to His godhead. The circumscribing isn’t only of the human nature taken in itself, or of a human hypostasis differing from the godlike hypostasis. This idea was attributed by iconoclasts to the icons’ defenders, because of not being the iconoclasts able to understand what the divine-human hypostasis could be circumscribed like, by the fact itself that He is circumscribed according to His human nature. The icons’ defenders combated this idea with the whole their strength.” (Stăniloae 2005: 179)

“The icon likens the cross: it is a limit narrowing us and stopping us from extending ourselves to infinite, by ourselves, namely to make us as gods by ourselves, but it is also a gate towards the infinity of God, by His grace, through the communion with Him, through which us, by surrendering ourselves to Him as to another, He gives Himself to us. We are all of us are aware of our insufficiencies, of our sins, we must all of us endure these insufficiencies, which we cannot overcome. The best thing to do is to repent for our mistakes, especially for there isn’t always possible to repair their consequences, but we must endure them for life, and to suffer for them until death and including death. In all of these it is shown the cross, but the sufferance, the repentance, the unpassable insufficiencies, they become an entrance in the infinity of the God’s love, when we endure them as a surrender offered to Him. Through the cross endures as willing surrender to the Father, Christ has entered the Paradise of the divine infinity. The Paradise was closed to our proto-parents by the will of finding they satisfaction in the nature’s exuberance reckoned as infinite, by imagining that they would infinitely advance in tasting the nature. But the nature was proven as limit to them and, in the end, as cause for death. Through the wood of the cross, seen and received in its painful and limitative draught, Christ has again entered, as man, the paradisiacal infinity of God's love, and through the same cross willingly accepted, as surrender to God, we all enter at Him." (Stăniloae 2005: 181-182)

"The icon has this paradoxical character: through the icon's circumscribing we enter the transparent infinity of Christ God, with the sight of our faith. But the man can lock himself up in circumscribing through the painted images too, when he wants to represent through those images only the nature or the face of the immanent man, reckoned as infinite (the western paintings). But the Byzantine icon, by having associated to it the cross of the restraint, of the holiness, of the thinness, and of the transparency of the human, it becomes gate towards the non-circumscribing of the heavens, or towards the godlike infinity." (Stăniloae 2005: 182)

"The paradoxical, antinomic, character of the Person of Christ, God and man in the same time, human limit and divine non-circumscribing, it implies the antinomic character of His icon too. By calling His Person as circumscribed, the contrary isn't excluded, but on the opposite, it is presupposed: likewise, the inverse. In the same way, the icon, by indicating us Christ as circumscribed, it doesn't exclude His non-circumscribing, but a contrary it suggests it to us, as composing the other side of His, like the man's image, though representing only the man's body, it doesn't imply a separation of the man's body from his soul. The Occidental has reached, by and large, to reject the icons, due to the reaction to the paintings locked up in the man's immanence, because those paintings no longer united – as the icon does – the image with the holiness, and with the cross understood as brake to the inferior, purely earthly impulses, so that they no longer knew the open icon, as circumscribing of the uncircumscribed God." (Stăniloae 2005: 182)

"If one rejects the icon of Christ on the reason that by representing in icon only His humanity, it isn't represented also His divine hypostasis, that we will owe to reject also His word from Gospel as being rendered, as appearing as belonging to His humanity only, and not as belonging to the godhead or to His Hypostasis Himself." (Stăniloae 2005: 183)

"Of course, by being seen and by being represented through the human nature the divine Hypostasis Himself, this One can be "seen" in a certain manner. That is a sign that doesn't exclude the faith, as we've said before, but it implies the faith, as also the "seeing" by Apostles of the godhead of Christ through His humanity it implied their faith too. Namely, as the Apostles saw, through His deeds and through a certain spiritual power emanating out of Him, that He wasn't only man but He was also God, though His godhead was hidden, but still transparent through those manifestations, likewise the believers see through the same deeds represented in icon, that the One represented in icon He isn't a simple human hypostasis, but He is the divine-human Hypostasis, though, His godhead as being cannot be seen." (Stăniloae 2005: 183)

"Neither in Christ existence on earth was His godhead seen as essence. But neither can one deduce from that that Christ was only man. Although He was seen only in His humanity, in what regards the essence (besides, the idea that one could ever see the divine essence in an analogue mode which the created - visible - essences are seen in, it is a naïve conception and it must be left aside), the seen One was the unique divine-human Hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2005: 184)

"The mystery of the Christ's icon consists of the fact that through a few lines one can represent the human face and as such the face of Christ as face of God-the Word. The icon's mystery is a mystery which is prolonged in the mystery of His face, by representing through the materialized rationality of combining some lines and colors, the materialized rationality as life of the real thing, or of the seen person, the supreme materialization of the conscious rationality." (Stăniloae 2005: 185)

"Out of the fact that Christ is a Person in two natures, it doesn't result that he cannot be represented through one of His natures, namely through His human nature." (Stăniloae 2005: 186)

"The two natures in Christ and their features, with the rationality represented by them, they aren't only contrary to one another, but they are also in a certain kinship, the human nature being created in the image of the godlike nature. And thy this the two natures are connected and they can represent the same Hypostasis, one as His own nature and the other one as nature created by Him in His nature, as materialized rationality having its origin in Him. The contrary between the two natures is reduced only to the fact that one is created, and therefore known with the senses, and the other one is uncreated and unknown with the senses." (Stăniloae 2005: 186)

"If the angel and the soul, though not having a body, they are circumscribed, why isn't circumscribed and won't be painted Christ, the One Who embodied Himself and Who has taken human face and Who made Himself like us in all the things, except the sin? If He hadn't been circumscribed according to His body, He wouldn't have been delimited spatially, He wouldn't have been placed to sleep in the manger, He wouldn't have been circumcised, baptized, crucified, and He wouldn't have resurrected, and we wouldn't have been saved." (Stăniloae 2005: 186-190)

"The icon belongs to another order than to the reality created by God. Through icon we intervene in reality not in order to produce another reality equally real to that one, but in order to remember the reality and to highlight for us the icon's openness towards the superior order of the spirit. Like the knowledge isn't the reality itself, but it is the reflection of the reality within us and the knowledge's openness through us and for us, likewise the icon is the materialized expression of our knowledge about the real prototype. The icon doesn't belong to the ontological order, but it belongs to the gnoseological order. But by this the icon is connected to the ontological order, highlighting it. We form on ourselves through knowledge and memory too. Without these we couldn't make contact with the reality on the level of our conscience. Christ wouldn't fully work upon us, by transforming us towards holiness, without icon, without this memory and openness through icon of the godhead and of His humanity sanctified through icon. This is shown by the example of the Christian Occident. The contact with Christ would have been, besides that, less frequent and less efficient without icon." (Stăniloae 2005: 190)

"The icons' defenders, for being overwhelmed by the greatness of the image of Master of God, they insisted more upon the difference between the two images. But they affirmed, though, that the servant image is transparent to the Master's image. But they didn't insist upon this fact. That's why they owe to insist in the future upon the capacity of the servant image to be transparent to the Master's image. This is a requirement brought by the deeper self-awareness of the today's man. Bulgakov deserves the credit for drawing the attention upon this necessity. But he went too far. That's why, being this problem ascertained, we will have to keep an equilibrium in answering it. Besides, while the theologians, defenders of the icons, insisted less in their doctrine upon the transparency of the human to the godlike, in Christ, the Byzantine icons painters and the Orthodox worshippers, they gave a living expression to this fact. The icons painter solved this by their art. This is for the Byzantine icon represents the transparency of the divine non-circumscribed through the circumscribed human face. And by this they discovered the depth of the human's dimension and his indefinite beauty in God. By this, it was accomplished a certain unity of the images without abolishing their difference." (Stăniloae 2005:195)

"The icons defenders, by making of the circumscribing of Christ according His humanity, namely of the possibility of representing His own Hypostasis in icon, a proof of the hypostatical union, the iconoclasts tried to contest even the circumscribing of the human nature of Christ. As argument for this non-circumscribing of the Savior's human nature they brought the argument that Christ didn't have an individual human nature, but He has the universal human nature. By rejecting this theory, the icons' defenders brought a clarification to the definition from Chalcedon. They founded themselves on Saint Basil the Great who said that the nature doesn't exist in its non-circumscribed generality, but only determined in an individual person.” (Stăniloae 2005:196)

“The iconoclasts, by affirming against the icons’ defenders, that the icon doesn’t represent not even the human nature of Christ, they were dominated by the wrong conception of an abstract mode of considering the natures of Christ. They reckoned that the natures can be ascertained in a self-existence in Christ, and not in hypostasis, and therefore the icon too, it should represent the humanity in its abstract generality. And, because of not being the icon able to do that, because the universal humanity isn’t circumscribed, the icon doesn’t represent even the humanity in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005:196)

“Answering to iconoclasts, Saint Theodore the Studite affirmed that the natures do not exist in an abstract manner and separately in Christ, and that’s why the icon cannot represent even the human nature considered in itself, even less can do that regarding the godlike nature. The icon represents the human nature determined in the concrete hypostasis of Jesus Christ Who has given it certain individual characteristics and who committed through it certain deeds, which differ Him from any other man. From here comes that, if the human nature of Christ it presents its individual features, if it is individually determined, this will be due to the fact that it is being borne by a certain hypostasis and so, that hypostasis Himself is represented in icon through His individual human nature. And while the hypostasis bearing it and hypostatically configuring it in a unique way, it is a godlike Hypostasis, that Hypostasis Himself is represented through it. The icon, by representing the concrete man Christ, namely not an abstract and self-standing humanity, but the hypostatized humanity, consequently organized by the Word of God, it represents the Word of God, Himself, as become man.” (Stăniloae 2005:196-197)

“The iconoclasts didn’t admit the kenosis of the Word. They admitted the embodiment of the Word only as an elevation of the human nature to His level, and not as His descent to the human nature. Namely, they didn’t admit an elevation of the man as concrete man. Their thesis about the universal and non-circumscribed character of the Christ’s human nature it is a Monophysites’ thesis. This is the essential Christological signification of the Church’s struggle for icons. Like the Hypostasis of the Word impropriated our passions and our death, without becoming suffering and mortal according to His godlike nature, likewise He impropriated His individualization as man and His circumscribing. By giving individual character to the assumed human nature, He gave Himself such characteristics. And this is for He is a distinct Person also as God, and He isn’t nature. The iconoclasts didn’t admit this; they reckoned that admitting individual characteristics for the human nature of Christ, it means introducing in Him a human hypostasis differing from the divine hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2005: 202-203)

“The Christological dogma from Chalcedon, according to which the Son of God Himself formed to Himself a real humanity, and He maintained His humanity, He affirmed it, and He consummated it, it imposes that the one hypostasis of Christ to the circumscribed, not according to His godhead which hasn’t been ever seen by any man, but according to His humanity contemplated in Him as in an individual. Otherwise, what could have been the Mediator like, between God and man, the One Who hadn’t had the personal features of the two nature which He is composed of?” (Stăniloae 2005: 204)

“Representing Christ according to the hypostatized humanity of the Word and in the Word, it means representing Him on the moments and in the acts of His life on earth, which distinguish Him from all the other people, it means representing Him in the acts exclusively committed by this divine Hypostasis through the humanity assumed by Him, acts which couldn’t have been done by any other man who is only a man. And in these acts, it is shown His own body imprinted by them in a special manner: a body born out of a Virgin, a transfigured body, and a resurrected body. Representing such a body capable of such deeds, or capable of being environment for such deeds, it means representing the embodied Son of God, and it doesn’t mean representing a separate human nature. And this representation is possible, despite not being one with the living, substantial presence of Christ in icon.” (Stăniloae 2005: 204-205)

“In their intention of denying what they should recognize, unwillingly, the iconoclasts annulled the Revelation of the Son of God withing world, and they dug an insurmountable precipice between Him and the seen world. One could, rightly so, answer them: but then no word uttered by Christ it doesn’t belong to the Son of God, because it is, at its turn, circumscribed, as sound, through the human bodily organs which the word is uttered with; and so, through the word, the divine hypostasis is circumscribed too. It remains an incontestable mystery the fact of the resonance or of the irradiation of the non-circumscribed through the circumscribed, on one hand being circumscribed, while on the other hand it remains non-circumscribed, as an infinite reserve of communication.” (Stăniloae 2005: 206)

“The idol of the carved image, by being always place by the Holy Scripture in connection with the contrived deities (products of the lie, of the inexistence), while the image in a good sense – or the icon – it is always place in connection with the sole and truly existing God, it shows us just by this, that the idol or the carved image of the deities it is the product of a pantheistic conception, according to which the world is the ultimate reality.

According to this conception, there is not God differing from the world, or transcendent to the world, but the world is one with the divinity, and the world has the quality as ultimate cause of all the things. Of course, the conception about world as ultimate reality with divine character isn't identical to the modern conception about the world, which denies the world any mysterious character. The world, in the pagan, pantheistic religions, it preserves some mysterious attributes, some nature's forces being dressed up in some divine, sacred attributes." (Stăniloae 2005: 216-217)

"The icon is the sign of the transcendent reality of God, a reality above nature. The icon expresses the belief that Deus est super natura. The icon helps the worshipper to accomplish the act of a transcendence of the nature. At the basis of the icon, it stays the belief in a plan existing above nature, and the will of crossing over nature, of entering the connection with the divine transcendence. The icon doesn't identify the nature's plan to the divine plan, but the icon totally differs them from one another. The worshipping brought to the icon it "passes" (metabaine) to the prototype painted in that icon. This isn't a "passing" from the seen idol, to a seen living force of the seen nature, but it is a passing from the seen plan to the unseen plan, from the nature's plane – of the created world – to the plan from above nature." (Stăniloae 2005: 222)

"The icon's prototype doesn't belong to the plan of the natural experience of the worshipper, but it belongs to the plan transcendent to the nature perceived through senses. The icon represents the godlike reality, which is a spiritual reality. The icon requests the worshipper to refer himself to the godlike prototype, or to the Saint full of: transcendent, untold, mysterious, and not perceivable through senses godhead. The icon is a perceivable window of the world towards what is above world, while the idol is a wall locking us in this world from here. The idol, by being fabricated out of the same nature's substance of the material nature, it can sometimes be identified to the deity himself, while the icon, by representing a spiritual reality, it cannot be identified to the reality it represents." (Stăniloae 2005: 222)

"The icon, by not being an image of the nature's perceivable forces, it uses - for suggesting the spiritual God Who is transcendent to nature, and to suggest as well His presence descended to us – not any image, but the human image. But in icon the man's image is used according to the man's spirit purified of passions, and not according to the man's body tending to nature, towards passions." (Stăniloae 2005: 223)

"The icon has a reason for its existence, in the Holy Scripture, for there is said that the man has been created in the image of God." (Stăniloae 2005: 223)

“At the basis of the icon it stays, firstly, another conception than the conception about man, which stays at the basis of the idol. It is a conception seeing the man in relation with the God from above nature, the truly infinite God, for from God it comes through man a continuous novelty within nature, and God doesn’t let either the nature or the man locked up in their monotonous repetition. Between the idea that the nature is eternal and the idea that the nature is capable of an infinite progress, there is an acute contradiction. If the nature had been from ever, than the nature would have had to reach, from eternity, the progress levels, and if the nature hasn’t reached either today the higher levels, it won’t reach them even in the future. The nature moves inside the same levels. The idol, as image of this nature, it doesn’t open, either, horizons towards the infinite.” (Stăniloae 2005: 223-224)

“The icon’s characteristics are:

1. Being image of the transcendence of God, the icon helps us transcending the finite of the image towards the God’s infinity.

Even the man’s image always urges us to transcend it. When looking at the man’s eyes not from a distance that allows us seeing not only their biological composition but also the man’s sight, we ascertain that the man’s sight is beyond biological. Each man’s sight is different, and each man’s sight differs on any moment. The man’s sight is something, on one hand definite, and on the other hand indefinable.

The less the man is addicted to the worldly things, the more we see in his sight something that transcends not only the biological plan to a plan of the spirit’s intentions directed towards the fuller or meaning things, and towards the most beautiful things from the world, but also this plan to a plan from beyond the seen world. In the man’s sight burns of a thinking directed towards a transcendent plan of the world. By looking at the eyes of a dispassionate man we feel that we sink in a spiritual reality from beyond those eyes. In such a case the attention doesn’t focus towards the bodily organism, as in case of an idol, but it focuses on the spiritual indefinite.

2. This tendency is characteristic to the human remained at his height. In this is manifested the man’s quality as transparent, as mirror of the transcendence. But this quality of the human, that was weakened by own will or by the sin which separates the man from God, it has been restored by Christ Who has assumed the human in the Hypostasis of the Son of God. That’s why, the fullest icon of God is that of Christ.

Being our humanity assumed by Himself the Son of God, the supreme Light and the overwhelming richness of meaning, which He is Hypostasis to, by His nature and from eternity, the whole this light and overwhelming richness of meanings must have been filling up His eyes. He Who is the model of the human as image of God, he has restored thus, and He has elevated to the supreme degree the quality of the human as full image of God.

The Apostles looking at His eyes, they were seeing this supreme light, though in a kenotic form, accessible to them, the supreme form of human gentleness and understanding. The All-Clean Mother saw, at Her turn, in His eyes, with Her understanding and feeling as mother, the deep mystery of light from His eyes. They didn't see in this infinity from Christ's eyes a certain inexpressive force of the nature, but they saw full of sense Person's infinity, superior to nature. They saw in His eyes the ultimate cause of all the things, but also differing from all things, crosses by a deep loving intention of the Person. They saw in His eyes each thing in its ultimate origin, but in a conscious, intentional, spiritual deep, and not as in a still indefinite nature's force. They saw in the human eyes of Christ a sight that made proven the act of the supreme transcending of His towards his own infinity as Person, which just by that was transparent to His Mother and to His Apostles, without they being able to express it.

And if the words of Christ, rendered in writing, they are such a sonorous icon of His life as divine-human Person, or of His godlike infinity, in human form, why wouldn't be the painted image of His human face, the icon of His godlike infinity as Person?

Of course, the craftsmanship of the icons' painters they make the Jesus's face as seen expression of His spirit, a mirror of His Godhead bearer of His human spirit. There are a series of objective and unique signs of Jesus which make the worshippers thinking to do, regarding His icon, the act of transcending towards His Godhead. But there is necessary our thinking too, in order to see in a person's photography, the transcending act live by that person. The seeing of the image and the act of transcending, they are done concomitantly. They aren't separated, as it isn't separated either the seen image of a person from his unseen life.

When we see in icon the Little Child born in the manger from Bethlehem – a fact characteristic to the Person of Christ, when we see the only Child born out of Virgin, we see together with these the Son of Man born as man, just by the fact that he commits this act by overcoming the nature's order, as the pagan deities cannot do. Just by this we transcend in the born in manger Child's icon, His seen humanity, to His unseen Godhead.

Likewise, when we see Christ crucified, or bringing Himself as sacrifice to the Father for our salvation, in an act of total transcending on Himself as man, but when we see Him, in the same time, as resurrected, we transcend from the seen image to God Who defeats the death, though He received the death in Himself, for we see in Himself as being done the crossing from the man receiving the death, as subjected to death, to a God defeating the death, or the great weakness of the nature, as the deities and the idols weren't able to do. Because to those ones there isn't about the resurrection of the Person Who transcends the nature, but it is about a process (myth) of the nature, which crosses from the melting phase to that of apparition of its individual forms.

In all Jesus's icons we see God free of all the nature's servitudes, we see God truly free of all the nature's chains, superior to them, willingly accepting some descents for our sake, in order to elevate us for eternity at the height of His glory and happiness. And by it is satisfied our aspiration and our thinking, which cannot reckon the nature that is enslaved to the repetition's laws and locked up in its poor relativity, as being the supreme reality, and it realizes that above this slave and helpless nature, there must be a form of superior reality, free of any slavery, which the inferior, relative, and helpless nature to depend on.

Thus, we do not remain with our worshipping either to the relative matter, which is modest slave to icon, nor to a purely human, worldly mode, submitted, at its turn, to perishability and corruption, so that we do not make of those ones some idols, by reckoning them as the supreme reality, but we transcend with our thinking and with our worshipping from the icon's matter at the Embodied Christ God and Resurrected in His humanity for ever and ever; we transcend to the One Who is above everything, at the One Who is the free and absolutely sovereign source of the almighty life which this freedom depends on, at the One Who from this freedom and almightiness He deigned to take human body, in order to come closer to us, in order to enter the communion with us, and in order to remain in this community with us forever and ever.

And the spiritual character of this free and superior to nature almightiness, it is shown in the fact that it is manifested not in the physical size, of the assumed image, therefore neither in huge statues, for these ones deviate the thinking to the physical power, but in a thin, delicate, complex humanity, flooded with the infinite and untold depths of the spirit and of the spirit's countless meanings.

The Son of God manifests Himself more adequately, in His spirituality, through the human image fragile as physical dimensions, but more capable - through His eyes, through His words, through His gestures, through His gentleness - to be a window and a communicating vessel of the spiritual infinity.

(...)

This type of thinking has remained mistrustful the icon since the Catholicism from the beginning of the scholastics, a fact that has led to totally rejecting the icon in Reformation and in all its denominations. Everything that can be seen it is to this thinking only creation separated from God, namely not being able to serve as transparent and as communicating filter of the divine transcendence. While to paganism the nature itself is God, to the Christian Occident the nature is condemned to a full separation from God. In both of these we have the same lack of encounter with God Who is transcendent through creation.

The Christian East has reconciled the transcendence of God to His communication through the seen things it hasn't closed either the transcendence or the image in itself. That's why the Occidental Christendom hasn't seen either the human face in its capacity of being transparent, of being icon to God, and they reckoned the human face as only capable of being an idol. Through this, the Occident has almost annulled, in the same time with the mystery of the seen aspect of the reality, also the mystery of the creation by and large, and, with this, they almost annulled the full justification of the Embodiment of Christ. The Occident no longer saw in the creation itself a premise of the Embodiment, as the Eastern Fathers did, but the Occident gave a purely juridical justification to the Embodiment. The Son of God has embodied Himself, according to the Occidental thinking, only in order to bring through cross the satisfying of the honor of God, offended by man, and not in order to elevate the human nature by filling it up with godhead for eternity.

3. If Christ has reestablished the human face in its capacity of being an image transparent to God, then all the ones attaching themselves to Him by faith and through a total imitation, by being filled up with His godlike infinity, namely by becoming saints, they will make this infinity to be seen through their faces, and therefore through their icons too. If in all the saint there is Christ with His infinite Godhead, with His deified humanity, He will be reflected in their icons too. "Wonderful is God amongst His saints". Through the icon of each saint, we see Christ, or His deified humanity, without identifying the saint, as person, to Christ. Christ can be seen imprinted in all His saints, but in their personal behavior. In front of the icon of each saint we commit the act of transcending not only to the painted saint, but also to Christ Who is imprinted in that saint.

So, this doesn't mean a confounding of the Saint to the Person of Christ, neither of their icons to the icon of Christ. This is for the person isn't annulled in the Christian faith. Once God is Person, or a Trinity of Persons, neither the human persons are confounded to God or amongst them. On the opposite, the fuller is a human person with Christ, as Person, the more accomplished that person is. By Embodying Himself, Christ hasn't become a man confounded to all people, but He has remained a central Person, and profoundly distinct, and he promotes each man as person - in the assembly of the ones who love Him - in Himself.

A mother doesn't confound her children when embracing them, but the more she loves them, the more she distinguished them, by referring each one of them to the others, by loving each of them for his specificity, in comparison to the others' specificity.

The God's infinity isn't a uniform ocean, but it lightens out of the Three Godlike Persons, and it irradiated within world through the lights represented by the special human consciences. It is always differently reflected in the thinking and clean eyes of each human person. The godlike infinite takes in account the form of the human persons which it dwells into, for it has in itself the form of the Persons. That's why the Godhead assumes the human in a hypostasis, in a Person, in order to appear as man too, as a Person, irradiating through Himself the godlike infinity, without annulling the Person and without overwhelming the Person with its light.

The Saints show in themselves the infinity of God imprinted in their will and feeling as persons, in their tension, as persons, towards an endless consummation. This is shown in their icons too, especially as a tension towards the infinite filiation into the Holy Ghost, which implies the infinite Father too. This is shown also by the Saints' writings: ascetic, contemplative, and bearer of personal seal, as for instance The Ladder. We hear some readers saying: "But these states cannot be reached by anybody". Although, they show the own possibilities as open towards infinite, different in each man united with Christ, and some of the Saints actualized these possibilities in a great measure, and they are actualizing them today too, making thus the infinite even more open. The Saints belong to this type of Icarus. And the icons represent the saints. The Saint has reached a maximum imprinting of Christ within them, each one in his own way, but this tension is endless.

The fact that the infinity of the godlike consummation from Christ and from the Saints which He has imprinted Himself dynamically into, and forever, it is characteristic both to Him and to them, as to distinct persons, being noticeable in the Saints as in those who has impropriated the consummation, and who consciously and voluntarily live in it, each one in his own mode, and this makes the icon to become means of communication between the embodied Word of God and His saints who are full of His godhead, and us. But in order to do that it is necessary that the icon to receive the name of Jesus or of a Saint and to the sanctified or dressed up in the power of the Holy Ghost, by calling Him upon the icon.

The name of Christ, or of a saint, borne by icon, and the power of the Holy Ghost descended in that icon, they make the worshipper to address himself, through the name of the icon, to the Person represented by that icon, and by this and by the power of the Holy Ghost, that worshipper is placed in connection with the Person represented in that icon. Uttering the name of Christ makes the worshipper to remember "His embodiment and all His wonders" (the religious service for sanctifying the icon). And by this, the worshipper is placed in connection with the Person Himself Who is painted in that icon, through the Holy Ghost Whose power irradiates out of that icon. The name expresses, concentratedly, the Person; the name invokes the Person Who bears that name to send His work where His name is mentioned, especially for the Holy Ghost Himself, called upon that icon, He is a working power which unites with the Person's work. The name is tied to Person more than it is the shadow tied to the body. In name is distinguished, it is expressed, and it is recognized a certain person with his own deeds, with the whole that person's life lived uniquely, with the whole that person's specificity. And each Saint bears Christ imprinted and dynamically live in him, in his person's own mode, according to his natural features, and he manifests Christ's power in an own mode, open to Christ's power and set in work in an own mode. In each Saint we see Christ in another mode of efficiency, as fulfilling another virtuality included in His godlike infinity and in His endless human complexity. We address ourselves to the saint as to a different person, but by knowing and by feeling in everything the saint has achieved and in everything which he can help us with, that there is working the Christ's power tarrying within that Saint and highlighted by the Saint, through his prayers addressed to Christ and by the Saint's attachment to Christ. That's why, when we ask the Saint to help us, we ask him for helping us through his prayers addressed to Christ, prayer which we know about that they will be listened to, for the Saint's intimate union with Christ, and due to the Christ's power working within that Saint. Thus, by asking the Saint's help through his prayers addressed to Christ for us, we reckon Christ as the ultimate source of the help received by us. And that's why we raise all the glory and all our thanks to Christ, for the help we have received through the Saint.

But we do not disregard either the person of the Saint, neither we reckon as useless the calling of that Saint's name. This is for Christ is actually the One helping us, the One Who is united with the Saint, as the One Who is impressed by the Saint's love for us, the Saint being our brother into humanity. If Christ can communicate with us through His creatures, as His gifts, what will He despise like, communicating with us, through His conscious and voluntary creatures, what will Him be able like to not set in work our fellow humans as gifts, namely as active gifts, and not passive, towards us? God established each of us to bear a name, and to hear and to answer when we hear our name, just for making us to willingly value one another as reciprocal gifts, as He has created us. That's why Christ isn't jealous, when we call the name of a Saint or of one of our brothers, in order that to help us, as he isn't jealous either when we ask for help and when we help one another, here on earth, on the condition of having the conscience that God has created us and God makes us able to be of help to one another.

Calling the Saint's name in front of his icon, we transcend that icon and we set ourselves in connection with the person of the one we call, but also in connection with Christ; the saint notices the attention that we pay to him, the fact that we trust his help, and he answer that with his attention. Through the name which we call somebody with, we set in movement the person himself of the called one, in order to fulfill what we are asking him for.

Through the name "Jesus Christ", addressed in front of Jesus Christ's icon, we transcend the icon's matter and we set ourselves in connection with Christ's Person and we ask for His mercy to pay attention to us. But this transcending is occasion to us by the icon. Since the Son of God has made Himself as one of us, and since He has taken a distinctive name like we have, He has submitted Himself to the same connection tying the people through their name, and in such a manner that the called One answers to the one who call Him. That's why, in front of the icon not only takes place a real transcending from us to Christ, but there takes place too, a real descent of His to us who are calling Him. The icon's sanctification isn't but the first and the most intensive calling of the name of Christ or of His Ghost, upon His image painted in that icon; it is the calling of Christ as distinct Person, or of Christ dwelling in His Saints, in the name of the Church, or by the Church as collective and full of Him, body of Christ. As such, the sanctification places Christ or His Ghost, or the Saint filled up with Christ and with Christ's Ghost, in a permanent connection with the sanctified icon. Through sanctification it is made out of icon a place where Christ or the Saint is usually called and where They renew their coming, their presence, and their work.

4. Christ, or the Saints, or Christ and the Saints: They aren't called in front of their icons, in order to help the worshippers against other people, as the deities are called in front of the idols, as images of the nature opposes to one another, according to the pagan conception that everything is done in nature through an everybody's war against everybody. We've seen that all the Saints help us through their prayer addressed to the same all-loving and all-upholding Christ Who transcendent to the nature's forces, which the sin has introduced within, the war of the evil against the good. The Saints too, they overcome the war from within themselves and by defeating the evil and by placing themselves exclusively in the service of the good's God. In the infinite Christ and in His all-good godhead, there concentrate in their tension all the ones who want to serve Him, and there are concentrates all the Saints, who are united not only with Christ but also with one another, united not in a war considered as "father of all the things", but they are unites in love. The Christendom isn't content with a peace maintained through an equilibrium amongst contrary forces, but it tends towards the peace of the love, to the peace which the egotisms do not uphold each other into, in a forced equilibrium, but in a peace which the egotism is deserted by everybody, in a reciprocal self-giving.

(...)

Only the limited things are in a war, in order to snatch more life from one another. In the infinite God, there is no war, without this meaning that God is simply essence and not communion of Persons. But God of the love helps all the things to exceed their limitation, not by fighting, but by communion with Him and amongst themselves, by filling all of them up with His infinity. Thus, at the end, there will totally cease the divisions which still manifest consequently to the sin.

(...)

5. In Christ, and in Saints in Who He dwells, there reigns the Good. This is for only where the good is, there is also the true harmony, lacking any tension, as felt happiness. Only in good everybody can unite in harmony.

Only in good everybody can rejoice of infinity, or of the lack of division and of the absence of the fight amongst the limited parts. In Christ, in His life and teaching, as in the icons representing Him, we see only the good. And we see the Saints as being in the same good, in their lives and in their icons. By this, the saints and their icons help us to transcend the nature with its fight amongst the finite parts, as it is when divinized, in the deities symbolizing it, and in idols.

(...)

The icons show us what the Saints' lives was like, a continuous and total transcending of the subjected to death and to passions human, towards the godlike, a continuous self-giving and self-sacrificing, out of the power and in the example of Christ." (Stăniloae 2005: 224-234)

"The Byzantine iconography remains faithful to history, namely to the principle that the icon has become possible due to the embodiment of the Son of God. But the icon doesn't empty the historical Christ and the saints as historical persons, of the spiritual presence of God or of the godlike powers from withing saints, a presence that is in a certain measure noticeable and lived." (Stăniloae 2005: 237)

"The Byzantine churchly painting, unlike the Occidental style churchly painting, it distinguished itself through its rich theological content and through the feeling it inspired to you like placing you in connection with the godlike transcendence, present through the uncreated energies in all the images of Christ and of the Saints. The byzantine painting represents, on one hand, the savior deeds and events of Christ since His birth to His Resurrection, and on the other hand, it represents a Christ Who not only belongs to the past, but Who still continues to be present and working through his savior acts did in the past. "Christ was yesterday and He is today: the same". But He is the same present within us through His savior deeds, which are imprinted in us and which become as ours, making us to be born and to grow up with Him to a new life, a life common with His life, to crucify within ourselves the former man out of the power of Christ's crucifixion, and to resurrect with Him. That's why is promised in Apocalypse the mastery upon the evil ghosts not to the ones who only know His words, but to the ones who commit His deeds. "And to the one who gains the victory and who keeps My deeds until the end, I will give Him mastery upon nations" (2: 26)." (Stăniloae 2005: 237)

"The icons surrounding the believers within Church, they have a liturgical character and purpose, or their content serves to preparing for the Eucharistic Impartation. The whole cosmos concentrates around Eucharist." (Stăniloae 2005: 237)

Idol

“In the Old Testament there were no icons of God, but only symbols: the Pascal Lamb, the Aaron’s staff, the holy tent, the ark of the covenant etc. While admitting the symbol, the Old Testament forbade the idols (Exod. 20: 4; Deut. 5: 12-19). What the difference between the symbol admitted in the Old Testament and the forbidden idol is? The Symbol represented visibly a certain feature of God, for the reason that the symbol was created and the whole creation is a symbol of God. But some creatures indicate by God Himself they have received in the Old Testament, through prayers, a special power from Him and, therefore, a role of accentuated symbol. But both towards the general symbol represented by any creature and towards the special symbol indicated by God and consecrated through prayers, God remained different from them and above them. Unlike the symbol, the idol was a piece of nature regarded as such as God, in a pantheistic sense. This is the reason why the Old Testament forbade the idol and it recommended the symbol. Through idol the people wouldn’t have any longer discerned God from the world; through symbol, the people remained in connection with God differing from the world, placing the world in a dependency on Him through a relation with Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 227)

“Saint Gregory of Nyssa considered that any concept or definite image, when taken as God, it is causing spiritual death also by the fact that it stops the mind’s desire of tending always higher in order to get increasingly closer to God. The divine being is above anything that can be known in a definite manner, and this is one more reason why it upholds the life as tension, as spiritual progress in man.” (Stăniloae 1992: 295)

“The man mustn’t confound his images either to his body or to the spiritual reality itself. Namely, the man mustn’t transpose upon the spirit the images’ side as object. Even much less must the man transpose upon the divine subject the images’ side as object - when the man does that, there is being born the idol, or the myth. In this sense, any image can become a myth, either for having the character of a historical event, or by being borrowed from nature. Even the Revelation’s images may become myths in such a case.” (Stăniloae 2005: 41)

“The Patriarch Nicephorus the Confessor, he firstly discerned between idol and symbol, by showing that the Christians used the seen things in relation with God, not only the pagans, but at the pagans, the seen things, which were used as religious objects “are liar and full of wandering”, whilst ours are true.” (Stăniloae 2005: 75)

“There was another argument used by the icons’ defenders against the mosaic interdiction of making a carved image, which the adversaries of the icons started arguing from. They draw the attention especially upon the fact that even the Old Testament, forbade the idol, but it still admitted the symbol." (Stăniloae 2005: 83)

"The idol, on the opposite, it doesn't indicate any transcendence. When, though, the idol indicates something differing from itself, that something is immanent too. The idol doesn't elevate the spirit to a transcendence, but, a contrary, it chains the spirit to the seen things. The idol is the expression of an attitude and of a pantheistic spiritual conception, which doesn't admit a reality transcending the immanent things and which doesn't live the relating to transcendence. The idolater doesn't know about a God Who is transcendent to the immanent reality, because of considering the immanent reality as the divinity itself. The idol is an image that has lost its function of image of the divinity, and it ties the spirit to the immanent reality, as ultimate and absolute reality, as God." (Stăniloae 2005: 87)

"The idolater doesn't necessarily reckon the image itself as divinity; this is being done only by the simpler man. The educated idolater considers the image only as a dwelling place, or as "symbol" of a natural force, which is invested with the attributes of the divine. Anyway, both of them worship the creation instead of God. The force which even the most educated idolater worships to, it has nothing transcendent, despite being attributed a certain infinity to it." (Stăniloae 2005: 87)

"Of course, in the nature's forces are mixed demonic forces too, and these last ones make the nature's forces more attractive to the idolater. That's why the icons' defenders call as worshipping the idols any worshipping brought to creatures, as also worshipping brought to demons. Because of attributing a divine character to the nature's forces, namely the worshipped gods do not exist, the idolaters are considered as the ones serving "to the inexistent ones". But only the ones from the Old Testament and the Christians reached this knowledge. The pagans didn't realize their wandering." (Stăniloae 2005: 88)

"Just because the idol symbolizes immanent forces, demonically exaggerated, in connection with them are associated the myths personifying those forces, and it apotheosizes the passionate tendencies. Their cult is tied to these myths, and it animates those passions amongst people too. This thing is highlighted by the icons' defenders." (Stăniloae 2005: 88)

"The idol belongs to the sphere of the general symbol, by the fact that it almost directs the attention to a reality differing from the idol, but it differs from the symbol in narrow sense – Mosaic and Christian –, by the fact that the reality it indicates it is from the immanent world. On the other hand, the idol isn't identical to the lay symbols, because of having too, a religious character as the Mosaic and the Christian symbols. That's why the idol upholds a in cult a religious feeling too. By uniting what makes it similar to the lay symbols and what makes it different from them, we can say that the idol is the fruit of a religiousness divinizing forces or parts of the nature, by dressing them up in an absolute religious aura. That's why, between idol and the reality which the idol directs to, it is a bigger resemblance than between the Mosaic or the Christian symbol and the divine reality. And often, the idol even is a part of the reality reckoned as divine, and therefore the worshipping limits to the idol itself. Unlike any idolater, the Christians worship the true God, and not the creation. But as God is the God of everything, the Christians contemplate Him through the seen things, but beyond things, as differing from them. And God, by attracting the man towards Himself, he elevates the man's aspirations above his passions which are upheld and stimulated by nature." (Stăniloae 2005: 88-89)

"As the idol, as pantheistic religious symbol, it is something restricted, on one hand, and on the other hand is correlative to the worshipping of the whole world, likewise the Christian symbol is, on one hand, something restricted, and on the other hand it is correlative to considering the entire world as a symbol of the divine transcendence. In idolatry is being worshipped the world itself, and that's why is worshipped the idol too, as part or as "symbol" of the world; in Christendom, the whole world is considered as creation, and symbol of the divine transcendence, and that's why the religious object too, it is considered as symbol of this transcendence. Like the idol, likewise the Christian symbol involves a certain vision upon world, by and large." (Stăniloae 2005: 89)

"The Christian symbol it is the expression of the vision distinguishing the world from God and, in the same time, tying the world to God, as a creature of God and as His instrument. A contrary, the idol is the expression of a vision considering the world itself as being the divinity." (Stăniloae 2005: 93)

"While symbolizing some things through others, in the natural frame of the world, it is the act that presided, associated to a religious feeling, the creation of the idols in the restricted sense of the word, seeing this thing as a symbol in itself (or as cypher) it necessarily implied a man's relating to what is above rationality, above nature, and above world. Of course, in the man's report with the idol too, it is involved an affective element. But this affectivity isn't supra-rational, as it is the existential report between man and symbol, but it is sub-rational, or extra-rational. The man's report with the idol has a religious character too. But this still doesn't mean a living of the transcendence through idol. In idol the man sees and he feels, as concentrated, on the basis of the natural symbolizing, the meaning or the presence of one or of several natural forces of the world. In symbol, though, the man lives the presence of other forces than the natural forces, which can be had by the symbolizing environment regarded in itself. In idol, for instance, the man sees and he adores the force of the natural love between sexes, while in the connection between bridegroom and bride, as symbol of the relating of the transcendence to creature, the man wants to express the love from above nature, of God. The idol expresses the immanent forces of the nature, while the symbol expresses the forces of the spiritual transcendence.” (Stăniloae 2005: 99)

“Having at its basis a pantheistic conception, the idol as image of the forces and of the parts of the world identified to God, it has the following characteristics:

1. It is an image of a force of the nature, concretized in one of its components or symbolized through a human force, or close to the human one (half-human, half-animal). The idol is an image of the son which the warmth is concretized in, the warmth upholding the universal life; it is an image of the moon, which the light of the night is concretized in; it is an image of the bull and of the cow, which the force of reproducing the life moves within. To the shapeless forces of the nature, the pantheistic religions used people, whom they saw the nature’s forces symbolized in, and whom they represented in statues. It was shown in this that the man’s feeling is a higher embodiment of the nature’s forces, for they are reckoned in their manifestation of conscience, through the man too is moving involuntarily through nature. At Greeks and Romans these human embodiments of those forces had purely human shapes, showing thus a clearer conscience of the man’s superiority within nature. At the Asian and African peoples, these embodiments combined the human shapes with the subhuman shapes, showing thus more directly, the mixing of the human with the nature (images of women with enormous bellies and breasts, image of man having a horse body etc.). The symbolizations of the diverse forces of the nature were called as deities and these deities were represented in carved images: the seas’ water in the human form of Neptune, the bodily beauty and love in the image of Venus, who satisfied its amorous impulse often outside marriage, the warrior valiance in the image of Mars. Sometimes the sun itself was symbolized in the human shape of Apollo, who had its own image. In this one can see that the nature was conceived as having not only a divine character, but as having a human character too. The divine, the human and the nature, were mixed up.

2. In the nature’s forces, either purely physical or mixed with the human forces, either on one hand good and on the other hand evil, on one hand reformers and on the other hand destructive, the divine quality attributed to them it wasn’t exclusively good, but it was also evil, as the nature is. Apollo was warming up, but he was destroying too; Mars was defending but also killing. The nature’s or pantheistic religions, they do not promote and they do not uphold exclusively the good and the life in a progressive and endless continuity, but they also uphold the destruction, because the nature’s forces are spinning in a circle. The idols were given human sacrifices, being shown that the nature they represented it doesn't only give life, but it takes the life too.

3. The nature's forces collide with each other, and therefore the deities symbolized by them, they collide too. The struggle between them it engages the people too, for the people are as well considered as composing parts of the nature, or the people are carried away by these forces. The people cannot escape the fatality of perishing which the deities and the nature's forces are submitted too. The human tragedies aren't punishments consequently to some voluntary evil deeds, but they are necessary moments in the cyclical unfolding of the nature, and they are reckoned as divine. Even the evil done by people it isn't a wanted evil, but it is the manifestation imposed by the nature having a divine character, but also being ambivalent from moral point of view, and which dominates the people and it also dominated the whole unfolding of the universe. Nothing can save the people from the fatal unfolding of their life. The people do evil unwillingly, and they endure, unavoidable, the punishment for that. There is impossible the forgiveness or the moral progress. In Christendom, the tragic end which some people are submitted to, it is no longer the unavoidable consequence of some evil deeds which the people against their will, are pushed to, by deities, but it is the consequence of some passions which the people weren't able to master (Othello). In some cases, the tragic is born, in the Christian world, out of the joining of some passions and of some circumstances which do not depend on man (as for instance in some tragedies by Shakespeare or by O'Neil).

The deities have no mercy, or even if they had had any mercy, they wouldn't have been able to do anything for saving the man from what he is given with. Even the deities, as forces of the nature, they are submitted to the fatality of some superior to them laws. The sentiment of mercy amongst people it is inutile too, or mixed with helplessness. It appears as contrary to the nature.

4. From here comes the fact that to the deities represented through idols or to the natural force represented by them directly, they aren't addressed prayers in order to save the believers from the evil things depending on nature or in order to obtain help for moral consummation. The idols are brought sacrifices because they incorporate also destructive forces which the human beings must obey to, which they must recognize. By the self-sacrifice brought to the deity, the man joins the nature's force in its destructive aspect.

If something is asked for, by the worshippers, through the sacrifices of material goods or of people, sacrificed on the altar, or through the fire from before the idols, or by direct throwing in the river considered as deity, that is rather a help in wars, or a success in adverse circumstances, which are considered as other deities. Namely, there are asked for strengthening of physical order in the changing play amongst the physical forces, and not for forgiveness of sins or moral consummation. The deities, as nature's forces, they cannot be asked but for help and strengthening on the line of the nature. In the pantheistic religions the nature's forces are imagined as having some character of persons, the deities have some will and conscience, but they aren't categorically superior to the natural forces which they represent. The idea of person totally differing from nature it is foreign to the pantheistic religions. In their conception about deities, there is a mix of person and nature. The deity representing the nature's force, he is stronger than the man and, by having some vague character as person, the deity can use, in some measure, his power through his will and conscience. But the deity doesn't have absolute power related to the nature.

In man, there hasn't been possible to totally lose the conscience that he differs from nature, and that's why the deities aren't, in some cases, but human images having forces of mythical proportions, but still remaining on the nature's line in their forces.

A remnant of this accentuation of the qualities of the human persons with mythical proportions it still lasts today, giving birth to the legend about mythical heroes. But they still remain on the line of their nature. They are the expression of a contradiction: on one hand, they are embodiments of the nature's forces, but on the other hand, they are endowed with human traits. The deities as human incorporation of the nature's force, they remain, by and large, people having sins, having shortcomings, far from consummation, and having powers which totally exceed the natural. They usually fall too, at the end, due to who known what mistake or evil deed they have done.

5. According to the pantheistic religions, in all the things reigns an implacable fatality (moira), which is both good and bad, or rather giving any individual existence an end in the definitive death. If all the things are submitted in these religions, as in any pantheistic conception, to a meaningless unfolding, of births and deaths, it turns out that the nature reckoned as divine it lacks the power to raise at a meaning, of bringing the good to a definitive victory. It turns out that not only the nature's forces reckoned as divine, they limit on one another, but the whole nature is finite in its powers. The nature seen as divinity it wasn't a real infinity, because of not existing in it the possibilities of some other alternatives than those of the ones automatically unfolding. It is the mono-plan. It doesn't know another plan. Consequently, the nature is actually finite, narrowed to a sole possibility in its actual existence.

In the whole pantheism of these religions there was a fundamental contradiction: the nature is divine, it is absolutely supreme, but it still lacks an own will, a power leading the own unfolding, a raising from the good-evil mix to a pure good, being meaningless in this unfolding leading to nowhere. The whole nature is dominated by the darkness of the meaningless. That's why the worshipping of the idols, which are carved images of the nature's forces, it is meaningless. That worshipping couldn't bring the people any benefit. That worshipping meant at most a resignation in front of those forces which were the ultimate instance, but also a helpless instance, hovering upon the human destiny. The man could also rebel against those forces and against the idols which those forces were represented through, without this rebellion bringing him a bigger evil than death, which the man was still submitted to, even if he worshipped them; only that, in such a case, the death came sooner. All these features of the deities, and therefore of the idols as well, were described by the Holy Fathers.” (Stăniloae 2005: 217-220)

“The radical and essential difference between idol and icon it consists of the fact that the idol is the manufactured representation of the immanent force of the nature. The man himself is conceive as totally dominated by the nature’s forces of as framed within the nature’s forces, even if the man stays on the highest plan in the frame of the nature totalizing those forces. The idol isn’t a means which the worshipper transcends through (passes over) the fatal nature, which himself is framed within. The idol is the religious conclusion of the pantheistic conception, which Spinoza gave the most expressing formula: Deus sive natura.” (Stăniloae 2005: 222)

Image and Likeness of God

“This maximum union with God, the imprinting of the man with the fullness of God, without merging with Him, it is the deification of the man. For deification it is given the image of God within man, as man’s aspiration for his absolute model. And in it the image finds its fulfillment, as maximum likeness to God. In image it is involved as a godlike commandment, the man’s tension towards deification.” (Stăniloae 2003: 414)

“The likeness isn’t only the final state of deification, but the whole road of developing the image, through the will stimulated and helped by the grace of God. That’s why the Holy Fathers, from the first ones to Saint Gregory Palamas, they accentuated the fact that the ‘image’ is being developed in ‘likeness’, especially through virtues, which are especially the fruit of the will helped by the grace.” (Stăniloae 2003: 415)

“Through this difference between image and likeness we understand the declaration of the Holy Fathers that the image had been preserved into man, though the man didn’t step on the way of the likeness. This is because even the man, after falling, he has preserved a certain aspiration towards good and a certain capacity of doing the good, as also an aspiration towards truth and knowing an iota of truth, though the Holy Fathers do not say that the man has maintained himself in the movement of the likeness. And in a certain regard, even the image has become weaker, by not being fully activate in the work of likeness. A full image is an image that is actualized in the movement towards likeness. An image that isn’t being activated it is somehow a weakened image, but it never is a lost image. That’s why we say that Christ has restored the image, or he has found the lost image. But we do not say that Christ has again created the image.” (Stăniloae 2003: 415)

“The image as tendency towards God, it has been mixed up with a contrary tendency; better said, the image has been preserved as tendency towards absolute, but the absolute covered His face as Person, and the man cannot see it any longer, and consequently the man’s image has lost its luminosity, its clarity; the image’s features has remained, but they have been partially crooked, as in a caricature are being maintained the features of the face, but crookedly. The nature’s structures essentially remain the same, but they are being activated against nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 415-416)

“We believe the image is reduced to the passiveness of its potencies activation of the right path. But even when the image is being activated, it is activated in an altered mode; the image is restless by passing from a finite thing to another, searching for it but being unable to find the content and the resting. That's why is possible that the image, remained with its potencies, to be brought back to a right activation of those potencies." (Stăniloae 2003: 416)

"Somebody who negatively answers the appeal of somebody else, and who doesn't see the infinite of somebody else, he has preserved the capacity and the necessity of answering, but he answers contrary to his nature, which remains in the heart of the dialogue when there is an answer given to the one seen in his indefinite. That's why it is easy the man to be brought back to the positive answer. Or, the egotistic man still maintains himself in a preoccupation with others, for he defines his preoccupations with himself in opposition with other people, with a passion of affirming himself in report with others. But he preoccupies himself with other by referring them to himself, by reckoning himself the sole absolute. On this way he forgets about the absolute truth, or he reckons it as impersonal, and therefore appropriate to be annexed to himself. But in essence, the egotistic man cannot exit the ontological spiritual connection with others. Thus, it is easy to bring him back to the positive preoccupation with others." (Stăniloae 2003: 416-417)

"The negative preoccupation with others, or the negative answer to others' necessities, they do not remain not-pricked by the gushing up of some impulses of positive preoccupation or of positive answer. And the absolute the man often thinks at, and towards which the man aspires, it doesn't remain uninterrupted of lacking a face of a person, lacking the character of the absolute truth for him, which to provide a foundation to the impulse of answering his fellow humans with positive enthusiasm." (Stăniloae 2003: 417)

"Saint Gregory Palamas affirms that the image of God remained within us, but we have lost its stability, which is the same with the likeness. But an image is full when it steadfastly manifests as image, or when it is activated in likeness. An image without likeness it is not integrally proven as image, but in an altered manner. The paradox consists in the fact that it still is image, though it cannot steadfastly manifest as image, it cannot show itself as a clear image, but it introduces in itself a certain ambiguity or duplicity." (Stăniloae 2003: 417)

"We have considered until now, as model of the godlike image of God, the Holy Trinity. But we must not forget that the man is regarded also as image of the divine Logos, Who at His turn, while still being the image of the Father, He put on, at the fulfillment of the time, also His human image (Philip. 2: 6-7; Heb. 1: 3). The man is thus the "image" of the Word and therefore the man is “in the image of the Father. For the man is the image of the Word and in the image of the Father, the man is placed in a relation with the Trinitarian communion and the man is called to accomplish on the human plan a life of communion resembling to the Trinitarian communion and by the Trinity’s power. Consequently, Christ has elevated within man the godlike image to the full actualization, namely to man’s full communion with God and with his fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 426).

“As image of the Word, the man is subject of all things, or together-subject with his fellow humans, having the responsibility for seeing through things the divine rationalities of the things and the Logos Himself as supreme Subject of the things, and the man is also called to develop with his fellow humans the communion as together-subjects of the things, in the image of the divine Logos.” (Stăniloae 2003: 426)

“The actualization of the image it doesn’t consists only of realizing the full communion with God and amongst them, of all the ones who believe in Christ – their divine and human model – but also in a framing of the whole nature in the communion of the transfigured mankind. The godlike Ghost, spread in the plenitude of Christ into the people who believe in Him, by strengthening the spirit from within them, the Ghost will make not only their body as fully elastic and transparent, but he will do the same with the cosmic nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 426)

“The godlike image consists in the ontological structure of the man, which is made for tending towards the communion with the supreme communion - that one of the divine Persons Who are source of any communion - and with the human persons, and the likeness it consists in activating this structure. Consequently, the primordial state of the man cannot be a state of unfolding the image in the virtues in which this communion is manifested, because for this it was needed time. But the primordial state could not be either a lack of image as ontological structure, in the tendency towards this communion, for such a specifically human structure it is not achieved in time. The man was man since the beginning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 427-428)

“Thus, the man was clean of evil impulses, and he had a tendency towards the good of the communion with God and with his fellow humans, but he was not strengthened in this cleanness and in this good. The man was aware and free, and in conscience and in freedom the man had tendency towards the good things. But the man didn’t accomplish a progressed conscience of the good and of the truth, neither a freedom ensured against the possibility of the man being enslaved by certain passions. The man wasn’t a sinner, but neither was he adorned with achieved virtues and with clean consolidated thoughts. The man had the innocence of the one who hasn't tasted the sin, but not that innocence gained by rejecting the temptations. The man was a being having his soul not wounded and not weakened by passions, but also not strengthened by exercising the deeds of taking his body and the world into submission, deeds of actualizing the world's contingent elasticity. The man's body wasn't enslaved to the automatic law of the sin, but neither had his body its force strengthened by habituation to remain immune to such a state. The world wasn't imposing its processes the man's body and spirit, as some chains one cannot exit from, but neither was the world brought under the mastery of the ghost that imposes his power upon the world." (Stăniloae 2003: 428)

"The world had for the man the transparency it has it to an innocent child - but the child could experience the opacity of the world if he starts working evil deeds - but the world didn't have that transparency it has it to a saint, who has really overcome the world's opacity. The rationality's common sense, in understanding the things and in understanding the deeds, it had a clarity unpreserved by the man who was pulled in all directions by all sorts of knowledge and opinions; but the man wasn't verified and steadfast in an unshaken firmness, through a critical experience that can be gained out of the persistence in good and out of rejecting the evil." (Stăniloae 2003: 428)

Immortality

“Identifying the rational to the immortality it will be better understood if we consider that the man’s existence towards death it is irrational or meaningless, and also if we consider the rational as speaking. The man speaks for he is addressed to by God, for the man is placed by speaking in relation with God; and for the man speaks, namely for he answers, the man won’t ever cease to answer, for God won’t ever finish to tell the man what He is and to show the man His love, and the man won’t ever finish to understand and to want to understand and even more to express his joyfulness, his gratitude, and his doxology for what God shows him.” (2003: 409)

“In the Orthodox conception, according to which the mind and the heart of the human being they become, while the human being still lives on earth, a throne and a dwelling place to God, or they sparkle like the peak of Sinai Mountain in the godlike light, there cannot be about such a destruction. We do not see the reason why God would deprive Himself, for such a long period of time, of His throne, of the loving relation with the believer, of how God would endure the deified man to be destroyed, or to stay in such a long sleep. The death, as the spiritualized people say, it cannot reach the spirit which has been enlightened - while still living here on earth - by the eternity’s rays. The Orthodox doctrine about the souls’ preservation it comes out, though, from the value of the love for God, which the believer is subject to. Dostoyevsky says through his character named Stephan Trofimovici: “My immortality is necessary for this sole reason, that God won’t want to be unjust and to quench forever the flame of the love lit in my heart for Him. What is more precious than love? The love is above existence, the love is the existence’s coronation. Then, would it be possible that the existence to disobey Him? If I have loved God, if I have enjoyed my love for Him, will it be possible that Him to quench out, me and my love, and to bring us back to nothingness? If God exists, I will be immortal.” (Stăniloae 1997: 160)

“If we hadn’t believed in the immortality of the soul, the simple experience of a connection with the dead ones it would have been something totally unsatisfactory. How comes that where the faith misses, the pressure of a presence of the dead ones it does not appear, in order everybody to admit the immortality? The only sure presence, sure to our experience of the others, it is that one in body. Their body is not only an impediment to know them, but it is also the only way we can know, actually, about their existence, which their reality gnoseological comes close to us through, and their being is indicated to us and we can enter a communion with them, which we do not doubt of. No matter how intensive would be the spiritual influence of the other from distance or, generally, from an unseen plan, if he does not present himself corporally in front of us, that influence won’t have the high character of the communion. However pervasive God is – close to us like a surely given fact, like a factor of communion – He becomes obvious to us only through embodiment.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We can say that the work which the persons transfigure through the human spirit - the spirit being present as personal soul in each human being - the whole universe, by filling the universe up, increasingly more, with God, it is a work upheld by the work of God, and, as the human being fulfills this work of his in communion with the others, likewise God fulfills it in His quality as Trinity of the Persons full of love for One Another and for the whole creation. Out of the union with the God of the loving Trinity, the people take the power for transfiguring the material nature, through communion with God, and, with this, the people take the power for overcoming death with the body.” (Stăniloae 1995: 145)

“The Son of God has made, on Himself, man, by manifesting, on Himself, in the perfect love of the Persons of the Holy Trinity towards God’s creation. On this purpose, Christ takes the human soul united with the body, in order to fully united these two, with Himself, and, by that, to overcome the death through His resurrected body, and to endlessly transfigure the entire material matter and to resurrect all the people, He fulfilling, thus, their aspiration for the immortality with the body.” (Stăniloae 1995: 145)

“The man remains immortal while he is always thirsty for knowledge, while he lives being aware of having always something new to know, namely, while he is aware of a direct connection with the infinite God, and not in the monotony of an essence submitted to the same laws but in connection with the One Who makes Himself known to the man in always other depths of Him. And knowing God as always new reality, not-submitted to some laws of the repetition, it is knowing Him as real Person. And this knowledge it is, in the same time, a loving relation. Only by loving God and only in the conscience that he is loved by God, the man advances into a live which he won’t ever have enough of. Even the one who truly loves a person and who is loved by that person, that one wouldn’t ever want either that person to die, or him. But the love amongst people has moments of boredom, due to a paradoxical union of the man’s limitation with a certain permanent novelty. That’s why the people’s love for one another it can only with difficulty not to end in a continuous boredom, which the love gets colder and the communication weakens in.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 13-14)

“Only God is infinite as Subject to be known, for He is a Subject Who makes Himself known as always new, through His love towards the one who finds always new resources in this for loving Him. And only because God is like that, the man can be, at his turn, in a certain measure, like that too, as image of God, feeling the need for an endless relation with God, in order to know God in His cognoscible and communicable infinity. That's why the immortality is a gift from God. The man is immortal through his connection with God and the man has been made like that by God, in order the man to become immortal through this connection." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 14)

"The sin breaks the man from God and it keeps the man locked up, egotistically, in the man's own pride, the man pretending that he has nothing else to know except a physical and biological nature submitted to some laws of the repetition which, consequently, would be the only ones accessible to the man's knowledge without the communication with God. But for the man in this case too, he still knows a few things and the man's conscience in this case too, it must occupy itself with something, the man preoccupies himself endlessly with the monotonous reality thus known by him. This narrow preoccupation is one with the man's death, which isn't a total disappearance but it is an eternal lack of real novelty. The man remains a weakened image of the Logos of God, for the man remains in a connection with the creation imprinted with his rationality, but he continues to exist imprinted with the rationality of the Logos, even if he has narrowed that rationality and even if he has crooked it. The man cannot die totally, for the man cannot exist the connection with the divine Logos, because of his rational constitution and because of his rational creation, and because him and those ones keep, if not an infinity in themselves, at least a connection with the infinite Logos and an impossibility of exiting that connection. So, the man will really be able to be immortal if he doesn't choose the egotism of the loneliness. But one can say that the man is an immortal being in alternative meaning. The man no longer dies totally, even in the case of breaking himself from God, for God no longer annuls any of his created conscious images, and God neither annuls the world. But the man can choose to himself, between an immortality of the live and a tormented immortality having a locked-up existence in its own limitation, to say so. The man is immortal for he tends to comprise the infinite, but he never can do that, because the man always comes across a margin which he wants to cross over. The man lives the following paradox: he is always neigh to a margin, but he always has within himself the power to continue living and manifesting himself as new, somehow crossing over each margin only in order to find a new margin. About the real exceeding of any margin spoke Saint Apostle Paul and, after him, Saint Gregory of Nyssa who took from Saint Apostle Paul (Philip. III: 14) the idea about the continuous tending towards the things from ahead, or about epektasis. The man is potentially eternal, for he will advance into infinite, in interminable progress, when he doesn't remain stuck to the same margin. The man will be by this too, the image of God Who is eternal, for the man doesn't get ever enough of the infinity which God has it by His nature, from ever. When the man will reach the full union with God through Christ, the man will enjoy an actualized eternity, for he will enjoy a in an actualized manner the infinity too, but only through his participation to the infinity of God, or by grace, and not by nature.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 14-15)

“Even the fact that the man cannot reconcile himself with the death and that he always searches for new ways of escaping the death, of for defeating the death, it shows that the man is made for immortality.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16)

“The fundamental paradox, characteristic to the human being, it consists of the union between his quality of being created by God and in the same time being immortal. This shows the man as not existing by himself, but as existing into and through God, and just for that being immortal, no by himself but through God Who since He created each person as irreplaceable, He no longer allows that person to totally disappear from existence. The creature isn’t simply immortal as God is, but the creature is immortal for is created and upheld in existence as conscious dialogue partner, whether the creature recognizes or not, of the immortal God.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 20-21)

“By being created as dialogue partner, with the Father and together with the Son, the man is created as immortal being. Therefore, Saint Athanasius saw the man’s immortality in the man’s quality as image of the Son, image that will endlessly advance in the likeness with the Son, by inexhaustibly knowing the Son.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 25)

“The objects’ world has a rationality in order to be known by people, the people having a conscious rationality capable of being enriched with the world’s light and through that to know increasingly more the infinite light of the Creator, or the God-Person Rationality. The seal of the godlike rationality is imprinted thus in a double sense, or completely within people, as images of godlike Rationality, created in order to advance in likeness and in connection with the godlike Rationality, forever. Knowing a person means loving that person. By being in the image of the godlike infinite Word-Person, called to increasingly love and know Him, namely as rational and loving being in his quality as person who advances forever in knowing and in loving the God-Person Rationality, the man is created as immortal being.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 25-26)

“The people have been created for the immortal life, for their knower and loving dialogue, as rational being, with the Word or with the infinite

hypostatical Rationality, it won't ever come to the end. The people never reach the end of the knowledge, the end of their thirst for knowing and for love. But in the same time, because of not having within them the infinity of the content they want, and being free to remain or not in the dialogue with the infinite Word, and in what can be known out of Him, the people were able to forsake this dialogue. Actually, when the world is seen as incorporation of supreme rationalities of the supreme Person-Rationality, the people can advance through those rationalities in knowledge, and therefore they can advance in loving that Person-Rationality. Otherwise, the world's rationalities are seen as some definable laws, in a monotonous repetition, and in a short while the man sees that he has nothing really new to know within world, despite the fact that he can advance in the ever more detailed ramifications of those laws. Only the world's rationalities which are seen as irradiating out of the person of the godlike Word (Logos), they keep open the road towards the infinite of the godlike Person. And that Person is the spring of the loving endless life. Even the human persons, when seen in themselves, when they limit their own rationality to know the things' rationalities as laws defined in themselves, they do not remain open to the infinite and they cannot sustain endlessly the man's thirst for knowledge. Only when the human persons place themselves through things or through themselves, in connection with the Person Who is the infinite spring of life, only then they become transparent and they are springs of life to one another." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 26)

"The man doesn't joyfully receive his narrowing and resignation to an immanent absolute, a narrowing that cannot be done except by wrongly thinking at his aspirations. Actually, the man tends towards immortality and he remains immortal. This is for the man remains objectively hanging of the Absolute-Person. But it isn't less real that, to many people, the subjective connection with the Absolute-Person is getting weakened because of their will. By this, they cover the objective connection with the Absolute-Person. And the consequence is a spiritual poverty of their being and a reduction of their being's complexity. The egotism which the increasingly more lock-up themselves in, through their pride, to the extend of breaking away from the Absolute-Person, it remains at its turn in a hostile preoccupation with the others. By that, the place of the real understanding of those ones is taken by the inventing of all sorts of hostile thought regarding them." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 41-42)

"Even in the conscience of the man that he cannot define himself, it is shown the fact that he lives as an existence deeper than he can comprise. In a way, the man knows about himself more than he can comprise. Even living himself as a mystery it widens his self-awareness. The human being knows on himself and in the same time he doesn't know on himself. About the human being one can say what Dionysus the Areopagite said about God, namely that the negation is equally true as the affirmation is. I am known to myself also by the fact that I know on myself as above knowledge, for I bear in myself the seal of God Who is in the same time known and unknown to me. Even my darkness, or the own mystery, it is, in the same time, luminous light to me; and this light is darkness, or it lightens the darkness as a mystery. Continuously failing to exhaust my own mystery through knowledge, it drives me to an external transcendence, one that is, in the same time, an eternal enrichment of my life and knowledge. Even this one gives me the perspective of my immortality.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 61)

“From the times’ purpose of occasioning and of making possible the universe’s movement towards a final purpose, namely the universe’s union with God in the unchangeable happiness, it comes out the dynamic character of the creation and of the time related to creation. The time is imprinted as constantly changing even within creation; but it is imprinted a form to cross towards more. That’s why the time is passing, but not without leaving traces behind, but as occasioning a progress towards consummation into creation, for the creation itself cannot remain locked-up in the state it is on each moment, but it constantly crosses through other better (or worse) states, which the time crosses through. Normally, the changing of the creation and of the time, it is due to the desire for crossing towards a better state, a state richer in life. But the creature can deceive on himself and make a movement towards a worse state, that apparently is a movement towards better. The movement can be also a movement of the creation towards division, due to the delusion that, by this, it more strongly affirms on itself. Thus, the creation weakens itself with the delusion that it makes itself stronger. In this delusion, the people have fallen through sin, a prey to the death. But the people who come back to the advancing towards God Who is the source of the true life, and by this they become to the true spiritual enrichment, they defeat the body’s death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 60)

“The belief into the soul’s immortality it has overwhelmingly powerful logical and scientific reasons. Though, the belief is still necessary. The supreme test of our faith it is done especially when we feel the breath of death upon our being. Then it is verified if our belief is so strong that, despite of the evidence of the end of our material being, which projects to us like a total end, to keep, through the faith, the surety that God would not let us in the nonexistence which gradually covers us up, but He will grant us a continuation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Judgment

“All the great Christian confessions teach, by and large, that each soul, surviving after the human being’s death, he is immediately after subjected to an individual judgment, consequently to which the soul will be sent to happiness or to torments, depending of how he is found at that trial. At the end of the world, there will be another judgment, a universal one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 165)

“The Author of the individual judgment is the same One of the universal Judgment. Himself said: “My Father doesn’t judge anybody, but He has given the whole judgment to the Son” (Jn. 5: 22).” (Stăniloae 1997: 185)

“Christ is the Author of the judgment not in the sense that He utter arbitrary sentences, or according to some impersonal laws, but in the sense that out of Him overflows the live and the happiness of the full communion, upon the ones who have lived according to His example and who resembled to Him, those ones having within themselves, still from this life, the whole light and joy of the communion with Him, and the ones who haven’t followed Him, they will remain in a state of eternal deprivation of the joy of this communion with him, Who is the source-Person to the whole godlike and human love.” (Stăniloae 1997: 185)

“For the ones who had Christ as role model during their life, the judgment from Christ means His showing in the most obvious relation with them, together with all the gifts of His love; to the ones who have lived outside the communion with Christ, the judgment from him it means the ceasing of any of His attempts to come closer to them, to get them out from their refusal attitude towards Him; and this isn’t because He no longer wants to show them His love, but because they have become callous in the passions which have at their basis the denial of Him and the disobedience to Him. Until now they have been hearing people speaking in His favor, they have been meeting Jesus through the people who have been believing in Him and who have been urging them too, to believe in Him; since now, they won’t hear such urges, because all the ones amongst whom they are going to be, they know too little about Christ. All of them are examples of disobedience, of despising the communion with Him. In a song, on the occasion of the soul’s leaving the body, the Church put in those ones’ mouths the words: “I’m not mentioning God, since now, because of not being in hell anyone to mention God, but into full darkness being I covered, I will sit waiting for the resurrection of all the people.” (Stăniloae 1997: 185)

“The souls from hell still realize somewhat, that their unhappiness constitutes an estrangement of theirs from God, or a withdrawal of Him from them, of course because of themselves; they understand that this unhappiness is their lack of conforming to Him; they understand so that He is the criterion and He had the last word which they are in the state they are for, because they didn't conform themselves to him and they didn't live thinking at Him. On the other hand, even now, they don't see Him how He is in His luminous kindness and, besides a profound conscience of theirs that He decided their fate they still persist in not knowing Him and in contesting Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 185)

"The fact that Christ is man too, it would let open, in principle, the possibility that He to show Himself to the souls sent in hell. But Christ as shown to those ones, he would have a countenance lacking the joy light of entering the communion with those souls, as also lacking the penetrating spirituality of such a communion. But such a countenance of Christ is hard to understand. Isaac the Syrian, by admitting such a countenance of Christ and by still reckoning that not even in it, Christ doesn't leave His love, he said that it becomes a fire, or a sufferance to the rejected souls. It is a love that hurts them and that's why it upsets the ones who are incapable to answer it. But is this still providing them a true knowing about Christ? Isn't this rather a hiding of Christ Who comforts Who lightens, and Who saves when he shows up? Isn't Christ covered up by the torments of the conscience of the one who dies in sins? Paradoxically, the conscience of Christ's presence is combined with the helplessness of seeing Him in His true reality, like the envious cannot see the kindness of the one whom he envies." (Stăniloae 1997: 186-187)

"About a presence of Christ directed towards the ones who is going to be sent in hell, but this presence being a far one, a not-unveiled one, the Church speaks also in another song, on behalf of the soul at his leaving from body: "Sigh for me, the wicked one, all the end of the earth and shed tears together, because it has come dreadful answer from above, to be my hands and my legs tied, and I to be left outside". With resembling words, Simeon the Metaphrastes says: "When there won't be anybody to help you, then you will hear a voice from above: let the faithless to be taken, in order not to see the glory of God. Shiny and godlike angels will hand you over to the evil and envious devils, towards their joy, and the sad and mourning angels will leave you to them". The soul feels deserted by any good help from above." (Stăniloae 1997: 187)

"If the unhappiness of the ones from hell it means the becoming permanent of their negative attitude towards Christ, of their refusal to enter the communion with Him during their life on earth, of their refusal to go towards the target of the consummate man accomplished by Christ, as role model and as attraction point, the happiness of the ones from paradise it is the coronation of their communion with Christ, of their living with Him, of their gradual imprinting with the humanity of Christ during their life on earth." (Stăniloae 1997: 187)

“The criterion which our eternal fate will be decided according to, it will be our effort of the lack of our effort to get closer to Christ, or to advance towards the consummate humanity accomplished by Christ the man. This criterion isn’t taken by Christ from outside, but Himself is this criterion. He is the norm of the judgment and He is also the One applying this norm, for He accomplished it Himself and he consummately knows it from Himself. More than that, He isn’t only the criterion and the Judge, but He is also the crown with which, as Judge, He rewards the ones who strived to raise themselves towards His level as man, and He does this in order to accomplish them on the measure of His humanity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 188)

“That’s why the whole judgment has been given to Jesus Christ. If we can speak about a right which He has gained in order to exercise this dignity, we will have to understand this in the sense that by assuming and elevating our humanity to our exemplary quality, through the Cross, through His Resurrection and Ascent, he has elevate within Himself the first fruits of the humanity where it should be, and through His dwelling within the ones who believe in Him He has granted them the help to die, at their turn, to the former man, and so to become forever alive through virtues, by making everything for the man to reach the peak of the humanization where He is at. On the other hand, though, He has this right for only in Him this humanity could actually reach its eternal peak. He is Judge in His quality as guide and upholder on the road of the humanization, in His quality as target and coronation of the humanity, within those in whom this advancing has taken place. He is the way and the life, the upholder and the crown of ours.” (Stăniloae 1997: 188-189)

“The Judge honor given Him, it is in the same time an honor given to the man; by extolling Him as supreme Judge, as decisive instance of our eternal fate, we honor one of ours, we honor as supreme Criterion the level which the mankind has reached in Him, and through Him reached by all the ones who worship Him. We are judged according to a criterion reached by man, a man who has done everything in order us too to reach there, and who will impart us, through judgment, with the level he has reached on, if we too have given our part of collaboration with Him, for us to reach there. In Him will have the happiness not only the people but also the angels, as also in Him will have their unhappiness all the ones who won’t recognize Him. In this sense, of conforming or of not conforming to Him as criterion of our fate, we must understand the words of Saint Apostle Paul: “That’s why God has extolled Him and gave Him the name that is above any name, for in His name every knee to bend down, of the heavenly ones and of the earthly ones and of the ones from beneath, and every tongue to confess that Lord is Jesus Christ, into the glory of God-the Father” (Phil. 2: 9-11). This glory of His is preserved as inheritance to the saints, namely to the ones who believe in Him and who strive themselves, with His power that is within them, to become like Him (Ephes. 1: 18).” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“The Judgment from Christ – or the coronation for eternity with His glory of the ones who collaborated with His power which was dwelling within them, and the depriving of this coronation of the ones who didn’t accept Him, thus having as consequence the participation or the non-participation to the consummation of His humanity – it is an important leverage in upholding the mankind’s advancing towards consummation in the interior of the godlike absolute.” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“The Judgment done by Christ is done out of the consummate humanity of His, rooted in the divine absolute, the firm leverage for our progress towards the true consummation in humanity. The judgment from Christ it means that there is a difference between and order of the values with absolute importance and the non-values’ disorder, or of the seeming like values things, and that the absolute values are those which lead to the full humanity which is in God Who has made Himself man, and that one can live in this order and he can reach in the heaven of those values’ consummate reality.” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“If there hadn’t been the Judgment from Christ, the generations of people would have been destined to fall in nothingness, or they have been evolving, with falling and raisings, or only by advancing on the plan of the relativity which, through its eternal monotony, it will end by unveils itself as not being far from hell, especially because a progress in the spirit deprived on body it has also the disadvantage that it cannot satisfy the desires – be them passing – which can be satisfied while having a body. Outside the judgment from Christ there isn’t anything except the hell; the judgment from Christ occasions the ones who accept it, to escape the nothingness and the hell. Namely: either there is Christ and the judgment from Him, and then escape the nothingness of the hell at least the ones who believe in Him, or, on the opposite, there isn’t such a thing, and then everything that is person is condemned to perdition or to the eternal hell, equivalent to the lack of any sense. As Saint Maximos the Confessor and Saint John Damascene said, the conscience, so interrupted and contested by the sinful souls, that they are in hell on the basis of a judgment from Christ, it gives the experience of the ones who are in hell a bit of meaning too, which makes that existence superior to the inexistence or to an eternal evolution in relativity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“We cannot live without knowing ourselves as being in connection with an absolute criterion, which cannot be except the supreme Person of God, on one hand become accessible in Christ-the Man, and on the other hand, remained consummate in His love. The criterion which the human beings’ fate is made definitive according to, it is simultaneously the consummate humanity and the absolute of the divine Person, or the consummate humanity, thus made eternal too, for it is in the bosom of the godlike supreme Person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“The deceased one isn’t given these good things as sure thing. But in all the songs, they ask forgiveness from Christ for the deceased one, because there is no man who lived and who is sinless; only through the forgiveness which will be uttered by the judgment of Christ, the soul of the one who leaves this life for the happy life will be imparted with the good things. That’s why, the whole religious service of the burial isn’t declarative but it is praying. Through this the judgment of Christ isn’t only a coronation of the ones who lived in Him with the crown of the full communion with Him and an ascertainment of the helplessness of the other ones for this communion, but it is too an occasion of manifestation of the mercy of Christ for the sins which a man is impossible not to have committed. All the prayers and the song from the burial are based on this faith in the power had by Christ to forgive the sins at judgment and on the entrusting to His mercy. The Christ’s judgment doesn’t consist only of a separation of the souls according to their intrinsic quality, but it is also an act of forgiving the sins.” (Stăniloae 1997: 191)

“Without any doubt, in the first place, Christ takes in account the quality or the fundamental disposition which the soul has gained during the life on earth, but this disposition is often so full of ambiguities, so mixed with impure elements and with weaknesses, so that it gives enough room to the manifestation of the Christ’s decision. It might be than Christ always gives a favorable decision where He knows that through His decision, He makes enough clear, in a good sense, the soul’s disposition. His decision is often creator of decisively good disposition and Christ alone knows when this can take place through His favorable judgment.” (Stăniloae 1997: 191)

“It is to be noticed that, while the Holy Fathers consider the Christ’s judgment as depending on the people’s deeds from their life on earth, the burial’s prayers and songs – moved by the mercy on the one who is leaving and by the humble understanding of the human weakness – they accentuate almost only the forgiveness from Christ. The active role of Christ in judgment it is highlighted by them more accentuated. They do this in order to affirm their hope that Christ will use His mercy in forgiving the deceased one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 191-192)

“Of course, the insistence the Church Fathers consider the conforming the Christians’ life with Christ with, in order the Christians to obtain the salvation, and the hope the Church’s prayers manifest in the forgiving mercy of Christ, both of them are necessary. The Church reconciles the rigidity of the first attitude with the comforting of the second one, in order to keep the Christian, awaken in his duty to work for his salvation, but also to give him hope in the mercy of Christ. No matter how much the man strives towards a life in virtue, he won't ever reach to a totally sinless state – and if he pretends this, he will be wrong – and no matter how wrong the man is, he will be able to ask for the mercy of God, if he repents.” (Stăniloae 1997: 192)

“The urge towards virtue, with the argument that the salvation depends on virtue, it is addressed to the man as long as he lives; the prayers for the forgiveness of the sins are done for the ones who is no longer able to do anything and with the conscience that nobody could fulfill the Lord's commandments in such a manner that him to be granted the salvation as a deserved good. The Church works pedagogy, but also comforting. The Church has reasons for both of them: Christ forgave the thief on the cross, who repented, but He also urged, in his sermon on the mountain, in that one regarding the final judgment, and on other occasions, to deeds of love. Between the fact that Christ decides the soul's fate according to the soul's state and His mercy, if the soul repents, there is no contradiction, for in both of these Christ stays with His arms open for the one who wants to enter the communion with Him, either one has prepared himself the whole his life for this, or another has awakened himself to the desire for this communion through his repentance from the end.” (Stăniloae 1997: 192)

“Jesus Christ needs witnesses at the soul's judgment, not because of not knowing by Himself the whole truth concerning that soul, but for He wants not to remain any doubt regarding His judgment to the ones interested in the fate of the respective soul.” (Stăniloae 1997: 194)

“The first witness is the conscience of the judged one. The soul never is so much face to face with his conscience than on this occasion. No friend could comfort him any longer in his conscience. This doesn't mean in the case of the ones who are condemned to the eternal lack of communion with Christ, so that the recognition from their part that they aren't capable of communion with Christ and with their fellow humans. They still remain somehow outraged by the fact that this lack of communion has as consequence the unhappiness, because they remain in a misunderstanding of the connection between the lack of communion and the unhappiness. On the other hand, paradoxically, they still realize that their unhappiness is due to their lack of communion; but they cannot get out from the state of refusing the communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 194)

“That's why, in a way, the conscience condemns them and the state they are in is a state of torment. For the lack of communion and of the deeds contrary to communion, the conscience was condemning them and tormenting them in a certain degree during their life on earth too. But this state was still covered by some shallow communications and pleasures. While the state of the lack of communion, and therefore its torment too, by becoming total since the moment of the death, from that moment they become fully obvious to the conscience.” (Stăniloae 1997: 194-195)

“The fact itself that after death the soul will see himself as not being accepted in any communion, it will bring in front of his conscience, in a more obvious manner, his own incapacity for communion; an incapacity which he realizes that is has been created by himself. The judgment of Christ isn’t separated from the judgment of the soul’s own conscience. All the things will come in the sight of the conscience, and they will become doubtlessly obvious, on that critical moment of crossing from this life, so that the soul will fully know that he has made himself unworthy of communion. The greatest misfortune is though, that in the same time, the soul will see that the habit of the lack of communion he has created to himself, it is so callous that he neither can even now to mellow it. He won’t be even now convinced that Christ truly exists as inexhaustible source of love and that his happiness depends on Christ, since the soul is unable to communicate with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 195)

“The spiritual writings speak extensively on the presence of the demons and of the angels on the moment of the judgment or before the sentence to be served. The demons bring forth the evil deeds of the deceased ones, in order to torment him in case through his deeds he has locked himself up in the impossibility of communion with Christ, or in order to make him wait in tension for his salvation from Christ, namely to resort to His mercy. To this one, the bringing of his undue deeds in front of his conscience it is the occasion of a last purification through repentance.” (Stăniloae 1997: 195)

“Besides, the states of the soul who come out of the bodies are so diverse and complex, so that the Church has avoided giving too simplifying formulation concerning what happened to the souls. The good angels appear around the soul who hasn’t been totally hostile to the communion with Christ and who wasn’t totally refractory to repentance, namely who wants to enter the communion with Him and with all the ones who are in communion with Him. They come for strengthening this soul against the fear for the sins committed during his life on earth, shown and exaggerated by the evil ghosts. If the soul rejoices of them, it already means that a communion has started between the soul and these angels and therefore this soul has become capable of the communion with Christ Whose messengers these angels are. Just through this, they succeed in banishing away the evil ghosts, the enemy ghosts who want to lock the soul up in loneliness and in the despair due to loneliness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 198)

“The Holy Scripture and the Holy Fathers, when speaking about the future life, about the happy life and about the tormented life, they do not always specify whether they speak about the one following immediately after death or about the one after the final judgment. Although, both the Holy Scripture and the Eastern spiritual writings, they speak both about a happy and about a tormented life, which start immediately after death on the ground of a judgment, and about a happy life and about a tormented life starting about the final judgment. For the life corresponding to the deeds with the body after each man’s death, to be seen amongst others the places from the Holy Scripture: Phil. 1: 23; 2 Cor. 5: 10; Hebr. 9: 27; and for the one after the universal judgment: Mt. 24: 31-46 etc. In the Patristic spiritual writings they speak also both about the reception of each soul, done by angels and by demons, immediately after death, and about the judgment done by Christ at the end of the world, according to each soul’s deeds. By and large, the Patristic writings consider the happiness received after the last judgment as much higher than the one after death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 203)

“There is a difference in what concerns the degree, between the happiness from after the individual judgment, when we won’t meet all the people who lived on earth, and the universal judgment, when we will meet everybody.” (Stăniloae 1997: 203)

“In what regards the Orthodox teaching, an element that makes smaller the happiness of the righteous after the individual judgment than the happiness from after the universal judgment, it is that they will receive the happiness, at the universal judgment, together will all the souls who will believe. Abraham Himself, who has in his bosom all the ones who go, after their death, to happiness (Hebr. 11: 40), he will receive the full happiness only after the last judgment. It is implied here a solidarity amongst the ones who believe in Christ, namely in His power to unite all of us through His love. One cannot be fully happy for the good things he has received from God, if he won’t rejoice of them together with others, together with all of them. The good things from God actualize their full content only through the together-rejoicing of them. Here is highlighted again the importance of the communion amongst everybody, as valuation, as full fruition of the communion with God, through the contribution of being accepted by each one. This element has been developed in the Tradition of the Orthodox Church in the fact that in the provisory state the souls can be brought out of hell through the prayers of the living ones, and in the fact that the saints can help the living ones and the ones dead in sins, through their prayers, a thing that won’t take place after the universal judgment.” (Stăniloae 1997: 204-205)

“A second element which, according to the Orthodox faith, it differs the state of the souls from after the individual judgment from that from after the universal judgment, it is that both the happiness and the torments will be endured after the universal judgment not only by the souls but also by the resurrected bodies. This means again a completion of the happiness and of the torments. It is to be mentioned the importance which is granted through this to the body, namely to the total person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 205)

“The Orthodox teaching that after the resurrection with the body both the happiness from paradise and the unhappiness from hell will be greater, it involves an understanding of the happiness and of the unhappiness as communion or non-communion, and both are lived by the total person consisting of soul and body. This causes the souls from hell to suffer also because they are tied to their not-spiritualized bodies.” (Stăniloae 1997: 207)

“The Orthodox teaching on the universal judgment especially highlights the value which the history as a whole has it for the man, and the deep community amongst the human beings, the need for their collaboration in order to lead the world to the state wanted by God. The saints remain at their turn, just because of this reason, profoundly interested in the course of the human life from after them, and they are trying through their prayers to influence the people towards good. But it is especially important the fact that everyone receives the integrity of the happiness or of the unhappiness only at the end of the world, a fact that shows that in the Orthodox conception the history is destined to an end and to a judgment and that, consequently, the history is a common work of the mankind which individual having his importance in it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 244)

“This apparition of the Lord (on His second coming, o. n.) will be a judgment too, as a placing in the light of God of all the ones who lived in communion with the Lord, with all their deeds, thoughts, and words from the past, but purified of everything that was not-consummate in them; though, it will be also as a letting in darkness of the ones who didn’t live in the light of the communion with the Lord one earth. Nothing will be cover either in ones or in others, for any covering of the good or of the bad will cease. The ones having the grace of God within them and who collaborate with God on earth, when leaving from here “the grace will become to them the day of the godlike judgment continuously illuminating the cleaned one and making him known as he truly is and which are his deeds in details, both material and spiritual.” (Stăniloae 1997: 266)

“On the opposite, the judgment, for the ones being in the incapacity of communion, it won’t consist of bringing them in front of God, but in letting them and in sinking them in the darkness of their individualities. (...) Being locked up in themselves, we do not speak about a part of the world reserved to the evil ones, and therefore not illuminated by the rays of the godlike Sun. As objective reality, this world cannot remain in any part of it not lighted. But the subjects accustomed to be locked up to any communion, they cannot be illuminated. They will remain hermetically locked up in the dungeon of their being, in the darkness of their deserted self, “in the outer darkness” self-isolated from world and people, because neither the world itself can be really seen outside communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 266)

“On the other hand, though in the mentioned place, Saint Simeon affirms that the judgment it has already been done by putting into light the ones who have made themselves capable of communion and by letting in darkness the ones who have made themselves incapable of communion, he still speaks in another place also about a judgment of everybody, at the end.” (Stăniloae 1997: 266)

“The universal judgment is put by the Holy Scripture and by the Holy Fathers in tight connection with the end of with the renewal of the world, and with the resurrection of the dead, which are at their turn simultaneous to the second coming of Christ, or caused by it. Some Holy Fathers see the judgment right in the fact that the ones who have formed themselves in the image of Christ they will cross through resurrection to the full communion with Him, and the others will cross in the “eternal exile”; the first ones will cross to “eternally watching the Christ’s face, and the others will cross to eternally watching the devil’s face.” (Stăniloae 1997: 290)

“Between affirming that the showing itself of Christ at the end of the world it means a judgment which chooses the ones who will be sent to happiness from the ones who will be sent to the eternal torments, and the description of this judgment as a solemn act of supreme authority, there is no contradiction. The eternal light which the good ones will be imparted with, it means that each of them will be looked at and called by Christ, as the darkness which the others are left in, it is a turning away of His face, of a closing of His face to them, because of themselves. In the same time, the one who experiences the turning of Christ’s face towards him as an eternal light, or an inexhaustible light, he sees himself in everything Christ find good in him, but he also sees everybody else who are shrouded in the same light that he is. Likewise, each one of the one sunken in darkness sees himself in the whole ugliness imprinted in his being and all the ones left, like he is, in the same situation. That’s why, this experience of the solidarity in light, which some people are sent to, on the basis of some resembling deeds which they have done to one another, or of the solidarity in darkness, which some people are sent to, on the ground of some resembling deeds which they have done to each other, it is lives as a solidary judging of them for the result which they have reached in developing of in disfiguring their humanity during their life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 290-291)

“Especially in our leaning with love towards the impoverished ones, we have a much clearer sight of God, a foretasting of the divine depths from the Kingdom of Heavens through our fellow humans. Who has opened through the effort of the love deeds, a no matter how small sight towards the spiritual infinite opened to him especially in the communion with his grieved fellow human, to him it will be opened the gate towards the spiritual infinite universe, at the final Judgment.” (Stăniloae 1997: 293-294)

“The final Judgment will show if the man was responsible for the unfolding of the creation from after him in time, and not only for his immediate fellow humans. Everyone’s evil or good example had repercussions upon the whole world. But this will show that each one must engage, on the measure of his possibilities, also directly into history, for example by upholding the savior faith, the ideas of justice, the brotherhood amongst people. On the other hand, the universal Judgment will take out not only all the individual masks (grandiloquent, hypocrite etc.) but also many masks which the history has been completely covered by, of diverse époques and events during history.” (Stăniloae 1997: 295)

“At the final Judgment the sinners will be unveiled in the whole their shameful state. As long as we are on earth, we can cover us in a bigger or smaller measure, for our neighbor has some doubts concerning our quality, of for if one knows about one of our evil deed the others don’t know. At the final Judgment all of us will know our evil deeds.” (Stăniloae 1997: 296)

“All the ones who did the good they will fully enjoy the gratitude which they will be welcomed with by all the ones upon whom the good they did had repercussions upon. The whole good and evil done in the world won’t appear as abstract entities, but as imprinted in the state of the people and in their gratitude or in their rebuke which we will meet one another. This is for we will see and recognize everybody at the final Judgment, with the traces of our deed in them, and with their answer of gratitude or of rebuke for our deeds. We will see and recognize them even the ones upon whom our good or bad deeds had indirect repercussions.” (Stăniloae 1997: 296)

“Even to the angels, the final Judgment will mean an unveiling of the godlike plan with this world, waited for with fear and tremble. And for this knowing of everybody by everyone and of everyone by everybody it means an appreciation too, it implies also a participation to everybody’s judgment. But for the righteous will be spared of this judgment, they won’t be, actually, judged, namely they won’t be condemned, but they will condemn together with God all the people worthy to be condemned, and they will appreciate by praising the people who did the good. Thus, it can be understood, probably, the Apostles’ participation to judgment (Mt. 19: 28; Lk. 22: 30), participation that has to be extended to all the righteous (1 Cor. 6: 2).” (Stăniloae 1997: 297)

“We cannot know if the angels wait, with fear, for that judgment also for another reason that the one of unveiling the salvation plan of God. Bulgakov affirms that the angels will be judged too, according to how they fulfilled their job of urging the people given in their care to do the good and to avoid the evil; and, on the basis of the place from 1 Cor. 6: 3, he even says that the angels will be judged even by the people. But Saint Maximos the Confessor, who speaks about this angels’ fear, he mentions only a judgment of the people. The angels’ fear is probably motivated by the greatness of this act, as also by the fact that many of them will lose the affiliated people given in they care. The angels maybe know even before judgment, better than the people entrusted to them, the people’s secrets and they remember them better. But not all of them know all the thoughts and deeds of all the people, but only of some of them. That’s why they too wait with tremble for the great revelation upon creation and its consequences. This is because of that revelation not having only a theoretical character, by showing how God wanted the creation to become and what the people have made of creation, but it will have as consequence the apparition of new form of existence of the reality. Christ enters, through His second coming and through His judgment, a new relation with the creation, unveiling His greatness which He didn’t fully unveil before. This will be a new revelation of the glory which He elevated the mankind at, and in the same time it will be a fuller showing of God through en-humanity¹⁷⁰.” (Stăniloae 1997: 297-298)

“The unveiling of the creation too, it can be understood increasingly more in the light of the spiritual understanding of the Scripture and, above all, of the Christian teaching. This unveiling isn’t a monovalent one. In it are manifested in the same time the rationalities of the divine Providence and Judgment, whose knowledge is achieved on a higher level of the spiritual life. The Providence’s rationalities are the luminous side of the creation’s development in time, and those of the Judgment are the shadow side. This unveiling brings in the light, during its unfolding, positive aspirations and values which are the expression of the dynamic rationalities, of the force-ideas of the Providence. Often, the times of prosperity and of striving for good are followed by sufferance periods, which are on one hand the effect of ¹⁷⁰ We have created this term similarly to the term en-hypostatizing, in order to translate at least partially, the term omenitate created by Father Professor PhD Academician Dumitru Stăniloae, a term expressing in Romanian language the result of the general features of the human being. A facile translation it would have been to use the term humanity, but if that was the case, the entropy would be too accentuated. As the term en-hypostatization expresses the fact that Christ has taken at His embodiment all the general characteristics of the human being, except the sin, and in Him, though He is a defined Person, there are recapitulated all the human persons, by using the en-humanity term we intend to express the fact that Christ God is man, having all the characteristics of a human being, except the sin.

some irrational actions of some passionate factors, and on the other hand they are the manifestation of the punishments from God, which have their rationalities, aiming to avert the world from evil. But the Providence and the Judgment, in history, they not only alternate according to époques, but they are sometimes mixed too. There are introduced sometimes in the development of a human life new ideas and social regimes, through harsh means.” (Stăniloae 1992: 187)

“The people are often deceived by their opinions about the deeds of their contemporaries, or about the deeds committed by people during history. The sure knowledge of the truth about everybody’s deeds, it is given to the people through the judgment to be made by Christ at the end of the history, namely the judgment of the world’s present way of existence. And such a knowledge of the truth about the human deeds must take place, somewhen, namely at their end, end that coincided to the end of the history, or to the end of the people’s work which they prepare through, to themselves, an eternal happy reward or an eternal unhappiness. The whole power of the lie of many, who deceive other and on themselves, it will come to an end. It will cease the deceitfulness, willing one or imposed by others, which they take the evil as good through, or the good as evil. This deceitfulness cannot last forever – it would be, at its turn, a thing contrary to existence’s meaning. According to the Savior’s sayings, the lie has the devil as its father, who contrives the lie and who upholds the lie in order to uphold the evil. The enemy cannot have this power forever. The enemy, as “father of the lie”, he won’t be able to endlessly lead people to their spiritual death (Jn. 8: 44). The lie must be separated from lie, at a given time. One must notice that only the Christian faith has a teaching about such a highlighting of the truth about all the human deeds at the end of all the people’s possibilities of working at the mode which their eternity will be like, and eternity which there will no longer be any possibility of changing, because such a possibility would have been equal to the continuation of the time and of the worries which would have been contrary to the ceaseless resting. This would have meant an existence’s lack of meaning too. The absence of a final judgment of the human deeds in other religions and philosophies than the Christendom, it equals a lack of the eternity, or to an endless continuation of the time, either for other and other persons dying definitively, or for their reincarnation in all sort of individuations. And these equal, at their turn, to an eternal non-showing of the truth about the human deeds, namely to a depreciation of the human persons’ value. And this would have meant the remaining of the entire existence in an absence of the light or in a meaningless darkness. One won’t ever know at all any truth. Without a final judgment made by God Who is above the world Who is about all the deeds, and Who discerns what is good from what is evil in the human deeds, the freedom of the human persons wouldn’t have existed, but everything would have remained under a law which all the things are mixed up in, endlessly.

The ideas of justice, of responsibility, of good, and of evil, they would have been purposeless.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 111-112)

“In order to specify the importance of the final judgment for everybody to be dressed up in luminous light, there must be noticed two characteristics of the final judgment:

a. The final judgment is made by God-the Word Whom all the things have been created through, and Who, by embodying Himself as man, He has done everything for the people’s salvation from death, and for moving the people to the eternal life. Only God know what importance He has given the man through both of those;

b. This judgment is made by God-the Word, as embodied man, having in all the people the angels too – the angels having a purpose in the people gathered in front of Christ Jesus at the final judgment. The special value granted to the people, as creatures concentrating around themselves the entire life, it is shown into the embodiment of the Son of God, in His sacrifice and in His resurrection for the people, as also in His judgment which He will Make, as man.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 112-113)

“God-the Word is entitled to make that judgment, namely to project the full light upon the deeds of the human creatures, as One Who can judge, for all the creatures have been created according to their role-model which is in God-the Word Himself. And it is right He to judge the people, not only like the One Who taught the people and who give the people, through His sacrifice and resurrection, the power the people to be saved, but also as the One Who, being man, He understands the people’s weaknesses and that’s why He doesn’t ask for the people what they wouldn’t have been able to give, even while helped by Him. The Son of man judges the people. But at that judgment, Christ will show Himself not only as the One Who understands the people, for He has made Himself man, but also as the One Who has made Himself as our Brother and Who rejoices for the good done to His brothers and disapproves the evil done by some people to other people, and that’s why He will reward the good-doers with the happiness of the eternal communion with Him, and he will let the others as they have made themselves, in the contrary to communion state. It is a main reason why the ones who would prepare themselves for communion, by helping other people, they will enjoy the communion with all the people. Thus, the justice of Christ will be shown also in the fact that the people will judge one another for that. And is Christ Himself Who has brought to the people the model and the power for achieving this communion amongst themselves. The people will be gathered together at the final judgment, in order each one to enjoy the praise from everybody for the good they did to some people, or in order to endure the evil they did to other people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 112-113)

“The fact that each person will benefit, at the final judgment, of everything the generations from after him used from his deeds, and this will be seen in the general joy about each one, it is a reason why the Orthodox Church reckons that the entire happiness will be had by everybody only at the final common judgment, unlike the Catholic Church which doesn’t reckon that. The entire light of the love it is shown in the fact that I cherish a light in all the other people and in everybody’s love for me, in order to unveils the love of God that worked within all people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 112-113)

“At the final judgment, Lord Christ won’t take in account only the justice, but the mercy too. But He won’t show His mercy to the ones who won’t beg Him for mercy. But somebody cannot ask for the mercy of God only at the final judgment. This is because then won’t change anything of what happened during the life on earth. That’s why Saint Simeon urges the people to pray to Christ for Him to be merciful to them while they still live their life on earth, before dying. If the people pray to Christ for His mercy, while they are still living, then they will be able to pray Him at the final judgment too. This is for they have been accustomed while alive for having Christ’s mercy in their souls. That’s why, only the ones who have been repenting for their evil deeds while still in this life, though maybe not fully, they will benefit from the prayers the people still living in this live will utter for them.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 116)

“By and large, the one staring to pray to Christ while still in this life, in order Christ to have mercy on him at the final judgment, that man does it because of repenting for his sins. That means a beginning of illumination of that man, since this life. But such a man realizes that only through the mercy Christ has had for him, that light or that eternal life will come to him. That’s why, Sava the Hermit, who lived in the IV Century, he saw in the repentance of somebody for his sins a beginning of illumination. And that is for that man realizes that only through the forgiveness that Christ will give him, the meaning of his life will be accomplished. This happened also on Pentecost with the first members of the Church. But the light which the man has through repentance isn’t only from himself, but it is from God too. Until the man still lives in this life, the helplessness of the body does not allow him to receive the whole light which the man will receive at the final judgment, for the eternal life, when the man will receive the light in his transfigured body. That’s why Saint Simeon said that through the Final Judgment the man will cross to the consummate light. Actually, to the alone soul, before the general resurrection, it is not shown the whole light which the man will receive after the universal judgment. That’s why the Orthodox Church teaches that the whole happiness, and therefore also the whole light, it will be received by the man only after the final judgment and not immediately after the man’s death. The man will receive the whole happiness and the whole light for he will rejoice in front of everybody and seen by everyone and cherished for what he secretly did good in his life. And he will also rejoice for his repentance. The individual cannot have the whole light of the whole joy except in communion with everybody.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 117-118)

“Saint Evangelist John presents the purpose of the embodiment of the Son of God, as being the filling up with light, through Christ’s resurrected body, of all the ones who will believe in Him and who will imitate His deeds of love, for God and for their fellow humans. That’s why the ones who won’t receive Christ, they will remain in darkness or in the lack of joy because their missing the eternal communion with God and with their fellow humans and, so, they will remain in the life’s lack of meaning. Of this consists the judgment or the damnation of the one who do not receive Christ. Only the faith that God has a Son, namely that within God there is love, and that God makes, His beloved Son, man for eternity, in order to show His love, forever, to the people too, only this can give, actually, a joy and a meaning to the people’s life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 201)

“On this peak of happiness through resurrection, the human being won’t reach alone, after his death, but all the people will reach there, at the end of the present form of universe’s existence. This is for the happiness is a universal communion, a rejoicing of each human being for each human being. But this happiness will be given as gift, to some human being, and it will be denied to other human beings, on the ground of a general judgment. At that judgment, it will be condemned, or, on the opposite, it will be praised forever, what the people from before history did for elevating of for degrading their descendants, and to what extent their descendants prayed for the sins of their ancestors, and thus they were able to remove, through their good deeds, the evil deed of their ancestors, on the basis of the communication, out of love, between them and those ones. The ancestors will be saved through the good influences they left upon their descendants, and the descendants will be saved and they will contribute to their ancestors’ salvation, through their good deeds and through their prayers for their ancestors, and also through their own good influences they exercise upon their own descendants coming to existence after them, and through their prayer and deeds for those ones. This will show the purpose of the generations’ succession within history, or it will highlight the history’s purpose itself, as successive humanity called to advance – but not forcedly – towards its supreme consummation into God, this call being addressed, mostly, in a solidary manner. The history will be shown as solidary through the reciprocal good or evil, done to one another, by the previous and by the later generations. But the deeds for the ancestors and for the descendants cannot but to be also deeds for the contemporary people. Thus, we prepare ourselves for the kingdom of the eternal love amongst us.” (Stăniloae 1995: 200)

“At the final judgment, the good human beings will become fully transparent in their bodies, and the evil human beings will show their total opaqueness – an opaqueness not so much material, but rather as spiritual darkness -, an opaqueness equal to their loneliness, to their egotism, and to their enmity, which they manifested into history, no matter the time which they live in. The ones from the end, they will be condemned not for their bad influence upon their descendants, but for the lack of their prayers and altruistic deeds done for their contemporaries, and for their predecessors. We must spiritually grow up through our love for all the people. All of us are indebted to all the people. We will be saved and taken into the Kingdom of Love, or we will be condemned to schizophrenic loneliness, for what we have done or for what we haven’t done to and for everybody. This highlights each human being’s importance as a light source, or as source of darkness, of hatred, and of deceit, in the history of the mankind, no matter how insignificant one would be, because, through his influence into history, he has become cause of damnation or reason for salvation, to himself and to others.” (Stăniloae 1995: 200-201)

“The spiritual transparency of the people through their bodies, one shown at the final judgment, it depends on their transparency while they lived in the present universe. The kind human beings will fully lighten then, by communicating themselves more. The evil human beings will cover themselves in darkness and they will become their own impediment in communication.” (Stăniloae 1995: 201)

“It is impossible that the present universe not to tend towards a target of its consummation, a target that cannot be except a full revelation of its beauties into the Holy Ghost. Only the movement towards such a target of the universe’s total transparence to God and of total illumination by God, it can reveal the universe’s meaning as work of art created through the Word into His Ghost, in order the universe to be increasingly filled up with the Holy Trinity.

This will be “the new sky and the new earth which the righteousness is living in” (II Pt. 13; Apoc. 21: 1), or the life of communion in love. These ones will be brought not through an evolutive transformation, but after much social turmoil, depending on the people’s will, and on a demonic influence upon the people’s will, and through a fire which will detach the natural elements by burning them up and which will make the present sky to disintegrate (II Pt. 3: 10). But those things will contribute to the spiritual growth of some people, in order they to reach too, to the resurrection into happiness. Not only the human being, but also the present universe, they must cross through death in order to transcend their present state, which is submitted to some rigid laws, in order to become a transparent environment to the Person-Absolute, and the laws which the people are presently enslaved by, they will be overwhelmed by the communicative love of the Absolute, a love that will fill up the human persons too.” (Stăniloae 1995: 201)

“The resurrection of Christ it revealed us the universe’s present way of existence, as destined to coming to an end, or to transfiguration. Until Christ’s resurrection we didn’t know about this. We thought that the present way of universe-s existence, which the persons appear in and which the persons seem to definitively die in, it will last forever in its lack of meaning, as a Cronos continuously giving birth to children and then eating them. The resurrection of Christ has been shown us as the beginning of the final part of this universe’s way of existence, for Christ works to His resurrection, through His body liberated from the material universe’s rigidity, upon the present material universe, in order to elevate it on the level as environment that fits the people resurrected with their bodies for eternity. That’s why, the Apostles presented the time from after Christ’s resurrection as the final time.” (Stăniloae 1995: 201)

“The living norm which all the persons will be judged according to, it will be Christ, and this means that He will judge all of us, in order to gather us in the happy communion, whilst the ones who remained in isolation and in the isolation’s torments, they will be the ones who didn’t want to get close to Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 214)

“The Holy Fathers insists thoroughly on the complete unveiling of all the deeds and thoughts of somebody at the final judgment, in front of all the people and angels. That day will be the day of fully unveiling the truth regarding everybody, in everyone’s face. No equivocal will be then in the people’s souls, not only in what regards their state, but also regarding the state of all people. Especially concerning the last one, it will be made light within soul, for the own state it will be largely known at the individual judgment. The evil will be fully unmasked, and the good will be brought out from cover. Any equivocal will cease to exist. The regime of the tree of knowing the good and the bad it will have ended its ambiguous mastery upon world; it won’t shadow any longer the human soul and the divine plan from within the world’s history, for nobody will feed himself out of it anymore, its lie being show plainly. Each man will know the consequences his deeds had after his death and he will be judged for them and each one will know the antecedents of his good or bad deeds, in the behavior of his forerunners and he will justly know everybody’s deeds and value. Thus, the final Judgment will be also a supreme revealing of the divine plan within history, of the contribution which the people brought in order to accomplish or to impede it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 295)

“It will be not possible to pronounce a judgment upon us without to be implicitly pronounced also upon others. That is why, the final judgment cannot be but universal. We will be judged through the showing of the effects of our deeds until the end of the history and, together with the judgment upon us it will come the judgment upon so many forerunners and successors.

We have here one more reason why we cannot be resurrected one by one, because the resurrection coincides to the judgment. Only Jesus, who has not to endure together with us this judgment, He has resurrected alone, before everybody. Only Jesus, the Lord of our salvation, and the One Who prepares us the eternal happiness, He could rise up with His body, earlier. We, like people, we must reflect in this solidarity too, our sinfulness.

Jesus, like God, He raises Himself above this solidarity, and on the other hand, by being also a man, He remains though into a close connection with us. He is raised upon us only to prepare us, while we are still here, for our elevation to that perfect form of existence. He is also after His sacrifice on cross and through resurrection and through rising, the Mediator.

The solidarity with us He showed it through the fact that after His resurrection He spent, though, forty days amongst us, from which it results that also after those forty days He had been maintaining a connection with us until the end of the history.

But, the difference from us, His raising above us, but in favor of us, are shown not only in the fact that He has resurrected, but also because He has ascended to heaven after those forty days.

What does the ascension mean, and why did He ascend to heavens? Why He hasn't prolonged the form of the presence of those forty days until the end of the world? With these questions, we pass to the chapter about Christ's ascension to heavens.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The righteousness or the worthlessness of the man, it is not unveiled in their fullness but according to what his words and his deeds shown their fruits like, into their descendants. God knows those words and deeds from before, so that He could judge right, at the death of everyone. But the divine judgment is right, not only for it leans on the authority of God, but for it imposes to the conscience of the man, to see himself that he was not disadvantaged. The man himself must contemplate all his deeds and their consequences. But the man, by not being endowed with foreknowledge, he cannot see these consequences but only after it was consumed the life of his followers. The life of these ones is not unveiled in its fullness but only after they will see, themselves, at their turn, the consequences of their deeds and so on. Only at the final judgment, where will be present all the people and it will be established to each of them what is influence from other and what is own contribution, it could be utter the full right judgment. The mankind is, in fact, a multiple unity, tied through all kind of wires.

Thereby, the forerunners will be judged for what they brought good and for what they brought bad in their life and in their endeavor, to the conscience of the followers. A good fructification into the descendants, though, it is the amplification of the understanding of the divine Revelation. Consequently, also from this point of view, the final judgment won't be a simple speaking over each individual taken separately, but also a judgment over the total result of the endeavors of the mankind into history.

Only in this vision the culture gains an important meaning. In association with the faith the culture determines the state of conscience which the mankind must continue after death its existence with. If there hadn't been life after the grave, the culture wouldn't have made any sense. If, in the end, the mankind had totally, and from everywhere, disappeared, and there hadn't been a conscience which to evaluate the human culture and to enjoy it, which to be widened and elevated forever and ever, what importance could have still had?

The culture is important only if the mankind will pass from history in an eternal life, and it will carry with itself the total result of the spiritual endeavor from here." (Stăniloae 1993)

"This exam cannot be avoided: it must be answered, positively or negatively. Through the impediment of the multiplication of the people, the exam is not avoided, but it is answered negatively. Any way to avoid the exam or to answer differently than positively, namely through love, it is considered a negative answer and it means the total falling in the spiritual death through the killing of brothers, like the most awful sin. The positive or the negative answer to this exam is not a momentarily one, but it is for the entire history. Even if the negative answer reaches only a moment of the history, so generally that it produces the total spiritual death of the people, it has been given by the entire history. If people have reached today to consider the contraception - or any other sins against the fellow human - as an easy thing, a big part of the guilt is worn by all the ancestors who through theories and practices have produced this atmosphere of spiritual decomposition. Like the ancestors who have preceded with the belief and with their god seeding deed they will endlessly impart by all the history has realized into the direction of the good, in the same way the ancestors who seeded the evil will be endless burdened of all the condemnable fruit of the history. From all the saying from above results that history will not end through the force of predestination, into evil. The Apocalypse does not prescribe like an unavoidable will of God, its frowning end.

If the mankind grew up in spirit on the measure of the ever-harder exam imposed by its multiplication, it would reach such a consummation than the passing into heavenly union with God it would be made easier. Probably in this case the ones ripen in evil they would be fewer and the tone of the time of the history's end it would be given by the progress into good.

We have presented in this problem an example that the themes of the history are the ones given by the Revelation into Jesus Christ. Either takes a positive or a negative attitude towards them, the history is driven by God on the road which forces the history to struggle exactly with the themes implied by the Revelation and this is for the reason that the Revelation has pulled out just the most essential and deep faces of the reality. After two thousand years from the time Jesus Christ has unveiled Himself to mankind, like the most valuable reality, the face of the fellow human, the history finds that its biggest theme is that one of the men, and of the means to support the man into existence. All the doctrines of the new forms of states they represent a titanic effort to solve the big problems caused by the multiplication of the people and by their needs. Despite all of these, the exclusivist passions and the exaggeration of the material pretensions show that these doctrines are not on the right track. And their persistence into a wrong attitude, into such a huge problem, it may have catastrophic consequences, as such as making the peaceful continuation of the history impossible.

We could remind here another theme related to the one from before, which the mankind from today has reached in the phase that it must answer it. It is the theme which Jesus Christ, like King-Lamb, like Leader and Lord Who gains His authority upon souls and the right to lead them, through sacrifice and love, He has given it to the mankind, and which only today imposes us with all the force. It is the theme of social organization, which the leaders to remark themselves in, through their special capacity of love and sacrifice for the ruled ones. Our time could no longer avoid this theme. The human conscience has been developed on the line set by the divine Revelation and indicated by Jesus Christ like King-Lamb.

But, no matter how much it is forced to assume this theme and to recognize the justness of the Christian answer, through the fact that it wants to imitate it, the mankind from today it seems not to be, even in this concern, able to give a Christian honest answer. Its answer is rather a distortion of the Christian answer. And without an authentic Christian answer it cannot find equilibrium of cohabitation and social organization.

But whatever would be the state which the mankind will arrive to, at the end of the history, on the basis of its decision related to the themes proposed by the revelation and by the reality, the fact is that when it will take place an intervention of Jesus Christ, through which "(Apoc. 20: 10) (...) the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophets are, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever”.

The satanic will, it is going to be ejected from the human community. The righteous ones no longer are going to be forced to endure this evil will or its plots.

They will be overcome, together with Jesus, so totally upon the satanic power, so that it is going to be fully and definitively banished from them and locked into the lake of fire. This collapse of the satanic power will coincide to the full revealing of Jesus Christ at His second coming. Then He won't come hidden into humbleness and human patience, but into the unmistakable showing of His godlike power. The time of free decision for Him or against Him will have passed. In the first time He came hidden into humbleness not to force anyone, through the constraining glory of the unveiled godhead, in order to be accepted. But after everyone has freely decided into history and the history itself in general – which becomes inutile or impossible by this – for Him or against Him, He will come unveiled and His showing will be a strike of lightening to the ones who will realize now that they were not into the truth¹⁷¹.

His showing will be the condemnation of them and the coronation of the ones who believed. The collapse of the unbelievers will mean also the collapse of Satan, who will lose all his courage - and also the courage of his adherents to work for their target it will be abolished.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁷¹ Louis Lavelle develops in his book “De l'Acte”, insistently, the theory that the Universe is a given which we do not notice but only if we also give ourselves, through our thought, feeling, through our love. Through our spiritual activity we discover more and more aspects of the Universe. But also vice versa: through our lack of love for it, through the lack of the positive will towards reality, the Universe, though present in itself like a given from God, it gradually disappears to us, it sinks into nebulousity. Each thing – though existent in itself – we must actualize it personally in order to really know it. In this way, all the contours are fading. “En ce sens nous pouvons dire que le donné, c'est nous qui nous le donnons et c'est pour cela qu'il s'évanouirait un seul moment de le soutenir par un acte qui le pose » (p. 295). « On peut se servir ici encore une fois de la comparaison du regard qui tient tout le réel devant lui de telle sorte que, pour peu qu'il s'obscurcisse, le réel recule et se dissipe » (p. 304). « Le sensible à son tour présente d'autant plus de délicatesse et d'éclat que l'acte qui le saisit à lui-même plus de force et plus de subtilité ; mais il ne peut être que saisi par nous ; et ni l'attention la plus aigüe ne suffit à la produire ni le schématisme le plus savant des opérations mathématique ne réussit à en tenir lieu. Il faut toujours qu'il soit pour nous un rencontre par laquelle l'acte même qui le recherche trouve sa récompense, et prouve en quelque sorte sa valeur ontologique » (p. 305). The hell would be the radicalization of this fading into darkness of the entire Universe for the ones who had not love for anything else but for themselves. The Universe exists like a mean of communication between men and God and between the human persons. (“Et le monde sensible est précisément l'intermédiaire par lequel ils (les êtres) communiquent et ne cessent de se manifester les uns aux autres une présence intentionnelle » p. 309). To the ones who no longer search for the communion, the Universe makes no sense or it has no meaning. Each of them will enjoy the light of the reality, by the happiness of the connection with it into the measure into which he has searched for it and has accomplished, as state for the life from beyond, the connection with God and with the fellow human creature. In the Romanian language the universe is called “world”, for the reality stays in light and sighting. The darkness is one with the absence of the reality.

Justice and Righteousness

“If everybody had fought the spiritual fight with themselves, it would have been accomplished not only the justice or the equality in the spiritual order, but it would have been accomplished also the true justice in the external order.” (Stăniloae 2003: 261-262)

“The spiritual man wants to accomplish amongst people not only an interior justice, but also an exterior one. This is for he knows that the exterior injustice can impede the love amongst people to be accomplished, and therefore it can impede the interior justice too. But the exterior justice is not the ultimate goal, but the justice in the spiritual order it is above the exterior justice.” (Stăniloae 2003: 263)

“The true justice will also mean the restoring of the full equilibrium amongst all the created things, this equilibrium being the full reflex of the justice of God Who loves all the created things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 263)

“The justice, as a due relation amongst us and between us and God, being a reality and a full reciprocal honoring, it is the condition for an open and unimpeded communication. The righteous one has no reason to hide himself, as the unjust and the wronged ones have, for hiding their thought to one another.” (Stăniloae 2003: 263)

“The justice of God will fill up the earth by the fact that it will be shown both from the part of God and from our part. Only thus the intention of God to fill up the world with justice it will be truly accomplished: by irradiating both out of us and from above us. Only thus the world will truly become “the Kingdom of God, which is justice and peace and joy into the Holy Ghost” (Rom. 14: 17).” (Stăniloae 2003: 265)

“Saint Apostle Paul gives the “justice from God” a rich meaning, a plenary one, a meaning of new life having its source in Christ, the One Who is within us and Who gives us this life through His Ghost, but asking for our effort too. This can be seen by studying the context which the Apostle Paul uses the most often the term “justice” in. We give a few examples regarding this: “End if Christ is within you, the body will be dead to sins, but the ghost will live for righteousness. And if the Ghost of the One Who resurrected Christ from death dwells within you, the One Who has resurrected will make you bodies alive too, by His Ghost Who dwells within you” (Rom. 8: 10-11). Our body is dead in what regards the impulses towards sin, but just by this it is alive for the clean feelings, by the power of the Ghost of the dead and resurrected Christ Who dwells within you. This one is moved by the Ghost of Christ through his own ghost, which is resurrected, right from now, into Christ, in order him to assimilate the righteousness which he has out of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 139-140)

“The same plenary meaning is had by the terms: “the righteousness of God” and “the transposing in the righteousness state” in other places from Saint Paul’s Epistles. In II Cor. 5: 21, he said: “On the one Who didn’t have sin, He made Him as sin for us, for us to know the righteousness of God into Him”. In Christ, the humanity is the real justice, the embodiment of the righteousness; and we, for we are into Him, we are righteousness too, in the same plenary, ontological meaning, which He is in too. That’s why Saint Paul asks us, in continuation, not to vainly receive the gift, but to live a without blemish life, into the Holy Ghost (II Cor. 6: 1, 17). The grace we are given for Christ, it becomes to us cause “of obedience towards righteousness”, no longer being us slaves of the sin, for “escaped from the sin’s slavery, you have become slaves to the righteousness” (Rom. 6: 16, 18). It is obvious that the righteousness is a state opposed to the state of sin. The one who has received Christ’s gift, he mustn’t any longer let “his limbs to be servants of the uncleanness and of the lawlessness, but he must make them servants of the righteousness, towards sanctification” (Rom. 6: 19). Righteousness is the comprising name for the state contrary to the sin state.” (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

“The one who receives the righteousness state through Christ, he has the power to no longer commit the sin, a power which the one who searched for his righteousness through the deeds of the law – namely by his own powers - had not. If the one who has received the righteousness state through Christ, he had necessarily committed the sin, then it would have meant that Christ Who dwells in Him is sinner too: “And if, while searching to be made righteous into Christ, we would be sinners too, is Christ servant to the Sin? Let it not be! Because, if I build up again what I have crumbled down (the sinner life, o. n.) I prove myself to be a sinner. But I have died by law, to the law, in order to life to God. I crucified myself with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me” (Gal. 2: 17-20).” (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

“Out of my deeds I couldn’t obtain the righteousness, for I had only my power. That’s why I died because of transgressing the law, being submitted to the condemning power of the law. But now I am living, for Christ is living in me and out of His power I can fulfill the law. “But I through law I died towards the law, to be alive for God” (Gal. 2: 19). Only for I have become alive and strong into Christ, now I can really fulfill everything the law commands as good. This is for “the law is holy, and the command is holy, and righteous, and good..., but the sin, in order to be proven as sin, it has brought me death, right through what it was good” (Rom. 7: 12-13). But by receiving the gift, we can avoid sinning, and therefore we can avoid transgressing the law anymore: “What are we going to say then? Will we remain into sin, for the grace to be multiplied? God forbid that!” (Rom. 6: 1-3).”

“The righteousness which we have by grace, it is the mode of actualization of the grace in a sinless life, which we are advancing towards the eternal life through, through Jesus Christ, the upholder and the source of the righteousness within us. “So that, as the sin mastered towards death, likewise may the sin master, through righteousness, towards the eternal life, in Jesus Christ” (Rom. 5: 21).” (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

“Shortly: Christ has made Himself as our righteousness. And not an external righteousness, but an internal one, for we are into Him (I Cor. 1: 30). Christ gives us the power to be righteous, in His likeness.” (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

“This essential righteousness of the divine life has been seeded by Christ within His human nature too. (...) Christ hasn’t given a righteousness law, which to be fulfilled by the people, as the Law from the Old Testament, but Christ makes Himself as source of righteousness within people (...)” (Stăniloae 2006: 141)

“About our advancing Saint Apostle Paul wrote on many times. He recognized about himself, by and large: “Brothers, I do not reckon myself, until now, as I would have reached. But I do this: forgetting about the things from the past and stretching towards the things from the future, I am running to the target, to the crown of being called by God, into Jesus Christ.” (Phil. 3: 13-14). And this target is the consummate gaining of Christ in actualized manner Who has renounced to all the things. Only by having Him, he has, not the haughty justice from the law, which is not life, but the righteousness from God, which is the power to die towards all the things and of knowing in himself the power of Christ’s resurrection, the power of running, through renunciation to the self, and through the increasingly fuller living out of Christ and into Christ, until the resurrection from dead: “In order to gain Christ and to be I into Him, not by having my justice – that one from the law -, but what it is through the faith in Christ, the righteousness from God, built up on faith, in order to know Him and the power of His Resurrection and my partaking to His passions, by strengthening in mind His death, only to reach I the resurrection from dead” (Philip. 3: 9-11).” (Stăniloae 2006: 142)

“The state of righteousness, which will culminate into glory, it is the right state of the man. As culminant state of glory it was shown for the first time on the face of Christ-the Man. And through the direct relation with Him, by looking at Him, it gradually is reflected on everybody’s faces of the ones who look at Him with love and who show their love by fulfilling His commandments. The glory is no longer covered to them and not-communicated to them, as it was covered by a veil on the face of Moses. It is really incorporated in Christ-the Man and, due to that, it is being communicated. This is for God Himself has entered through Christ the direct relation with us and He no longer frightens us by His distance. The glory of God shown on Christ's face it is the endless love of God entered in direct relation with us, come amongst us, with its supreme condescendence. Any person communicates to the ones who he enters the relation with, if he is truly loving, a certain glory and power. The glory of Christ communicated to us, to the ones who are in relation with Him, by believing Him, it is endless and it doesn't scare us, but it manifests a great intimacy towards us. The ones who look at Christ and who persevere in communion with Him, they always become more "righteous", more imprinted by the Christ's glory, by Christ Himself as model: "And we with our face uncovered, by reflecting as a mirror the Lord's glory, we are transformed in the same image, from glory to glory, as from the Lord's Ghost" (II Cor. 3: 18)." (Stăniloae 2006: 142-143)

Kenosis

“By manifesting His power outside Himself, in order to elevate to the communion with Himself, or towards the good, other persons, God sets in work, out of His almightiness, the power for creating some persons who are limited in being and in their natural power, and the gradual granting of His uncreated power, on the measure of their capability to use it, in order to not be overwhelmed by that power. This is the kenosis or the descent of God in the manifestation of His power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 227)

“God descends and He is worshipped freely, namely not being forced, in His manifestations, by any internal law, neither by any external law, in order to give the subjects, the possibility of freely manifest themselves, the possibility of freely accepting the communion with Him. This is for the condition of the communion is the freedom of the ones who are accomplishing it. The kenosis of God is therefore the condition of extending His internal communion, as Good, with other person than the Divine Persons. But, on one hand, just this voluntary descent in order to extend the good or the communion, it is the sign of His absolute liberty and power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 227)

“The kenosis accepted by God, it isn’t an identical, definitive state. God descends to creatures in order to elevate them increasingly higher towards Himself, and to say so, Himself goes up in granting some increasingly higher degrees of power, and therefore of manifestation of His power. The eternal reserve of this constantly higher giving it is His almightiness. Thus, the power God has given to the creation, having as its purpose the ascension of the creation to participate directly to His uncreated power, or to His energies, it is also a condition of the almightiness of God with the creation, by being this power given to the creation also solidary with the time and with the space.” (Stăniloae 2003: 228)

“In this reciprocal total going out – and therefore stabile – of the godlike Persons, it is given the possibility of their common movement towards the creatures as persons, by being accomplished the love as Each One’s going out to Another. God wants to reach the created person, or to His union with the created person, not only by His ecstasy towards the created person, but also by the created person’s ecstasy towards Him. Although the creature, through his being, is in Him, through his insufficient love the creature still is at a distance from God and, therefore, God does a kenosis by descending to the creature and by accepting the creature to be at a certain distance from Him, and to contribute the creature to that distance’s decreasing by his will. This is for, in order to accomplish a love also with the created being, God has brought to existence not only a world of objects, but also a world of subjects, which are from Him at a distance they can decrease or increase it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 289)

“The ‘multi-diverse wisdom’ (Eph. 3: 10) it means not only multi-diversity, but also sensitive multi-diversity. This is a more accessible way of revealing God on behalf of the man, which means a greater closeness of God to the man, a greater interest in the man and in the man’s problems into body, a manifestation of a greater love for the people. It is a Revelation through sensitivity, through the multiform-ness of the spiritual beauty, through acts done on the plan of the sensitive reality; it is a Revealing of God through a greater kenosis and, just by that, a manifestation of a greater love.” (2003: 441)

“In order the Son of God to fill up the human nature with His “glory, “glory like of One born out of the Father, full of grace and truth” (Jn. 1: 14), He had to make, the human nature, “His own” through Embodiment, namely to make on Himself of the human nature’s Hypostasis. This “impropriation” it means humbling of the nature of God, or the so-called “kenosis”, or His “emptying” of the glory he had is before embodiment (Jn. 17: 5).” (Stăniloae 2006: 29)

“Saint Apostle Paul said directly that, by the fact that the Son of the Rich God, He made poor on Himself, for us, we have been imparted with His richness, for thus His richness has reached us. If He hadn’t descended to our possibilities of receiving His richness, He wouldn’t have enriched us, but either He would have left us like we were, or He had been abolished us through His manifested almightiness. His descent is the condition of meeting us on the level we can receive His richness. His descent is the condition for our deification.” (Stăniloae 2006: 29)

“In the descent of the Son of God one can discern two stages: one is previous to the Embodiment - the Son of God accepted to make man on Himself; in the next stage, continuing the first one, God take our suffering upon Himself. Besides, the last one is implied in the first one, given the exposed to passions condition of the man, for God has made man on Himself not in order to abolish the content of our features as human being. He has taken our passions to overcome them from within. (...) the Son of God, on one hand, He gives the body godlike power, and on the other hand, he endures the body’s sufferings.” (Stăniloae 2006: 29)

“Saint Cyril of Alexandria, in accord with the affirmations made by Saint Apostle Paul, he considered that the kenosis doesn’t refer to the humanity the Son of God assumed, but it refers to the Son of God Himself. Saint Cyril saw this “emptying” as an argument for the union of the two natures in a Person, or for assuming the human nature in His godlike Hypostasis. If there had been in Christ two persons, one godlike and one human, the Son of God wouldn’t have emptied on Himself and He would have remained in an exterior relation with the man. If this had been the case, neither the man had been able to empty on himself, because of being his nature assumed in the Hypostasis of God-the Word, and this would have been rather honored by this. Only God-the Word humbled on Himself through Embodiment. But in this case we must admit that God-the Word has become, de facto, the Hypostasis of the human nature. Of course, the “emptying” of God-the Word in the human nature it attracted also the godlike nature in some humbleness, which wouldn’t have taken place without assuming the human nature in the divine Hypostasis. But this “humbling” it differs from the “emptying” of the Son of God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 29)

“The idea of Saint Cyril, that the emptying refers to the Son of God, and not to His humanity, it isn’t contradicted by the general opinion expressed by the Holy Fathers that the Godhead wasn’t able to assume our sufferings. This is because not the godlike nature became suffering through this, but the Person of the godlike nature, for He has become also the Person of the human nature. On the other hand, the power Christ endured the sufferings with, without crossing through sufferings to sin, he has is by the fact He is the Son of God, bearer of the godlike nature. Through this one he has the power to endure the human sufferings. The godlike nature’s dispassion mustn’t be understood as indifference or as helplessness to participate to the human things through its Hypostases. Even such a helplessness of participation it would be a narrowing or a suffering. (...) God is, as Person, free for participation too, or, better said, for strengthening the suffering ones. One can say, therefore, that the sufferings belong to the human nature and, in the same time, that the Son of God has impropriated the sufferings for he has made man on Himself, not in order to fall under the sufferings’ power, but in order to overcome the sufferings with His power. He has impropriated the sufferings and he has shown His freedom and His power of overcoming the weakness which our nature succumbs under the sufferings with.” (Stăniloae 2006: 29-30)

“The kenosis consists just in the impropriation of our nature, in the whole clean bearing of the pains, by God-the Word. Without this, the Son of God couldn’t have been able to make a true man on Himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 30)

“Saint Cyril pulls out of kenosis also an argument that the Son of God, by assuming our humanity, he has remained, in the same time, the Son of God, for, otherwise, who and why it would be know that Himself is the One Who works the humble things and that he suffers through His humanity? Likewise, if He hadn’t remained the Son of God, how would He have been able to overcome the endured sufferings, in order to cast out the suffering affects from our nature and to deify our nature? Through this, Saint Cyril rejected, in advance, the Protestant kenotic theories which appeared during the 19th Century, according to which the Son of God for the time He lived on earth, through Embodiment, He renounced to His godlike: almightiness, pervasiveness, knowledge, and conscience.” (Stăniloae 2006: 30)

“The kenosis consists in the fact that the Son of God has impropriated Himself, He has made His own, the human nature and its weaknesses, but not being these ones imprinted by sin. But what this impropriation consists in, it is a mystery. This mystery expresses the intimate report between the divine Hypostasis and the human nature. If in the divine Hypostasis the human nature is being actualized, or if He becomes the composed Hypostasis of the godlike and human natures, one and the same Subject will commit and suffer, in a real manner, all the human things; but He is, in the same time, lacking the passions. The same Subject, or Hypostasis, He lives and suffers, in a real manner, the body’s things, but he also works wonders through the body, in a real manner, and He makes His body life-giver. Therefore, if the One Hypostasis fills up the body with godlike power, he also suffers the body’s things – but He suffers them with power and due to this he overcomes them. Saint Cyril insists more upon the body’s deification through embodiment. Our body which we live it mostly as lacking a transparence, to His is life-maker, being receiver of godlike life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 30)

“Consequently, to the assuming of our nature by the Son of God, assuming which is the first act of His kenosis (as we can see in the Epistle towards Philippians 2: 7-9), it follows a kenosis in continuation, it follows the obedience as man and the bearing of the human needs (the irreproachable affects of hunger, of thirst, of sleep, the fear of death, the pain etc.) and suffering the death itself. In all of these it was shown the acceptance of the suffering feature of our nature, except for the sin. These ones aren’t a kenosis of the human nature. This is because the human nature has these ones by itself. This is a kenosis of God-the Word Who accepted to suffer them all.” (Stăniloae 2006: 30)

“In the enduring the sufferings, Jesus proves Himself to be “the strong man”, the restored man in his real strength. That’s why, in the Eastern way of painting, the Crucified Christ isn’t Christ fallen in the last state of weakness, for in East the cross is conceived as occasion for strengthening the human nature, or of strengthening the spirit from within the human nature, and not as simple satisfaction given to God for the offence the people brought to Him, a satisfaction shown in the acceptance of man’s self-annulling, understood as weakness at its ultimate limit. In East, accepting death in front of God it is understood as strength too. That’s why the death Jesus endured it was in the same time an occasion of manifesting the power, through which has been defeated by the Son of God in body and with the collaboration of the strengthened body. This is because the body too, it can be strong in enduring the sufferings, by the power it was given by the Son of God, from the part of His godlike nature. Thus, between the powers given to the human nature, in doing healings, the body becomes able to be an instrument of the healings and of its resurrection as ultimate stage on this line. So, the Word of God, by accepting this humbling of the body, on the other hand, it strengthens the body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 31)

“The sufferings weren’t a simple characteristic of the human nature, but they were an expression of the kenosis of the Son of God become man Who suffers in order to save the people, and Who gives his nature the power to suffer, by doing this. Thus, one can understand how the kenosis of the Son of God, though it is sufferance, it has in the same time a deifying effect upon the human nature, but not without the human nature’s collaboration. The role of the kenosis it consists just in this: in giving the possibility of the direct participation of the Son of God to the strengthening of the human nature, in order to make the human nature an active environment of the godlike life through the manifestation of power and by enduring and overcoming the passions.” (Stăniloae 2006: 31)

“In enduring the sufferings is being manifested, on the level the human can participate to it, the godlike power. And in committing wonders His humanity participates to the same godlike power, namely by being strengthened by the power of the godlike Word. That’s why they are so tightly connected than it cannot exist one without another, and only together they achieve the full liberation (from sin) and deification of the human nature. It is not free a human nature which cannot endure and overcome by enduring them, the sufferings, and it cannot consummate itself a human nature without overcoming within it, through patience, the sufferings. When enduring them, the man is already above the sufferings.” (Stăniloae 2006: 32)

“The kenosis of the Son of God was due also to the fact that the human nature couldn’t have been able to endure Him if he had shown Himself in the whole glory and power of His.” (Stăniloae 2006: 32)

“The kenosis of the Son of God has also the effect of abolishing from within the human nature, the egotistic disorders of the lust and of the anger, the effect of accustoming the human nature to the humbleness, to the gentleness, and to the delicacy through which can be reestablished the harmony, the respect, and the communicativeness amongst people. Through His humbleness, the Word of God has impropriated a delicate accessibility in report with them, but, by manifesting this through the human nature, he has planted in the human nature this delicate accessibility, accomplishing a real restoration of it, for He has removed from it the violence and the egotistic rudeness manifested in exaggerated lusts which do not care about others, and in outbursts of anger and in attitudes of vanity, which treat other people like some objects. But this reestablishing of the true human, or this development of the human, it coincides also to our will's agreement to the will of God Who loves the harmony amongst everybody. This state has been fully achieved in Christ through humbleness. And, in this sense, out of His power we give power at our turn." (Stăniloae 2006: 33)

"His birth out of woman, this "fulfillment of the law", it was still done under the law, in order to redeem the ones from under the law, and us to achieve the adoption (cf. Gal. 4: 5-6). Namely the Son of God has made man, on Himself, not only by creation, but also by birth, by taking thus our human nature and our affects and the corruptibility consequent to the sin, but without the sin. This placed Him under the law of these consequences, in order Him to overcome them and Him to escape thus all His brothers from under the law, or in order Him to make them, from being slaves to the law, to be sons of God and free: thus, He has done out of the kenosis of accepting the sufferings, a means of liberating from sufferings, of deification, and of our adoption." (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

"Christ is not a double hypostasis, but He is the same Hypostasis having a double quality: of God and of man. The Same being true God and true man, Christ Himself, as man, He doesn't worship by any means, on Himself; if that had been the case, he would have doubled, on Himself, as hypostasis. Even when tired, even when ignoring the day of His second coming, even in state of prayer towards the Father, even in the state of fulfiller of the commandments He gives other too, He has the conscience that He is the Son of God, in the most accentuated kenosis – he knows, on Himself, as God I state of descent." (Stăniloae 2006: 44-45)

"An aspect of the great mystery of the embodiment it is that of the way which the human nature has been received in, into the divine subject of the Logos. The second one is that of the matching of the Logos for this role. It is the great problem of the kenosis, of the humiliation, of the humbleness, of disrobing of power, and of glorification, of the Son of God, in order to be a subject on the measure of the human nature. It has been shown that the Logos, like bearer of the human possibilities and like a worker through them, He appears humbler. In the same time, He bears also the godlike powers, activating through them. What it is possible like, that the one and the same subject to be in each moment both humble and full of glory, by manifesting Himself in bordered works and in unlimited powers? What it is possible like, for instance, that one and the same subject to be in one and the same moment both limited in knowledge and unlimited? It doesn't the boundlessness of the knowledge melt down, into its blinding light, the darkness circle from around the limited knowledge?¹⁷²

For the resolution of this hardship, there have been formulated in the Protestant theology, during nineteenth century, the kenotic theories¹⁷³.

172 H. ANDRUTSOS, "The Dogmatic of the Eastern Orthodox Church", p. 196-7.

173 This term it is taken about the Greek ἐχένωσεν, meaning was emptied, and it was used by Paul the Apostle in Philippians, 2, 5-11. The first representative of the kenosis was I. Brenz in the sixteenth century. He argued that the humanity of Jesus is imparted with the features of the godlike nature, but the kenosis stays into the fact that the human nature "doesn't reveal the godlike greatness which He has, but it uses it only in a hidden way" (Bensow, Die Lehre von der Kenose, Leipzig 1903, p. 19). In the formula of Concord it is said that the human nature has made only a hidden use of the divine features which it was imparted with, and that "God had disrobed Himself also of the hidden use of the godlike features bestowed to the human nature" (Bensow, p. 23). The theologians from Giessen and Tübingen sustained in common, an acquirement of the godlike features by the human nature and the humiliation state. They differed, however, in which concerns the opinion about the use of them. The ones from Giessen sustained a depletion of use. The human nature has the godlike features, but it renounced to activate them. But, according to the godlike nature, the Logos used of them. The ones from Tübingen were recognizing a perpetual use of the godlike features in a hidden way (Bensow, p. 27). Characteristic to every one of them, it is the Luther's doctrine about the ability of the human nature to receive the godlike features. But all of them affirm the changelessness of the godlike nature. The actual kenotic theories, the ones which talk about a restriction of the godlike nature itself through embodiment, they start in the nineteenth century, with Gottfried Thomasius. According to him, the Logos no longer has two life forms - one with the godlike nature, unchanged, and one with the humiliated human nature - but only a single one. The human nature renounced to some features either to all of them, or only to their use, in order the Logos to totally transpose Himself into a human life form. According to G. Thomasius, the kenosis is a voluntarily self-limitation of the Logos, by renouncing to the actualization of His features in which He manifests Himself like Creator and Lord of the world: almightiness, omnipresence, omniscience. But He doesn't renounce to the godlike being. Into the Logos hasn't exist two consciences since the embodiment, but only one divine-human, in development. "Like gradually grows His conscience of His internal nature, it suddenly unveils Him the conscience of His divine filiation, of His report with the Father and of His calling like a Savior of the world, like during our natural and spiritual development, it appears to us, together with the conscience of the self, the conscience of our kinship with God and of our earthly destination" ("Ein Beitrag zur kirchlichen Christologie" in „Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche", Band IX, 1845, p. 263, Bensow, p. 49). Kindred theories formulated: Liebner, von Hofmann, Ebhard, Hahn, Gess, Delitzsch, Martensen etc. The Benson's doctrine deserves a special mention: The One Who has become man, He hasn't renounced to any godlike feature, but only to the form of activating them (Betätigungsform) (p. 229): "The kenosis consists of the eternal form of the activation of the features it is changed for the temporal form, and that implied that, for the possibility of developing, a descent to the state of potentiality (p. 282). Bensow considered that the being of God is love. In the sense of an unchanged love, it must be understood the changelessness of God, and not like a physical rigidity. Almightiness means the power of God to do whatever He wants. When love finds out that it can accomplish a goal better through a limitation of the manifestation of the power, it can do it, and this is also a manifestation of godlike power. Because the salvation of the man required that the Son of God to make Himself man, His supra-temporality and over-spatiality changed with the temporal and spatial form of existence. In fact, the supra-temporality of God it means His independence from time, and by no means His helplessness to enter the time, if He want to. That would be deism. The same He stays with the over-spatiality. It is only the possibility of independence from space, and not the necessity. At omniscience, in fact, He didn't renounce, but only He placed Himself into a state of gradually reached to it (p. 278-279). Like a generally basis of this changing of the activation form of God's features, under the leading and in service of love – which is the being of God – Bensow finds out that the world was created like a kingdom of power, with the destination to unify itself with something higher, at the state of the kingdom of the glory (regnum potentiae – regnum gloriae); only on this level it reflects the true being of God-the Love. But the world cannot raise at this state because of the sin. The Son of God For came the removal of these obstacles. The world has always remained a kingdom of the

Today in Germany these theories have been abandoned. They are found, though, at many Anglican theologians. Among the Orthodox theologians, the first to borrow these theories, which in fact are very much similar, is S. Bulgakov¹⁷⁴. We are going to give in the followings, an abstract of his theory, being satisfied with the information placed in his notes regarding the other representatives of the kenosis` theory.

Both of them refers to the godlike nature and to the second Hypostasis of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Without this self-diminishing, without kenosis, the abyss between God and the man would not be defeated either in Jesus Christ. Only through kenosis the godhead descends right into the bosom of the humanity, to ennoble it not from exterior, like an object, but from inside. Without kenosis the human nature could not endure the close intimacy with the godlike nature; it would have been burnt, and it would have been melted down by the too big power of the godlike nature. How could the limited human knowledge persist in the same head with the borderless knowledge of God? - or the human helplessness with His almightiness? “The godhead in Jesus was inspiring His divine-human person and it manifested in the measure in which the human nature could receive it and could contain it, but not forcing it and not outside of it, and in this it is shown the uninterrupted, the actual kenosis of the godhead, who measures Himself according to the human ones” (p. 265).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Holy Scripture talks to us, actually, about a humiliation, about a kenosis of the Logos, even by leaving apart the testimonies of his full humanity. At Matthew 13, 32, Jesus declares that He do not know the day of the final judgment. At John 17, 5, Jesus prays to God: “And now glorify Me Father with the glory (δόξα) which I had with You before the world was.” Therefore, He asked for the restitution of a glory which He didn’t have it for a while. Paul the Apostle says at Cor. II, 8, 9: Christ “impoverished Himself for you to be rich, for you to become rich with His poverty”. But the classic place of the humiliation, of the Son`s diminution, it is at Phil. 2, 5- 11: “Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, Who, by being in the power. But into this empire of power, in which is manifested the power of God – which means also a limitation to man`s liberty – it is being founded now a kingdom of the grace; the kingdom of the power must be purified by love. That`s why, God doesn`t come under the countenance of the power, but of the love, which implies the power, but still being something superior to the power (p. 282-283).

174 W. c.

form of God, thought it not as robbery to be equal to God, but He emptied (ἐκένωσεν) Himself, by taking upon Himself the form of a bondsman, and by making Himself in the likeness of men. And by being found in countenance as a man, He humbled Himself by making Himself obedient until death, and even the death on the cross. Therefore, God also has highly exalted him, and He has given Him a name which is above every name. For, in the name of Jesus, every knee should bow, of those in heaven, and of those on earth, and of those from beneath the earth. And every tongue must confess, that Lord is Jesus Christ into to the glory of God-the Father.”

But, parallel to these places and to all those which show that Jesus Christ was tired, was thirsty, was hungry, and was upset with His soul to the death, pouring blood sweat, are those which show that, though full man, like every man, He was having also manifestations which are not explained through human powers, and these manifestations which He was declaring like produced by Himself, and not like being the simple instrument of an alien superior force. He healed sick people through a word or through a gesture, He resurrected dead people, and He knew the things happening at distance (when He sent the disciples to prepare the paschal lamb). From His mouth started a multitude of declarations through which He confessed not only that He was the Son of God, but that He activated during His time on earth His divine features. He affirmed, thereby, that He was exercising the power of forgiveness of sins, that what was the Father doing He was doing that too, so that the one who saw Him, that one saw the Father (John 14, 9) because the words and the deeds which He was telling and doing, He couldn't have been told and done like a man, but He told them and did them like the Father being in Him. If He told once that nobody knows about the Doomsday, another time He declared that nobody knows the Father except Him: The Son. Therefore, though He was in the countenance of a humble man, on every step He took it was seen that He was God too. To the Protestants, by eliminating from Gospels, like being unreal, all the miraculous elements, all the wonderful deeds, it is natural thus to reach the theory of the kenosis in the sense of the Logos renouncing to all the manifestation of the superhuman power of the godhead, in the time of His life on earth¹⁷⁵.

¹⁷⁵ Today, the dialectic theology speaks more about a kenosis of the humanity in Jesus Christ, by sustaining that God was seen into Jesus Christ precisely in the complete crisis of any human power. Not in something positive it is shown that Jesus got close to the world and God speaks to Him, but into the descending of the humanity until to an empty which shows to us all our nothingness. But God is an X beyond this entire void, so He isn't into history, or into time. He produces and highlights to the people the crisis of all that exists human in Jesus Christ. What He shows us in time and space, only through the despondency in which He places us, it opens the way to God, it “Reveals” Him to us. On one hand, thus, a radical kenosis, on the other hand a banishing of God, beyond any historical plan. “In Jesus we know the fragmentary, the void, the interior lack of fixity, even of the religious world, with unavoidable evidence. All the reality is subjected to the crisis, there isn't exists any point around us which not to be marked by it, undermined, and crumbled. And from this absolute problematic of all, doesn't escape either the own self of the watcher; we do not sit on a raised, neutral height,

If the Holy Scripture, in addition to all the affirmation of a descending, of an emptying of the Son of God through embodiment, it insists over many manifestations of some godlike features of Him and, by and large, over the active presence of His godhead as such, what will we have to understand the kenosis like?

Of course, by and large, the kenosis consists in the fact that the Son of God has accepted to be subject of the modest human features and manifestations. But, besides this general determination, some clarifications are necessary.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Our subjectivity has, however, also another contribution to highlighting the kenosis. And the adding of this subjectivity is not only something like spectators on a mountain peak, the foundations of which are collided by the frightening chaos; all of us are comprised through destiny and guilt, into the swirl... The existence of the crucified Jesus that crumbles to the deep, it has the power to kidnap us from all the illusions, to throw us into the knowledge of all our problematic”. But “the chaos of these deep desolations isn’t characterized obviously through what in it isn’t seen but an accidental reality, a meaningless one, of the world; a hidden and deep meaning, it is announced rather through Him... An unintuitive meaning, that God Himself is present here, that the authentic and full despair, it is always a «comforted» despair”. “Die Christologischen Anschauungen der dialektischen Theologie”, von J. W. Schmidt-Japing, in Apologetisches Jahrbuch, 1925, Gütersloh, p. 95-6. Further, Schmidt-Japing quotes from K. Barth, the representative of the dialectic school: „The intuitive sense of the life of Jesus Christ, which can be described like the abolition of all the human possibilities, it supposes, though, obviously, an unintuitive central point, from where this crisis starts, an impossible which are measured all his intuitive possibilities within, a direction giver and a concentric point” (Römerbrief, p. 185). And Schmidt-Japing continues: “This X which rises at the border of the intuitive it is the unintuitive, non-historical, timeless, and not-given. Therefore, this central point, unintuitive of whole history, it isn’t a historical moment” (p. 97-98). Other modern Protestant theologians, they simply don’t recognize the embodiment of the Son of God, but they consider the Son of God like an organ of the Revelation and like the Son of God, only in the sense that by being human, God made Him an organ of His Revelation, and He made from His word a word of God. For example, H. W. Schmidt says: „Was bei der Fleischwerdung des göttlichen Wortes geschieht, ist dies, das ein Mensch Wort Gottes sein darf, ein Mensch darf in die Einheit mit Gottes persönlichen Leben eintreten; Gott wohnt ihm Offenbarung Gottes gemacht“, „Die Menschwerdung Gottes“, in „Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie“, 1942, 19. Jahrgang – I. Vierteljahrsheft, p. 124. In the same way thinks P. Althaus, by fully following to Schleiermacher and A. Rischl. Jesus is the Son of God only like the members of the Christian community become sons of God. The difference between Him and us it stays only in the fact that He is the “first born” from people like Son of God through divine power. “Die «Menschwerdung» Gottes in Christo schließt sich uns auf durch die Analogie der «Menschwerdung» Gottes in den Wiedergeborenen durch den Heiligen Geist. So wird Geistchristologie die Lösung“, „Christologie des Glaubens“, in Festschrift Jhmels, p. 290. H. W. Schmidt criticizes the Chalcedonian doctrine of the en-hypostatic under the motive that through it, it would be truncated the humanity of Jesus into a Monophysite sense, once the Logos took a human nature without an own hypostasis. The merit of Karl Barth and of E. Brunner – the coryphaei of the dialectic school – it is that of reaffirming into the middle of the modern Protestant theology – which started sliding on the slope of the denial of the real embodiment of the Logos - the un-hypostatic doctrine, with all the differences or details which presents.

illusionary, but it is a real enlargement of the kenosis, a real sufferance of Jesus Christ. But, though, it is a kenosis only in front of us. In Himself, it is a triumph of the godhead. Through our sin we are deepening even more the Embodied Word into humiliation. And though, this humiliation received by Him from us, it is a supreme manifestation of the godlike love in report with the man.

Let us explain it: All the godlike features start from love and serve to it. It is explained that into love they are concentrated through love. The almightiness of God it is not manifested like something different, like at the man who hasn't any other goal but to show that he is mighty. The man, when he manifests his power, he does it, usually, like a manifestation of the vainglory, of egotism. To manifest your power towards a man, otherwise than through love, like a natural emanation of love, it is not to be into a love relation with him, it is to consider him at your own disposition, un-contained into love. It seems, nevertheless, that the true power even towards nature it is manifested into and through love and God is strong towards it because He loves it. Through love He created and He sustains all the things." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, just through the suffering of this humiliating situation from the part of the people, of the increasing of His real kenosis, God-the Word manifested even more fully the depth of His godlike love. The kenosis is, like we see, a dialectic concept. It is the manifestation of the God's glory among people; as the kenosis increases, it increases the manifestation of the divine glory too, which has the love like central feature. How would us have been able to see the whole depth of the God's love, if He hadn't endured the kenosis, which was, one hand, a godlike initiative, and on the other hand, in a great measure, the man's addition? Into the state of supreme kenosis, like a supreme affirmation of the God's love towards people, the focal point of all the other godlike features and words, the divine Logos does not get out, so, from the communion with the Father, because this is maintained also through love. Just because He is full of love towards the Father, the Son affirms His love towards the people into the supreme degree of the kenosis. So, He is not deprived, into His divine – human depths, of the happiness of the communion with the Father, even if, on the other hand, He is grieved because the people refuse His love. Jesus Christ was both in the plenitude of the happiness and into kenosis, in the same time. From the depths of the happy communion with the Father, Christ took the power to suffer the sorrows of the kenosis in report with the people, and of the vacuum which they made around Him.

The dialectic character of the kenosis it is highlighted by the Holy Scripture through the contradictory affirmations – which couldn't be explained otherwise – about the state of humiliation in which the Son of God was on earth and, in the same time, about the godlike powers which He kept and about the unity with the Father in which He was on the earth too.

In this respect it can be explained also the famous place from Philippians 2: 5–11. Even it would seem, taken in itself, like without any reference to other places with a contrary sense, it speaks about a non- dialectical kenosis, about a real abandonment of the godlike features and powers, by the Son of God.

The text speaks about Jesus Christ, “who being in the form of God, not kidnapping, He is considered to be just like God, but poured Himself, by taking the form of a servant..., for that also God Has highly exalted Him and gifted Him a name which is above all names”, etc.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“They two kenoses have met into a point which they can do a commune work at. The humanity of Jesus Christ has been raised on the supreme level of spiritualization, due to the descent of God into it. “The embodiment of God makes the man God, as much as God has made Himself man”, says Maximos the Confessor.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The love of Jesus, like any other love actually, it was not experienced and understood from outside, but only by entering the communion report with Him, through the step of the faith. The love is through itself humbleness or humbleness too, by being a reducing of the exclusive egotism, the admission of the others` existence on an equal level with the own subject and the searching for their love. Who responds to somebody`s love, he does not see the act of humbleness, and of humiliation. But when there is no other response, the behavior of the man who walks with love, seeking the others` community, it appears to others as all humiliating.

So appeared Jesus to whom didn`t enter the communion with Him, in order to understand, to see the profoundness, the glory, the brightness of His love, and to see His human nature. And most of them were like that. This was because people refused the love, the behavior of Jesus seemed without honor and absurd. They thought that the godhead stays into the direct power manifestation, into the proud affirmation above all and above everything, according with their sin which consist into pride, into reducing everything to the level of the objects. Their sinful judgment was throwing a veil of even bigger kenosis over the voluntary humiliation of the descending of the Son of God to His state of a man, which, in fact, it was the manifestation of the whole divine love. If people had seen this magnitude of the divine love and they had gathered themselves around Him with love and with veneration, like they have done after His resurrection, the kenosis of the Son of God would not have consisted but only into the fact of coming close to the man, to enter the communion with the man. But, because people were making vacuum around Him, and He was supporting this situation, the increase of the kenosis it hadn't had only a subjective character, but it meant an objective increasing of the kenosis, though through the attitude of the people¹⁷⁶." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁷⁶ This idea of the kenosis, like having its origin in the human subjectivity, it is characteristic to the Alexandrian school, to which Maxim the Confessor was into "Centurias" a faithful interpreter (According to Hans Urs von Balthazar, Die "Gnostischen Centurien" des Maximus Confessor, Fr. i. br., 1941, p. 39 and others). Behold some quotes from Maxim the Confessor in this respect: "The Lord Doesn't appears equal to everyone. To the beginner, «in the form of a servant»; to the ones who ascend on the Mount of Transfiguration, «in the form which He had before the world was». To everyone, after the size of his faith". (Gnostic Centurias 2, chapter 13, Balthazar, cited work, p. 42). "The Logos appears under two forms: one is exoteric: «He hadn't either face, or beauty» (Isaiah 53, 2), the other is esoteric, the glory of the Tabor: «More beautiful to His face like all the sons of the earth». The first one is for the beginners, the second one for the consummated ones. The first one it is the resembling of the first Parousia, of the letter and deed, the second is the anticipation of the second Parousia, of the Ghost and the Gnosis", (Centurias 1, chapter 97; Balthazar, the cited work, p. 41). "The Logos like a spiritual Son ascends and descends, after the degree of virtue and gnosis of everyone. It is happy, the one to whom it stays in place in the sky like to Joshua, until he defeated all the bad demons" (Centurias 2, 31; Balthazar, the cited work, p. 37).

Kingdom of God

“The idea uniting all the Christian dogmas in a system is this: the promoting of an increasingly intimate communion of our, with God as Person Who made Himself man on this purpose. This perfect communion of everybody into Christ, and therefore also with each other, it is what one calls the Kingdom of Heavens, or the Kingdom of God, namely the consummate order of the full love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 80)

“Christ is in the same time the consummate man through Whom God leads to the recapitulation of everybody in Him, as Church that is unveiling towards the Kingdom of Heavens.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

“By presenting, on Himself, like God Who become man, and like man who is in the same time in maximum closeness to the people, Christ has announced the Kingdom of God that is about to commence and to develop on the measure the people believe in Him, and they enter and advance in the communion with Him. The Kingdom of God is, ever since the moment Christ has come, “amidst people”. By preaching, on Himself, Christ preaches the Kingdom of God too, and His preaching is the revelation of this Kingdom, being the preaching through which His Person is revealed. On the other hand, this Kingdom starts in its fullness, since His resurrection. He is from this point of view too, the Prophet of the full revelation, and of the accomplished Kingdom of God, and of the fully deified humanity, in the Kingdom’s frame. This Kingdom, as the Person of Christ too, it is not a relative novelty, which could be followed by other novelties, but it is an ultimate and absolute novelty, in which the plenitude and the infinity of the life are given.” (Stăniloae 2006: 51)

“Accomplishing the consummate and equal love amongst everybody, through the full communication with everybody, through fully knowing everybody’s secrets, by getting warm of everybody’s love and understanding, through the disappearance of all the hidden suspicions and judgments, this is the Kingdom of Heavens. But its members still feel and know themselves as “many”. (Stăniloae 1997: 278)

“Aren’t the good things of the future age above any the sensitive and intellectual powers? These things will be seen by the clean heart, says Saint Maximos the Confessor. What it isn’t then their view above all mental works for? In the future age, says Gregory of Nyssa, “there won’t be needed anything of what sustains life now: either air, or light, either space, or the things alike; their place will be taken to us by the godlike nature. And Saint Maximos the Confessor says: “The deification from then, of the soul and of the body, it will give us the ceasing of all the natural works, of the mind and of the soul; so that, through body and through soul, it will manifest God, being overcome through the abundance of the glory, the natural tones”. What is, therefore, the light which will be seen through the bodily eyes without air, a light which isn't sensitive and which exceeds the whole natural knowledge?

It isn't that the godlike glory? And what elevates us above any feeling or cogitation and it makes us able of that sight? That is the Holy Ghost Who will spiritualized, then, not only our soul, but also our body. Behold that there is sight above understanding, and there is light of the heart which isn't knowledge." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 59)

"When Jesus says that happy will be the poor in spirit ones, that theirs is the Kingdom of Heavens, we understand that this Kingdom will be the encounter of the humble one not only with God, but also with the people whom he was humble with, opening the heart of those ones, and by that and by his union with those ones, feeling the encounter with God. And the comforting which the ones who cry will have it, through the ones whom they cried because of, as also the Kingdom of Heavens which the ones persecuted for righteousness will have it, they will have it for they were persecuted for the justice of the wronged ones, opening by that, those ones' hearts, and through those ones' heart God showing Himself to them. Out of solidarity with the wronged ones we will see the thirst for justice fully satisfied not by people, but by God shown through those people. The mercy which the ones who had mercy on people will rejoice of, it won't be, actually, the mercy from people, or only from people, but through people, fully, from God. And the gentle ones will inherit the true earth, or the Kingdom of Heavens, which will nourish them with the spiritual goods, not only from people, but from God through them, for they were gentle with the people." (Stăniloae 1995: 134)

"Saint Gregory of Nazianzus called the Kingdom of Heavens as just the Holy Trinity, namely the supreme communion as persons. Not the divine being will be contemplated by the righteous in the future life, but they will be nourished out of the perfect love of the communion of the Persons of the Holy Trinity. Out of Their love the beam of the love will be overpoured upon people, and it will accomplish the communion amongst people, making them happy: "And then, those ones will be welcomed by the untold light and by the contemplation of the Holy and Imperial Trinity Who will illuminate them, more cleanly and more limpidly, and Who will united whole, with the whole mind. This sole one I call it as Kingdom of Heavens" (Word about Hail, G.P. 35, 945 C). And, Saint Maximos the Confessor specified that the loving light of the Holy Trinity, it will fill up with sweetness and it will gladden the ones who will encounter the Holy Trinity, and who will encounter one another. "This sweetness will sweeten me and it will gladden me, in order I to dare to unite mine things with the Trinity's things, understanding through me the whole rational creation of the angels and of the people... the whole God will cross through those ones, like the soul... This is for He will fill them up with His own glory and happiness, by giving them the eternally happy life" (Ambigua, Romanian translation, chapter 71, pp. 89-90). The Trinitarian communion makes its presence felt within angels and within people, and by this it unites all of them: this is the eternal happiness. The Romanian language has a special word for expressing the dependence of the happiness not on the possession of some material things, neither on some spiritual richness lived in isolation, but on the communion with the beloved persons, happiness nourished out of the communion of the Persons of the Holy Trinity. That is the word “longing”. The Greek language has only the word “desire”, referring both to the impersonal things and to persons, and the word “lust” that refers to material things. I do not know any other languages to have a word expressing, in a special manner, the waiting for the beloved person. Only the “longing” shows the human being as wanting for his happiness produced to him by the encounter with the beloved person, and not out of the individualistic possession of some material and spiritual goods. When we sometimes say “longing for our country”, or for our birth village, those ones are understood as full of beloved persons, of as full of spiritual traces left by the beloved persons. If I do not have those traces together with the beloved person, they won’t make me happy. Only in “longing” the human being shows his thirst for real transcendence, of his, towards another beloved person who is absent at the time.” (Stăniloae 1995: 135)

Knowledge / Understanding

“According to the Patristic Tradition, there is rational or cataphatic knowledge about God, and there is an apophatic or untold knowledge about God. The last one is superior and it completes the first one. Neither of them knows God in His Being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 115)

“The cataphatic knowledge allows us to know God only in His quality as creator and upholder cause of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 115)

“The apophatic knowledge allows us to have some kind of direct experience of God’s mysterious presence, a presence that exceeds knowing Him simply as cause invested with some attributes resembling to the ones of the world. This kind of knowledge is called apophatic for the mysterious presence of God - that is experienced through this knowledge - it exceeds the possibility of being expressed in words. But this knowledge is more adequate to know God, than the cataphatic knowledge is.” (Stăniloae 2003: 115)

“The apophatic knowledge allows us to have some kind of direct experience of God’s mysterious presence, a presence that exceeds knowing Him simply as cause invested with some attributes resembling to the ones of the world. This kind of knowledge is called apophatic for the mysterious presence of God - that is experienced through this knowledge - it exceeds the possibility of being expressed in words. But this knowledge is more adequate to know God, than the cataphatic knowledge is.” (Stăniloae 2003: 115)

“To the apophatic knowledge, the attributes of God are not only thought, but they are, on some extent, directly experienced.” (Stăniloae 2003: 115)

“In the act of the apophatic knowledge, the human subject lives, in a real manner, some kind of sinking in the infinity of God, in His almightiness, and in his love. Through the apophatic knowledge the human subject not only knows that God is infinite, almighty etc., but he even experiences that. But in this experiencing, the infinity of God – for instance – it shows to be so overwhelming, so that the man realizes that it is different from the thought infinity, and that it is impossible to be interpreted.” (Stăniloae 2003: 116)

“We reckon that the two ways of knowledge (cataphatic and apophatic, o. n.), they do not contradict and they do not exclude one another, but they complete each other. The apophatic knowledge is completed with the affirmative knowledge and with the negative-rational knowledge; the apophatic knowledge transfers the affirmative knowledge and the negative-rational knowledge on a more appropriate plan, but at its turn the apophatic knowledge employs the terms of the rational knowledge in the both perspectives (affirmative and negative), because of the need of expressing itself, even in a far from being satisfying mode.” (Stăniloae 2003: 117)

“The apophatic knowledge it is also occasioned like the affirmative-rational knowledge is, by the looking at the world, but the apophatic knowledge surpasses this looking, and sometimes it doesn’t need a present looking at the world in order to occur, although the knowledge of the world and the enrichment of the soul are presupposed.” (Stăniloae 2003: 117)

“(…) as a man progresses in a spiritual life, the intellectual knowledge about God from the world, - in His quality as Creator and Caretaker of the world – it is being soaked with a richer direct contemplation of Him, namely with the apophatic knowledge.” (Stăniloae 2003: 118)

“The world remains through the apophatic knowledge; but in the apophatic knowledge’s case the world has become transparent for God. This knowledge is apophatic because God, Who is now being noticed, He is indefinable; He is lived as a reality that exceeds any possibility of defining. Although, this knowledge remains too, as knowledge about God Who descended to us, and it is not knowledge about His Being through Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 121)

“For God is Person, we know Him out of experience depending also on our cleaning of passionate and blind affection for the finite things. But quite this gives us to understand that, beyond the always new richness we notice it, there is a source of it that doesn’t enter the range of our experience.” (Stăniloae 2003: 125)

“(…) once reached at an experience of the incomprehensible mystery of God, one sees it either through things, or outside the things, or he passes from one to another, at a constantly higher level. The things themselves become increasingly transparent for the glory of God Who shoes Himself through them, for between the rationalities of the things and God, there is no contradiction.” (Stăniloae 2003: 128)

“Any meaning referring God, it has to have fragility, to have a transparency, to have a lack of fixity, it has to urge us to revoke it, and to stimulate us towards issuing another concept, but on the line of the previous one. If the meaning remains fixed in our mind, then we will limit God in that concept’s limits, or we will even forget about God, because of the whole our attention will be focused upon that concept or upon the word expressing it. In such a case the respective “meaning” it will become an idol, namely a false god. The meaning or the words used to express it, it always must make God transparent, as not comprised in that concept or meaning, as exceeding any meaning, as making Himself obvious once with an aspect, and then with another aspect, of His infinite richness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 129)

“(...) through words and meanings, we must pass beyond words and meanings. Only thus we can notice the full of mystery presence of God, and this happens when we maintain always the same words and meanings: they interpose themselves between us and God and we remain to them, by reckoning them as God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 129-130)

“On one hand, we need words and meanings, for they are borrowed from the creatures of God, in which His powers are being manifested and through which He descended to our level; on the other hand, we must exceed these words and meanings in order to be able to be before God Himself, as source of His creatures, by ascending us above them. Or even his works, experienced as powers which lead the creatures, they are above the creatures and above the words lent from the creatures.” (Stăniloae 2003: 130)

“(...) in these symbols there are numerous meanings, superimposed levels and, until we reach them, we can't even imagine them. We must ascend to always new meanings of them, to other levels, and then to ascend beyond all their meanings. The more nuanced we use the words, and the more we ascend to higher meanings of theirs, we reach the understanding that God is the One Who exceeds all of them, and he is also the One Who is full of their whole exponential depth and complexity, in His quality of unitary source of their rationalities. Just because of that he calls us to leave all the symbols, all the words, and all their meanings. Even when the words refer to the works of the oikonomia of God, we must ascend in their meanings, to constantly pass to more adequate meanings, and to leave even those higher meanings, for those works are themselves not-comprised.” (Stăniloae 2003: 130)

“(...) the love of the human being crosses through virtues, which implies the freedom. Advancing in the union with God, it has therefore not only a character of theoretical knowledge. The understanding is nourished by the free effort of the virtue, and vice-versa. And in the relation with God, the man receives power towards that. This shows again that the apophatic knowledge isn't accomplished in a closeness of the spirit towards the reality of the world and towards the person of his fellow humans – in relation with which and who we grow up in virtue.” (Stăniloae 2003: 131)

“Only through the effort of cleaning it increases the thinness of the spirit and only this thinness leaves any meaning we have reached about God and our lazy tendency of sticking ourselves with that meaning, or our tendency of making out of that meaning an idol and of immobilizing our spirit in the worshipping of that limited reality. The soul is carried ever higher, by a continuous thirst, and the soul “prays to God to show Himself”. The reached ones are always symbols, or images of the archetype towards Whom increased knowledge our souls tend relentlessly. And the archetype is the Supreme Person. The basic symbols are the world's things. These symbols are constantly highlighted by higher meanings." (Stăniloae 2003: 132)

"(...) the attributes of God aren't known only through a rational deduction, but out of His works reflected within world, by participating to these works. These works' light is being projected within world and, somehow, it is experienced. But this doesn't contravene to considering God as cause of the world." (Stăniloae 2003: 135)

"(...) in what is communicated to us out of God, we experience the fact of not being us imparted with Him, or of the fact that, in His being, he remains not-shareable." (Stăniloae 2003: 135)

"(...) in the union with that light from above nature, ye cleaned minds receive, in the same time, the knowledge that that light is the cause of all the things, fact that urge these minds to express that light in affirmative terms of some attributes which can be considered as the cause of the features from the world. Therefore, in this apophatic experience are given all: the experience of the works of God, the conscience about His being that exceeds any accessibility, the impossibility of fully adequate expressing these works, the evidence that these works are the causes of the things and, in the same time, the necessity of correcting those intellectual affirmative expressions by negating them." (Stăniloae 2003: 136)

"(...) in the experience above understanding of the works of God it is given also their experience in their quality of causes of the things, and therefore also the necessity of expressing what it is experienced, both in affirmative terms and in negative terms, in the same time with the conscience that the works themselves are above these terms. The negative terms are equally insufficient as the affirmative ones are. One must always make a synthesis out of them. But at the basis of this synthesis stays an experience that exceeds both the affirmative terms and the negative terms this experience is expressed with. God has in Himself both what corresponds to the affirmative terms and what corresponds to the negative terms, but in a way that is superior to all of those terms. And this is a fact of experience, and not a simple speculation." (Stăniloae 2003: 136)

"(...) in Himself God is the most positive reality. But His supreme positivity is above all our affirmations. And this is one more motif for not renouncing to speaking about God in affirmative terms." (Stăniloae 2003: 137)

"God is not cognoscible but, the one who believes, he can live Him in a felt and conscious mode. The man is sunk in the not-understood, indefinable and inexpressible ocean of God, but the man realizes that. God is the positive reality, beyond we know as positive means; but in comparison to the created world God is a negative reality, beyond what we know that negative means.” (Stăniloae 2003: 137)

“Christ is the cause of all things but, in the same time, he is unlike any of the things. The affirmative and the negative terms complete each other, but all of these terms are the expression of an apophatic experience, and they are not the experience of a speculative thinking from distance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 139)

“Once the Son of God has come into body, the faith brought by Him it has elevated us to a superior knowledge. And the one who refuses this knowledge he is condemnable.” (Stăniloae 2003: 139)

“Seeing God in light it is above not only to the rational knowledge, but also above the knowledge by faith. It is therefore also above the knowledge through negation. This is for its apophatic nature is above any knowledge, even above the negative one. This apophatic knowledge uses the negative words in order to express it, but the light itself is above these words.” (Stăniloae 2003: 140)

“Seeing and living on God, it is though expresses by using negative terms, but not because it is not a real seeing of Him, but because it exceeds everything the words express. God is expressed as “darkness” not because of he isn’t seen in any way, but in sense of exceeding: it is known, though, that in this darkness there is God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 141)

“Knowing God out of the concrete circumstances of the life is imposed to all Christians in their practical life. Each believer knows God in His Providential action through which each individual is lead through the particular circumstances of his own life, sometimes being destined to good things, and some other times being, on pedagogical purposes, deprived of those good things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 143)

“Each human person knows God out of the appeal God makes to him, by putting him in diverse circumstances, in contact with diverse people asking him for fulfilling some tasks, facts that thoroughly test his patience. Each human person knows God out of the remorse of his conscience for the bad things he did; finally, each human person knows God in the troubles, in more passing or lasting failures, in his own illnesses, or in the illnesses of his close ones, consequently to some evil deeds they did, or as means of moral consummation and of spiritual strengthening, but also in the help he receives from God in overcoming those illnesses and failures and any other impediments and difficulties he comes across. It is a knowledge that helps to lead any human person on his own road to consummation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 144)

“Knowing God is accompanied by responsibility, by fear, and by tremble, especially in some concrete circumstances of the life. Such circumstances make the soul more sensitive to the presence, or to the presence of God who wants something special with me, for His special plan with me is the ones producing these circumstances. God cannot be known by man in a state of indifference. God doesn’t want to be known by a man who is in state of indifference, a state that doesn’t help to my consummation. That’s why he brings me in such circumstances in which he makes Himself transparent, out of His interest in me. God is, especially on this purpose, “mysterium tremendum”.” (Stăniloae 2003: 145)

“The difficult circumstances which are pricked like some nails in our being, they push us towards a more felt prayer. And, during such a prayer, the presence of God becomes even more obvious to us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 145)

“All the circumstances and the persons God speaks us through, they are appeals and living and transparent images of His; God, the simple, he descends to us in a multitude of forms and situations, namely in all the situations and forms of our life. But, even known through all of these, His mystery still remains above understanding.” (Stăniloae 2003: 148-149)

“The existential experiencing of God it is combined with experiencing Him apophatically, but it is highlighting even more the personal character of God in His reports with us, than the apophatic experience does it by seeing in the light of God some kind of overwhelming of the world. But this knowledge is combined with knowing God as Creator and Providence Doer of the world (the cataphatic knowledge), making God to be known to the man, as such, in a more intimate manner. But in the same time the apophatic knowledge widens the cataphatic knowledge.” (Stăniloae 2003: 149)

“Through all the three ways of knowledge (cataphatic, apophatic, out of the concrete circumstances of the life, o. n.), it is highlighted the personal interest of God in man, but also His mystery and the greatness which h are above understanding. Through all three of them, God is known as loving us on the measure of our love for Him and for our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 149)

“We know that God Who is for us, but this knowledge doesn’t show Him as being opposed to God in Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 155)

“Through rationality isn’t being experienced the interior of God, but only His quality as cause. On the other hand, there is just in the rationality - whether the rationality isn't perverted by sin - the capacity of seeing God in His quality as cause." (Stăniloae 2003: 163)

"If God created out of nothing every other substance having its corresponding power, the more He can overwhelm the whole created substance and its power, with His spiritual power, by the mediation of the human spirit. Saint Maximos the Confessor insists much on the fact that the man is the unifier ring of the world, and of the world with God. The man is this for he submits in himself the physical power, and partially the biological power, to the spirit, namely the man spiritualizes these powers. Through knowledge, the man comprises in his spirit, the universe. But the man would realize the true spiritualization of the nature when he would actualize all the powers of his spirit through the energies of the godlike Ghost. This has been fully accomplished by Christ, and out of the power of Christ it can be done also by the ones who unite themselves with Him by faith, and they live with him." (Stăniloae 2003: 233)

"Who can understand the infinite richness of the content of the spiritual life of God? And who can define this content, whilst the content itself of the creatures endowed with spirituality it is so complex and impossible to be exactly defined, especially when it comes about such a creature to know not only his own content, but also the content of another creature of the same nature." (Stăniloae 2003: 235)

"That's why the Holy Fathers say that we know, generally, that God is infinite (a formal attribute of His existence, we would say), but what this infinity is (its spiritual content) we do not know. We even know the attributes related to the spirituality of God as being infinite, for His existence is infinite on all regards, but we do not know the concrete content of the infinity of these attributes." (Stăniloae 2003: 236)

"We know that God knows everything, but what this everything is and how He knows it, we do not know." (Stăniloae 2003: 236)

"God doesn't understand as we do, He doesn't think as we do, and he doesn't know as we do, but in a way that is above us. In this sense, we deny Him these spiritual activities. But He is the cause of these activities of the creature and that's why we attribute these activities to Him in a sense that exceeds their meaning as it is known by us." (Stăniloae 2003: 236-237)

"We participate to the knowledge of God and we are growing up from the rational knowledge, on the basis of the rationality given us by God, to a knowledge that is close to His, through the union with Him." (Stăniloae 2003: 237)

“A difference between the way we know and the way God knows, it consists in the fact that he knows everything in Himself, in His quality as cause of all the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 237)

“By knowing the creatures, for He knows Himself as their cause, God doesn’t detach the whole content of His existence from His quality as cause of the creatures. Thus, in the knowledge of God referring the things it is involved the knowledge of His existence. This is because only His whole existence it is a sufficient explanation of the creature’s meaning. God sees the creatures in the whole light, incomprehensible to us, of His existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 238)

“Unlike God, we detach the knowledge of the things from the knowledge of God. Or, when we start uniting the two kinds of knowledge, we do not know God except in His quality as cause of the things, and not something out of Himself. But on the superior stages of the spiritual knowledge, we know God increasingly more, for in the life to come, to fully know Him (1 Cor. 13: 12), for then we will have been fully with him, and for He will be whole, in whole us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 238)

“We cannot know in this life, with the exception of the ones who have become saints, not even the creatures in a full manner, as God know them; namely, neither our knowledge referring the things it isn’t identical to His knowledge referring them. This is because of, by detaching the things from the knowledge of God, or from His whole knowledge, we do not know the things in the fullness of their meaning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 238)

“Generally, the Eastern Fathers declare that the full knowledge is union between the one who knows and the known one, and the ignorance is cause for separation, or the effect of the separation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 238)

“We want to specify in the first place that the knowledge through the union that doesn’t confound, that God has it referring to creatures and the creatures have it referring to God, implied the character of person of God and of the creatures, by the fact that the creatures too know God. Knowing the things, it supposes the one who knows gets out of himself. But even more, this supposes also a getting out towards other persons. Thus, the persons reach to posse the things in common through knowledge. But with the things it isn’t accomplished a union to which the things participate to too, because of they do not have a free plan, of the profoundness, a plan different from the plan of the surface, which they to be able to voluntarily keep it hidden – therefore it isn’t required a spiritual progress in love in order to know the profoundness of the things. But with a person must unite himself another person, in love, in order both of them to be enriched through this knowledge.” (Stăniloae 2003: 241)

“God is united also with the things in His knowledge referring to them, even more than us, in His quality as their cause. But He isn’t united with the things in a reciprocal union. But He is united with the things as ones which bear our seal upon them, or the seal of the personal relation between God and people. Only through this the things aren’t lost either in God or in people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 241)

“There is not full knowledge outside the union of love between the one who know and the known one – therefore, neither the distance from the known personal realities nor the total loneliness offer the possibility of a full knowledge -; thus, God has a perfect self-knowledge, for He is threefold in Persons. The full knowledge is always also love, and therefore it is directed towards another person. The person’s self-knowledge it doesn’t give him the joy for what he knows. God fulfills the condition of the perfect personal knowledge through the Trinity of the divine and fully united Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 241)

“I do not know myself without as relation with others. In the last analysis, I know myself or I am aware of myself in relation with God. The light of my knowledge regarding the things, or regarding myself, it is projected upon the communitarian human image from the supreme personal communion. We are not aware of ourselves except in relation with another and, in last analysis, in front of God. The sole self wouldn’t have conscience; through conscience, he knows a spiritual “place” of his, in relation with others. In the self-awareness he increases in the same time with the increasing in the self-knowledge, and this increases in the same time with increasing in the knowledge of God, and of his fellow humans and of the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 243)

“This variety of the knowledge of God regarding the people, it shows that it is the knowledge of a Person, and He wants to intensify the people’s relation with Him, as persons. This is not a philosophical knowledge, or knowledge indifferent to the people’s growth in the relation with him and to their salvation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 250)

“Everything God has revealed us about His knowledge it has in the same time an aspect of wisdom and it is related to the world. One couldn’t say that the knowledge of God has a theoretical character and the wisdom of God it has a practical character. All the knowledge acts of God referring to the world have, in the same time, a practical character. By aiming to lead the world towards Him. Even through the knowledge about Himself He gives it to us He is pursuing the same goal.” (Stăniloae 2003: 252)

“If there still is justified to speak differently about the knowledge and about the wisdom of God, we reckon that this justification comes out of the need of considering the diverse spatial acts the knowledge of God is manifested in, with His self-giving to the people, and the connection these acts are in, with all the other acts of an ensemble plan referring to the world. This connection and this ensemble plan can be called, in a special manner, as the wisdom of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 253)

“Each knowledge act of God is connected with the whole ensemble of the plan of God referring to the world. But this connection doesn’t become obvious to us except in time. And the full knowledge of God is manifested in the connection of all the knowledge acts, namely in wisdom. The one who has a partial knowledge, without connection with the ensemble, he isn’t only lacking wisdom, and neither he has a full knowledge about the partial things he knows it. Our partial knowledge and wisdom aren’t but a road towards the maximum knowledge and wisdom obtained out of the full union with God. This is for only in the full union we will fully know all the things, in their infinite causality and in their connection with all the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 253)

“What we know during the earthly life, on the basis of the nature’s order, and what we understand out of the order of the human spiritual life, and even out of the godlike savior acts regarding us, are only obscure rays from the knowledge and the wisdom above any knowledge and wisdom which we can have here, knowledge and wisdom leading us towards our future full union with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 256)

“Only in the experience of the holiness, our nature, by being filled up with the efficient presence of God, it has not only a theoretical knowledge about God, but knowledge by experience of His presence, power, and love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285-286)

“The knowledge in general unites in itself the common character of the knowledge and the birth of one of the two partners of the knowledge. I know myself out of what I have produced, for it resembles me. But I know myself the best out of the one who reproduces by birth my perfect image, who not only shown me, passively, my image, but he also communicates it to me actively.” (Stăniloae 2003: 311)

“The birth of the Son by the Father it is the premise of the Self-knowledge of the Father, knowledge accomplished in common with the Son.” (Stăniloae 2003: 311)

“Each of us knows himself not only out of the one who has given birth to, but also together with any of his fellow humans, with whom he has hypostatized the same nature. But in God, the Second Hypostasis cannot come but out of the First One, for the unity in God is consummate, or for the unity it has in God Himself its last source, and it doesn't hint towards a superior source. The divine nature is hypostatized in the Second Hypostasis by His birth out of the First One, and in the Third Hypostasis by the proceeding out of the First One. No Hypostasis of the Trinity comes out of two Hypostases. But because the human nature resides in many hypostases and each of them has some shortcomings, and it doesn't come in its subsistence directly out of a sole hypostasis, and for it manifests some distances, each human hypostasis knows himself on the measure he knows several hypostases, and he overcomes the distance between him and them. But in God, the Father has the whole nature hypostatized only in the Son and in the Holy Ghost; and between Them and Him there is not distance." (Stăniloae 2003: 311-312)

"The Fathers of the Church, when speaking about the eternal rationalities of the things, comprised in the divine Rationality, or in the Logos, or in the Word of God, they understand through them also these increasingly higher meanings hidden within things, and they reckon that these are comprised, with the help of the supreme Word, by the human rationality too, that comprises the rationalities of the things in a strict meaning. Sometimes they distinguish the meaning of the thing from its strict rationality, calling the last one logos and the first one noema. They also distinguish between the understanding of the meaning (noesis) from the strict personal rationality, that notices the objective rationality of the things, by calling both of the last ones as logos. Following this direction, we are going to distinguish too, on one hand between the rationalities of the things and knowing the things through the human rationality in a strict meaning, and, on the other hand, between their meanings and their understanding in a continuous progress of through a more synthetic and more direct act of knowing (intuition)." (Stăniloae 2003: 361-362)

"The analytic rationality studies the partial rationality of the thing, trying to find out the exact proportions of the element which compose that thing and the conditions that thing is constituted and is maintained in. Thus, all the things and the phenomena of forming, of duration, of detaching of theirs, are strictly rational." (Stăniloae 2003: 362)

"There is a common and inexhaustible meaning of the things, a meaning that connects, and a meaning of indefinite richness towards which the man advances. Their strict supreme meaning is the divine Logos. In Him there are the meanings of all things. Only This One explains all of them, only in Him the man finds the own sense of his existence. Especially the one who believes, he notices this supreme meaning through an act of intuition, through his spirit." (Stăniloae 2003: 363)

“The increasingly higher and richer meanings and the supreme meaning of the total reality and of his existence, the believer finds them out in his connection with the reality from above world and nature, therefore on the measure he cultivates this connection. The progress towards increasingly higher meanings and towards the supreme meaning, it is a matter of will too, a matter of man’s will to develop himself uprightly, in harmony with all his fellow humans, with the whole reality, with the supreme rationality of the entire reality. The superior meanings and the supreme meaning are revealed to the man in connection with the reality from above him and from above nature but, in the same time, as being required by his full existence and by the nature itself; or, the man’s existence and the nature’s existence, they reveal increasingly more their own meanings and the supreme meaning, in the light of the supreme reality. The one who believes he will discover his meaning on the measure of his closeness to God, in the light of the fuller revealing of God. Likewise, he will discover the meaning of each thing through this.” (Stăniloae 2003: 363)

“According to our faith, the world is lightened in its ontological relation with God Who is its supreme meaning. The world differs from God, but it is not separated from Him either in its existence or in its meaning. The meaning of the world is implied in the meaning of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 363-364)

“The analytic rationality sees the world and each thing of the world, somehow separately. But the analytic rationality is accompanied within the man who lives his existence completely by an understanding that intuitively, through the progresses of the analytic rationality, the increasingly higher meanings of the things and their supreme meaning. According to our Christian conception, the rationality progresses in knowing the things and the logical connections between the things, for it is led by the rationality of by the understanding that intuitively the increasingly higher meanings and the supreme meaning of the existence. The analytic rationality it convinces itself just through its own results it obtained on each stage, that it hasn’t reached yet the final and total explanation of the reality, and the intuitive rationality, or the understanding that intuitively on each stage increasingly higher meanings, it urges the rationality to other researches and in the same time it gives it the conscience that the supreme or ultimate meaning of each researched unity it is a mystery tied to the mystery of the entire reality and to the supreme reality, one that the rationality won’t ever know it fully.” (Stăniloae 2003: 364)

“According to our faith, God, By creating the things as materializations and sensitization of His rationalities, in the same time God has given the man the rationality as organ of knowledge, in order the man to know these rationalities. Therefore one can even say that the man had the duty towards

God to know this work created on the level of the capacity of the human rationality of noticing it, a work God has created the man with an adequate rationality for it. On the other hand, the man is obliged to know these rationalities of the things, because of otherwise he cannot use them and he cannot live amongst them. But also, in order to be able to live amongst them and to be able to use them, the things have, in their solitary organizing, or in their rationalities, a certain permanence, adequate to the permanence of the human rationality, which depends on them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 364)

“We cannot cohabit amongst things in a conscious manner, without adapting them to our needs and without reciprocal provisions and promises related to our interventions upon the things, namely without discovering and actualizing the common, general meanings of the things and of the people. This presupposes both the rationality of the things and their elasticity in the frame of a predictable rationality of a wider order. Everything is rational within things and in the component energies, as also amongst them. It is impossible to distinguish what is materiality noticed by senses and what is rational structure or synthesis within things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 365)

“God is implied in this rationality, a rationality in the same time permanent and elastic of the things, and in the possibility of knowing and consciously-rationally using it by the man – namely in a continuously mode more adequate to the man’s needs of material, spiritual, and communitarian order, in a continuous growth – always new meanings of the things and of the human being. The ‘rationalities’ of the things and the human ‘rationality’, they have implied in them always new meanings, which are brought to light by applying the human rationality to the rationality of the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 365-366)

“The rationalities of the things in their unity with the ones of the component elements, rationalities which are, in a way, permanent, and in a way, elastic, consequently to the fact of being possible to be thought, they must be expressed by people in order to communicate to one another the experiences about things and in order to reciprocally engage themselves, through them, for the future. But the people think at them and they express them in words, for the rationalities are given through Creation by the supreme Person as things which were firstly thought by Him, or as things He has created, and He has descended in thinking the things on the level of the people’s capacity of noticing His thought and His will regarding the things and the people, and the people to express the things in their words. Thus, the people think at and they express the things for God has thought at the things on the people’s measure; the people’s thinking at things and expressing the things are, better said, an answer to the thinking and to the ‘speaking’ of God Who addresses the people through things. According to our faith, the people hadn't had a content of their thinking if God wouldn't have created first the things though by Him on the level of people's understanding, and if the things wouldn't have had within them a content of the speaking, if God wouldn't have expressed the things in a material manner by creating them, and if He wouldn't have Himself asked the people, by this, to notice what He has thought and what He has said regarding them, and what He is saying them through the always new circumstances the people reach in, by His will." (Stăniloae 2003: 366)

"God has given the man through things both the possibility of thinking and of speaking, by the fact He thought at things' rationalities, and He has given the things, by firstly creating them a material clothing on people's level, and also the need of thinking at them and of expressing them, in order to be able to use them in the relations amongst them and through this, to be achieved amongst them the dialogue He wanted with the people, namely in order the people to answer Him through their thinking and through their speaking. In this all the things find their purpose. The man discovers always new alternatives of the things not only through rationality and by combining the things and by using the things, but also through the always new feelings and thought the contact with the things produces within the man's body, and through the always new relations, mediated by things, between the man and his fellow humans. All of these, they require to be expressed and communicated by using an always enriched language." (Stăniloae 2003: 367)

"God expects us to understand increasingly better and increasingly fuller His thoughts He has placed in things and the words He has addressed us through the things, or the words He addresses us through the new situations we are put in. The spiritual content of the mankind it can become increasingly richer and increasingly subtle, on the measure of mankind's enriching with increasingly more experiences gained in always new situations, by discovering others and others aspect of theirs, by the attitudes and by the human states possible, good or evil. The world unveils others and others aspects, others and others modalities of combining the elements, others and others modalities created by the reports amongst the people and results out of the people's reports with the things." (Stăniloae 2003: 369)

"One can say that, by and large, the progress in humanity, which is the progress in the most authentic knowing rationality, identical to the progress in knowing the meaning of the human existence, it takes place in the same time with the progress in authentically knowing the rationality of the meaning of the nature as object of the knowing rationality of the man. Therefore, through this it is increasingly more made known the meaning itself of the nature's rationalities." (Stăniloae 2003: 379)

“According to our faith, it seems that all the world’s aspects, or the actualized images of its contingent richness – discovered by the diverse forms of the human culture correspondingly to the multiple meanings of the existence through which the mankind has passed or it still is passing through – are meant to be preserved, or harmonized in an increasingly complex and comprising manner, to the all-comprising image, which corresponds to the all-comprising meaning the man will reach at, in his union with the infinite God. The contributions of the spiritual people, of the great art creators, of all the scholars, and many of the right experiences and opinions or the peoples and of the individuals, these will remain inscribed in this final all-comprising image of the reality and of the human existence, a final image totally filled up by the infinite God. And these images, which are called to be concentrated in only one image of infinite complexity, they aren’t only actualization of the potentialities given within world and within the human spirit, but they are also new steps the world is elevated to, through a transcending, being helped by the divine infinite transcendence.

The surpassing of each individual image of knowledge and of all of them together, it is done out of the intuition of a consummation that is above all things, in which the images have their spring and towards which they tend, being helped by that final target itself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 379-380)

“The Holy Fathers speak about the superior, understanding part of the soul, about νοῦς (mind), in a way that would show that it knows God in a direct manner, intuitively, after the liberation from all the representations and images of the things from the world. Some Orthodox theologians saw here a difference between the Christendom from East and the one from occident, in the sense that the East affirms a direct knowledge of God whilst the West affirms only a deductive knowledge, by analogy. But it seems that this direct knowledge of God isn’t understood in East as a knowledge of a mind separated from the body, but of a mind that is influenced by the fact of the life into body and by the whole experience from the world. This is the direct knowledge of a mind of a purified body. It is the direct knowledge of a mind that is influenced by the effect of its purification in relation with the world. It is a direct knowledge through a world that has become transparent.” (Stăniloae 2003: 399-400)

“The non-separation of the mind from the total man in knowing God, it is due also to the fact that the full knowledge of God is in the same time a union of God with the one who knows. But this union doesn’t benefit only of the mind understood as purely spiritual part of the soul, but of the entire soul, even of the entire man. ‘All the things which move they receive their stability in the infinity of God’. All the things are unified in God and in the man’s lived understanding, without any of them to disappear.” (Stăniloae 2003: 401)

“Saint Gregory Palamas rejects the theory of Barlaam that the mind which encounters God it is an abstract mind, detached from the integral person. It is the mind in which are concentrated or in which vibrates the whole person composed of soul and body, with the results of the experiences accumulate in it, but these experiences are purified, are made clean.” (Stăniloae 2003: 401)

“Saint Gregory Palamas doesn’t speak about a body that is emptied of sensations, but about a body whose sensations has been purified and directed towards God. Saint Gregory Palamas reckons the ‘heart’, within which the mind (νοῦς) must gather itself in order to be experienced there the grace of God, as the most inner organ of the body, but in the same time the encounter center between body and the soul as leading organ (ηγεμονικὸν ὄργανον). But this means that not the pure intelligence leads the man and not the pure intelligence encounters God, but the total man, in whom the understanding and the feeling compose a whole. Only this accomplishes the integral rationality of the man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 401-402)

“According to Saint Gregory Palamas, letting the mind in abstract cogitations, detached from the integral being of the man, it is a true wandering. That man is far from himself, from reality, and from God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 402)

“God makes Himself known to the people by preserving and leading the nature in a mode adequate and useful to the man, and through exceptional deeds of almightiness in order to awake the man. But in all this work God addresses Himself to the man. The man must at least be present in order to know this work of God within world. The world proves to be on all ways in relation with the man, even only through the fact that the world is known only by the man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 403)

“The more various the forms of revealing God and of being imparted with God, are, the more the ones who are capable of observing and know these forms, they are given out of the richness of God, God using on this purpose all the forms of His revealing. These modes, being communicated from a knowing subject to another, they enrich each one’s knowledge and understanding. It results a congregational knowledge, immeasurable richer, of the entire Creation, regarding God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 438-439)

“The reality of the angelic world and the connection between the angelic world and our sensitive world rises two questions: a) it is possible to know God without the mediation of the symbols? –, namely: how the godlike spirit is known - who is above any knowledge - by the created spirits of the angels, without the mediation of the symbols? b) How the bodiless spirits know our sensitive world without having sensitive organs in order to do that? – namely: by and large, how the angels know a reality without an imprinting in their sensitiveness of the forms of the sensitive reality, or of some symbols corresponding to the not-sensitive realities?” (Stăniloae 2003: 449-450)

“To the question whether it is possible to know God without the mediation of the symbols the answer seems to be easy. The human spirit himself known some principles logical in themselves, though the human spirit has been given the occasion of this knowledge by his life into body, and by knowing the sensitive world. We do not see any motif because of which the bodiless spirits not to be able to know these rational principles and other even higher principles, in an unmediated manner. Then, the human spirit knows some presences and realities which cannot be reduced to the material ones, even if the occasion of this knowledge it is offered by certain material perceptions. For instance, he notices the subjects of his fellow humans and so many souls’ states of theirs. The human spirit experiences a pressure of these realities, and a certain way to be of theirs, though they remain apophatic or indefinite on a great measure, and never will be they fully understood. There is also another “mind’s feeling” than the one through material symbols, and this one is indicated by the Holy Fathers under this name. We do not see why the bodiless spirits couldn’t have the feeling of the pressure of some untold - though sufficiently determined - spiritual presences, without the mediation of the sensitive images. Finally, the human subject lives the pressure of a spiritual supreme, unconditional authority, even if he feels it through a certain imprinting into his somatic organization. We do not see why wouldn’t live the pressure of such a power also the bodiless spirits, without the prolongation of an imprinting of it into a somatic being. In the end, all these pressures are live also by the human subject as some spiritual pressures in his spirit himself, and these spiritual pressures being far more clearly, they can rightly be called illuminations. The imprinting of those ones in the somatic organization it is not else but a prolongation of the experience of that pressure. Actually, the man knows God through an unconditional responsibility towards the supreme spiritual pressure of this authority, lived right within his being. What the angels themselves wouldn’t live this unconditional responsibility for, in a mode even clearer than the man does it, for they aren’t disturbed, in the finesse of this living, by the body’s attractions towards more external preoccupations?” (Stăniloae 2003: 450-451)

“This narrowed knowledge it is adapted to the understanding of the world as being the ultimate reality, but as a reality with a character of an object meant to exclusively satisfy the bodily needs of the rational creature, which have become passions. This knowledge is being adapted to the human passions and pride, under the power of which the man has fallen, and it sees in creation a vast and ultimate opaque object, without any transparency, without any mystery which to exceed it. It is a knowledge that started through a spiritually undeveloped man and it has remained according to his measure, and stopping by this the man's spiritual growth in connection with the horizon from above the sensitive world. It is a knowledge that covers what is essential in creation, and therefore is knowledge in the ironical sense God speaks about it in Genesis 3: 22. It is a knowledge that won't ever know the ultimate meaning of the reality, the reality's purpose." (Stăniloae 2003: 494)

"The difficulty of knowing the transparent character of the creation and of the own person who opens their infinite meanings, it comes also from the fact that both the creation and the human person are no longer able to stop the corruption process that leads each man to death. If Adam hadn't committed sin, the conscious creature would have advanced towards some sort of 'stabile' movement, in increasing convergence and unification of the parts of the creation, of the man himself, and of the people amongst themselves and with God, in a movement of the universal love, in an overwhelming of the creation by the godlike Ghost. Through falling, there entered the creation a movement towards divergence too, towards decomposition. Only through Christ, as embodied God, the creation's parts started to be recomposed, in order to make its future transfiguration possible. This is for out of Christ it is poured within creation the unifier and eternally living Ghost." (Stăniloae 2003: 494-495)

"We mention that in the Orthodox vision, the world hasn't become totally and fatally opaque after falling, neither the man's knowledge has been totally narrowed to a knowledge adapted to an opaque, not-transparent world. The people can partially cross through this opaqueness through another type of knowledge and they often do it. But the people cannot totally overcome this opaqueness and knowledge adapted to it. These ones remain dominant structures." (Stăniloae 2003: 495)

"If the Son presents to the Father the good fragrance of the man who is totally surrendered to the Father – and in the same time with Himself, Christ presents also us to the Father – the Son communicates us not only the power of this good fragrance of the surrender, and therefore of renouncing to any egotism, but also the good fragrance of the knowledge of God to which the man has reached into Christ by this, or the good fragrance of the highest knowledge of God through the humanity of Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 74)

"The opening of the infinite horizons of the knowledge of the life in Christ – the Head of the Church – it is widened the most through the resurrection and through the ascent of Christ, as man, and through our partial participation to this since the time of our life on earth." (Stăniloae 2006: 94)

We must say a special word about the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and about His self-conscience, in which He is, like into a whole, and what can be given by the human nature, but also what the godlike nature brings. It is the most difficult part of this problem. It seems that through kenosis, in the sense of a gradual outpouring of the divine knowledge into the human knowledge candlestick with the growing of this one. In what concerns His conscience, in any case, from His early childhood, He clearly knew that He is the Son of God in Whose home it is His place. As Christ was growing up “in wisdom and age”, the pot of His conscience was becoming more and more capable to catch and transmit the light of the divine knowledge, into which, otherwise, He was bathed and, in braiding with the elevations of His human cogitation, He was seeing the unspoken mysteries of all the things.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Being God a Subject, in order us to ascend to understand Him, we need to leave all the objects and, by surrendering Him our subject, to come somewhat closer to understand Him. Everything that can be defined in the frame of the cogitation, it has an object character, given that no subject (either ours or belonging to our fellow humans) it cannot be comprised in a defined concept.” (Stăniloae 1992: 240)

“God isn’t according to the likeness of the things, of the concepts, or what can be content of the cogitation, of the objects by and large, which do not stand by themselves and for themselves. This is for all of these are, by their nature, inferior to cogitation, subordinate to the cogitation and to the subject cogitating at them and God cannot be subordinate to any power or work of all the existing ones. For our cogitating subject is the highest sovereign who we meet in the world, by ascending above all the object’s order and by avoiding any attempt to be grabbed by something, he is the sole entity who somehow has resemblance to God. So, in order us to somewhat ascend towards understanding God, we must understand first the subjects who cogitates within the created world. Actually, there cannot be about understanding in the usual meaning of “comprising”, because only the object can be comprised. That’s why we rather meet him than knowing him, and he remains uncaptured, sovereign, free, and indefinable, in front ops us. This is when it comes about our fellow human’s subject. But something somewhat similar happen also when it comes about our subject: our subject unveils and live on itself, it meets himself face to face like in a mirror, he runs into himself. When our subject comes across himself, he forgets about all things, better said, in order our subject to find himself he must forget about all things. The external things and the content of the cogitation, shortly speaking: the things, they stop the subject from turning towards himself. Only with great efforts, after long exercises, the subject reaches capable of detaching himself for several consecutive moments from the contents' slavery, which keep him away from home, and they narrow him according to their own limits." (Stăniloae 1992: 240)

"This turning of the subject upon himself it is a road leading closer to God than the affirmative or the negative theology, which are ways of the rationality using positively and negatively the things and the defined concepts. In this turning of the thinking subject upon himself, we have on one hand a fuller removal of the things and of the thinkable contents, but on the other hand the meeting of the subject with himself it unveils a positive given of an incomparable greater that all the removed objects constituting the point on which the rational act of denying everything it changes its structure, by becoming a feeling of a positive experiencing the deep reality of the own subject. But this reality isn't unveiled to us by itself, but it reveals to us, in a more intense and in a more obvious mode than the objects' world, the divine reality itself. This is for the indefinite depth and the subject's sovereignty do not allow to be caught in concepts, but, in a more adequate mode than the objects, they are transparent to God. The subject's indefinite that we still feel that isn't the attributed of the infinite, because of being there so many realities not depending on it, it allows us to intuit the divine infinity. The infinite cannot have his basis except on the divine infinity. And we feel somehow this basis like we feel the subject as basis of the body. The subject's sovereignty which we still feel about that it isn't an almightiness, it allows us realize the presence of an absolute sovereignty. The amazement the mystery of the subject causes to us it becomes amazement about the much greater mystery of the absolute Subject." (Stăniloae 1992: 241)

"The Holy Fathers affirmed that the mind reaching to look at itself it becomes transparent and it looks through itself at God. God "shows Himself in the clean mind as in a mirror, remaining, according to what He is in Himself, unseen" (Palamas, Word III, Triad I)." (Stăniloae 1992: 241)

"What nature this mind's transparency is of, in the basis of which the mind, by contemplating on itself, it contemplates God in the same time? Better said, what is the mind capable of being transparent by, and what "shape" this knowing of God, through the mediation of the mind it has, and what the mind realizes like, that it doesn't see only on itself, but it also sees God? This is for the mind gathered in its intimacy within heart, it find God there. This is for our intimacy, or our heart, when found, it isn't empty but in its indefinite contents is being reflected the presence of Christ. There is Christ, Who entered as forerunner at Baptism, there is the Kingdom of Heavens within us, there is the dwelling place of Christ, where nothing from the world's things can penetrate, and the one who crosses increasingly more inside his heart he gets increasingly closer to God. By penetrating in its heart by rejecting all the thoughts, the mind find there Christ dwelling in it. This encounter with God through the mind emptied of everything, we think that it is experienced as in the followings:

By turning upon ourselves as thinking subject, after the removal of any content that has by its nature limited contours, we experience a certain removal of the limits and something that cannot be caught, as an abyss opening, that we get dizzy of, when facing it, or we remain astonished. This dizziness or this astonishment in front of the abyss it means on one hand paralyzing the mind's powers, so that they no longer can move on a progressive direction. The abyss in front of the mind it is a great darkness. But, on the other hand, the mind realizes that this abyss isn't entirely a region belonging to our being, neither a void because of the absence of any reality, so that it isn't actually darkness, but it represents, in continuity or in touching with our subject's indefinite, the infinite deeps, but, still not-illuminated for us, of the godhead. Saint Maximos the Confessor called the God's wisdom as "abyss", and he called the clean mind as "the place of the abyss" that can be therefore called also as abyss. It is called as abyss by the fact that it is made thus (θέσει), as one capable of receiving the abyss, and the wisdom is abyss according to its nature. This means that the mind becomes limited when wraps around objects and finite concepts and it becomes limitless when, by leaving those, it receives the "shapeless" one, who doesn't give the mind any shape. So, when I feel the removal of the mind's limits, I feel in the same time that within mind there is the godhead too. This sheds light also upon the way which we will become god in, in the future, being without limits according to the grace.

For this moment is an astonishing of the mind, it represents a total apophatism, or the desertion not only of all the mind's contents, but even of the mind's working. After this moment of mind's stopping, some people receive as a gift from above the sight of the godlike light.

But this astonishment isn't an inertia like the physical astonishment is, or a spirit's falling asleep. In itself is involved an awareness: the feeling that is in the same time understanding (νοερα αιοθησις) above understanding of the limitless and impossible to be caught deep, of God, Who isn't a limited object but He is limitless and sovereign reality. In the removal of our limits we feel the pressure of a presence which penetrates us and which upholds us as foundation of our indefinite existence. That's what we can realize, and we cannot realize anything more. On one hand we realize that this limitless and absolutely sovereign reality it is something else than the reality of our subject, because we experience our subject's reality only as indefinite and as relatively sovereign, because it cannot be infinite and absolutely sovereign. But on the other hand, we cannot separate these in our spiritual experiencing and we cannot discern up where one is and up where another is.

We must highlight here, with the same strength, both these aspects of the experience had by the mind when is gathered within heart. If we accept only the first one we will abolish the unmediated connection of the heart with God, the presence of Jesus within heart, and implicitly the mysterious knowing of God. If we stress only upon the aspect of “non-separated and indistinct” aspect, we will slide in neo-Platonism and Hegelianism, which see the world in continuity of substance with the absolute and they consider that the gathering of the mind from scattering, and simplifying the mind, they mean finding again the absolute which is one with its intimate substance; so, the absolute doesn’t differ from the world by substance, but only by the fact that the absolute is The One, and the world is His multiple form. In reality, when the subject turns towards himself he doesn’t find only on himself there, and this experience excludes both the distancing from God and the identification to Him. Just when, by disrobing our selves of all the created world’s clothes, we would expect to look at our unveiled subject (γυμνος νοῦς) and to experience the sentiment of the fullest sovereignty, we found ourselves in front of a power whose mastery upon us it proves to be infinitely more imposing and more overwhelming than the mastery of the world. Although, we must undertake a great effort in order to get within reach of its mastery in a conscious manner and to remain there. While under the world’s slavery we fall by inertia, we become servants of God and remain thus through the greatest effort. This is for we become by this, in the same time, really free: enslaved to a loving supreme Person, in the fullest freedom.

If this abyss experienced by our mind when turning towards itself it had been a total darkness, as at Hegel, which we cannot tell anything about, it would have remained the possibility of a pantheistic equivocal, or an identification to our subject lost within that abyss. But we said that this abyss allows us to experience it as an absolute sovereignty. And in this it is shown this abyss’s character of subject and this is what distinguishes that abyss from our subject. By reaching in our pure intimacy, we experience the infinite, but as Person, presence of God, hidden under the veil of the fullest darkness, like we often feel that close to us there is a person – for we feel that person’s influence – but we cannot see that person in an unveiled manner.” (Stăniloae 1992: 242-244)

“During prayer the mind gains a self-transparency. Everywhere, the prayer is what makes possible the mind’s turning away from all things, from all ideas. This isn’t only a mind’s act of self-contemplation but it is an ecstasy of the cogitating subject, an act which this cogitating subject transcends himself through, which he extends himself beyond himself through, towards the supreme and infinite Subject. When praying our subject is aware of not being alone but we feel that we are in front of God. It would seem that the prayer isn’t also a preoccupation of the subject with himself, but is it’s a preoccupation only with God, and therefore getting closer to God in the time of prayer it isn’t done through the transparency of the actual subject.

But the mental prayer, by searching in the beginning, with the name of Jesus, for the place of the heart, it shows us that the mind, though it is preponderantly preoccupied with God, it searches for God through the intimacy of our subject. So, the prayer searches within heart or through heart for Jesus, and the fuller penetrates the heart and it becomes steadfast within heart, the more dominant becomes the certitude that it has found Jesus, that it is in front of Him. Through the mental prayer, the astonishing deeps - which the mind is transparent to after the removal of all the contents from within mind and after the mind's turning back upon itself - they are revealed as deeps of the supreme Subject Who is different from us, in Whose front we humble ourselves. The prayer's humbleness grows up out of the simultaneous awareness about our subject and the supreme Subject, differing from one another, but in connection and in reciprocal penetration. In prayer, we intuit around us and within us, with absolute certitude, the presence of the overwhelming supreme Subject. The more veridical is this experience, the fuller with certitude, the more we feel that the presence of the reality surrounding us it is an infinity - in comparison to which we aren't but a bit - and a sovereignty which everything depend on. This absolute infinity and sovereignty overwhelm us, so that the mind lets itself to be totally engulfed, or filled up with it, so that a consummate union it is accomplished, the heart "swallowing the Lord and the Lord the heart, the two becoming one." (Stăniloae 1992: 244-245)

"Only in prayer, namely in the mental prayer which we contemplate our pure subject through, we experience the presence of God as Subject and we do not cogitate Him, inadequately, as object. By no longer being God in this prayer object of ours, but Subject Who claims us and Who asks us for an obedience in freedom, He makes us feel His greatness, by keeping related to His majesty the awareness of our nothingness, which still lasts and which urges us to adore Him even more. God is thus the Subject to us and He stays on the foreground of our sight, our subject staying in His shadow. We are somehow received in His sphere, or He enters the content of our subject, filling is up and overwhelming it insomuch than we forget about ourselves, insomuch that we experience within ourselves His character as prime Subject and the force of the supreme Subject, without confounding Himself to us, for in the same time or in immediate alternation we also feel our smallness and our subordination which last through Him. In whispered or unformulated words, we hear ourselves as repeating in essence the thought of amazement and of prayer: "Lord, how great are You and how small and unworthy I am; have mercy on me!" (Stăniloae 1992: 246)

"Saint Mark the Ascetic said that the good thoughts, the thought worshipping Jesus, they come from Him, the One Who is present within our heart. Without us being from the beginning aware of His presence within our heart, he attracts our thought at Him, and us, by knocking with this thought on our heart's door, on His door, after He too knocked on our conscience's door with this thought, He opens to us and we enter the heart where He is, after we too opened to Him in order Him to enter our conscience. By entering our heart, we find Jesus there, but this is for He came out in front of us through our thought at Him, like the Father went out and welcomed his profligate son. Empirically, we cannot ascertain that Jesus was within our heart from before, but it seems to us that He entered our heart only now, in the same time with our entering. But the perseverance which we have been searching for Him by calling upon Him, it cannot be explained except by the fact that He was within us from before, in a hidden manner, but effectively influencing us, for on one hand to help us, and on the other hand also to set our powers in work in discovering Him, in order these powers of ours to be developed and to become able to understand Him. Thus, by searching for Him and by finding Him, in the same time we are searching for and we find our intimacy, or vice versa, this searching consists of our effort stimulate and helped by Him." (Stăniloae 1992: 247)

"The mind, after reaching the last levels of the prayer and of the thinking, at the spiritual image of Christ, it stops amazed in front of the divine indefinite, not remaining within mind except the love that has been gradually growing up through the man's zeal up to the limits of his powers. On this moment of amazed stop of any mental work, on this moment which the spirit feels the limit of the human powers on (Grenzsituation), the love from God descends upon the human spirit and it kidnaps the human spirit in ecstasy. This is exclusively godlike work. Our soul realizes that that experience isn't the product of some own effort. But this doesn't exclude the self-awareness and the awareness about the One Who the soul loves. This is for the soul in this awareness he sees in the same time his state of amazement, his helplessness of moving itself through efforts of understanding in the mysterious interior of the borderless which he feels. This will be the soul's state in the future life, a state lived here only for short period of time, and in much lower degrees. That stopping doesn't mean everywhere a ceasing of any activity from within mind, for now it is working there the Holy Ghost, and the mind is aware of His work and it perceives His work. The ones who have reached this state, they see, they know, they receive, they embrace joyfully the untold things. That's why, as Saint Gregory Palamas said, when exiting this state those people can communicate their experiences to others, and this removes the wrong idea that within their spirit everything has been stopped, or numbed: "And those one unveil, as much as it is possible, the untold things, for they are urged only and only by their love for their fellow human, in order to scatter away from the uninitiated believers the straying that after the removal of the ideas regarding the things, there takes place a total resting and not a resting that is above any resting" (Word III, Triad I, Gr. 100). This is for somehow the mind participates too, to that work, for there takes place “a giving and a receiving”, according to the same Saint (Ibid). The holy Ghost gives them, and the mind received them. The previous stopping means only that the mind no longer unveils them by its work, but they are now being unveiled by the work of the Holy Ghost. So, the mind no longer modifies the receive things through its work, but the mind received them as they are. Even their receiving is done by the mind through the work of the Holy Ghost. We could say that just for that the mind know now the reality more truly, for the mind no longer modifies the reality through its own work. The mind no longer processes the knowledge, but the mind only receives the knowledge, namely it endures the knowledge. But this suffering it is life, as well.” (Stăniloae 1992: 277-278)

“The knowledge understood as life, as life in love, it has an existential character. It is not only a part of the life, or something stranger and opposed to life, as often it appears to us on the plan from here, but it is the life itself. “This is the eternal life: they to know You, the One, the True God” (Jn. 13: 3). Wanting to highlight the existential character of this experienced in love knowledge, Saint Maximos the Confessor compared it to the fire’s warmth, felt by the body in a material manner, unlike the knowledge through the faith without love, whose content isn’t being lived, but it is at distance, and he compares is to the imagined or remembered fire: “Like the memory of the fire doesn’t warm the body up, likewise the faith without love doesn’t work within soul the light of the knowledge” (Cap. de char. I, 9).” (Stăniloae 1992: 281)

“The asceticism as road of the most rigorous practical rationality and of the fullest knowledge of the things’ rationalities, it is the proof that one reaches the living of the union with God not by going around the rationality, but by previously using all its possibilities in order out of this too the nature to gain a supreme capacity of becoming vessel of the supra-human understanding, which is communicated by the grace of the Holy Ghost. God is the supreme Rationality, the source of all things’ rationalities. The mind elevated in the phase of the union with God to the unmediated contemplation of this Rationality, it must be prepared for the understanding of this bosom of all rationalities, by knowing as many as possible of them, though the limitless-the-more the mind knows it know overshadows the knowledge mode from before.” (Stăniloae 1992: 12)

“If the symbol offers us an antinomic knowledge about God, we will owe to meditate a little upon the mode which this antinomic relation of God with us is accomplished in, through the world as symbol, namely upon the nature of his antinomy. Serge Bulgakov claimed that the icon’s defenders left the objection of the iconoclasts without an answer, that God, by being unseen and shapeless, He cannot be represented in icon, so that the icon’s defenders didn’t build up a solid doctrine for the icons’ cult, which to be possible of introducing as dogma in the definition of the VII Ecumenical Synod, but they were satisfied by affirming that Christ, as man, by being possible represent Him in icon, through this He is also caught as God, though this conclusion is an forced one.

But the icons' defenders, though, they answered this objection. This answer was expressed by Patriarch Nicephorus the Confessor." (Stăniloae 2005: 102)

"We have been given the world not only as an arena making our life possible, but also as a means of knowing God increasingly better, depending on our sanctification by grace, and through our activity, according to the prototypes. This is because the creature knows God only in the "paradigms" or in the "forms" condescending to His cogitation. And we can know these paradigms and forms for they have their reflection in the seen forms of the things which they work within. If those paradigms hadn't existed, there wouldn't have been things and beings having certain forms and there wouldn't have been a knowledge of God through these forms of theirs." (Stăniloae 2005: 115)

"The philosophy known since Kant, the "transcendental" reality of the cogitation's laws, of the judgments, which, though they cannot be actually accomplished except through the man historically determined, in concrete psychological (and physiological) conditions, though they differ from these conditions. And Husserl, by developing this idea, he highlighted that in each concrete thing our mind contemplates, by transcending form the thing's phenomenality, or by placing this phenomenality in "parentheses", through the so-called "phenomenological reduction". It is to be noticed the fact that, to this contemplation of the essence it is necessary a looking at the respective thing with the sensitive eyes. And the contemplated "essence" was called by Husserl also as "shape" (essential shape) of the respective thing (eidos), though it differs from the concrete materiality of the thing. It is being reiterated here the Holy Fathers' teaching regarding the mind that by looking through eyes at the sensitive things, it passes to the intelligible things (ta noeta) and it knows them." (Stăniloae 2005: 148-149)

"There is, so, a sight above the mind's works, no matter Barlaam denied it. It is called as sight in an improper sense, because it is above any sight, like it is sometimes called as well as understanding, but not in a proper sense, because it is above understanding. Properly-said, it doesn't have a name and it is above any name. The names which it is called with, they are bellow it." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 60)

"Barlaam was right saying that the apophatic theology belongs to the mental sphere. It only denies the known things, but not the unknow things as well. The mind can understand what it is denied to God by the apophatic theology. But it is something else the sight above mind. If our mind hadn't been able to exceed itself, there wouldn't have existed sight and understanding above mental works. But by having this power, the only one which unites with God and it becomes work, during prayer, through God, there is such a sight above all the mental works, a sight which we call as above understanding. One could call this also as non-sight or nescience, meaning that it exceeds any sight and any knowledge. That the mind has a power which it exceeds itself through, and which the mind is united through, with the things from about itself, it was also said by Saint Dionysius the Areopagite: "Our mind has, on one hand, the power of understanding, which it sees the intelligible things through, and on the other hand there is the union exceeding the mind's nature and which the mind unites with the things which are above mind" (G.P. 3, 865 D). This union that exceeds the mind's nature, it is obvious that it is above all the mind's works, and it isn't knowledge, because of exceeding the knowledge; it connects the mind to God, and not to the created things, as the knowledge does." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 60)

"To Barlaam the understanding is superior to seeing. But then the theological commentary of the Scripture it would have been superior to the Scripture. In some Scripture's places it is said that the angel come and explained the view to the prophet, but this means only that the angel understood that view better than the prophet did; that view was something way deeper than the prophet who was seeing it could fully understand. The understanding is superior to nescience, but it isn't superior to seeing." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 64)

"Barlaam didn't admit any other way of knowing God except the rational way. But, if that had been the case, then there wouldn't have been any difference between pagans and Christians. And the pagan scholars would have been more seers of God than the prophets. The knowledge from within creatures it is inferior and non-full; the true knowledge about God is that above senses and above mind and through the power of the Holy Ghost, when the union with God is done within heart. And one is led to the clean heart by keeping the godlike commandments." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 65)

"The devil too, he knows the things. Does he remain into God? Does the one who knows but who doesn't do the will of God, that one remains in God too? (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 65)

"If the man remains to the simple knowledge of the things and to the adapting of their rationalities to his bodily needs, he still won't understand their full purpose, their light. The man asks himself: what he exists for, as knower existence, and what the nature's components exist for, as rationalities on the measure of the man's knowledge, and adaptable, through reason, to his needs? If the man doesn't see a purpose of his earthly existence, he remains himself - with his noticing rationality and with the rationality of the noticeable things - in darkness." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 6)

"The self-knowledge, through the Three Persons, of the supreme existence, since it is limitless and belonging to Subjects Who are limitless too, it is a knowledge comprising, through its limitlessness, both the Light and the Mystery. They see Their Limitless Mystery as Light, and Their Light as limitless Mystery." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 186)

"The more the human beings know the possible connections amongst the universe's components, the more complex become too, the connections amongst the words uttered by them. Thus, the human being's rationality actualizes, increasingly more, its untold potentialities in nuancing and in expressing. The human being gets spiritually developed, in connection with the universe and through body, but together with others. But in this, the human being lives, in the same time, his superiority upon the universe, and he becomes increasingly aware of this superiority, that is increasingly unveiled to him. The universe always remains an object to the human being, and the human being must realize it, namely the human being must be aware of the fact that he has been placed on a higher plan, or that he is destined to a higher plan, which he will also elevate the universe on, on the basis of the universe's virtuality and on the basis of his own virtuality. Sometimes, the human being can better understand the world through simple, unitary intuitions, than by ramifying in many ideas and in many words. This is for the human being won't ever be able to exhaust his mind's capacity of understanding, which the universe is entrusted, to be understood by." (Stăniloae 1995: 126)

"Saint Maximos said that That One Whom the people are striving to reach at, driven by the longing imprinted in their nature, it is One with the Truth. The ones who have prepared their souls on this purpose, "they will be moved, without toil, after this life, to the future Truth Who has been contoured to them well, still from the life from here, through increasingly godlike meanings"; "for, after they have taken here the symbols¹⁷⁷ of the Truth, it will be added them, then, the unveiled Truth". (Stăniloae 1995: 136)

¹⁷⁷ Father Florin Gașpar (PhD student at "Ilarion Felea" Faculty of Theology from "Aurel Vlaicu University" from Arad, whom we have asked for help in translating this term (in the Romanian text chipuri, with the direct equivalent as images), suggested that the text actually speaks about the Uncreated Divine Energies, which the spiritually advanced believers can know even while living in the present material body, while they are in the image of God, and then, in the Kingdom of Heavens, the persons will be in the likeness of God.

“The indefinite of the human nature, as concretized in always differing persons, it is due to the fact that the human nature it destined, through its rationality and aspiration, towards increasingly more knowledge. The human being never reckons himself as reached to the end of the knowledge, through his rationality, as we’ve seen that Saint Athanasius the Great said. The human being seen in any little piece of his being, and in each thing, a concretized rationality, and he sees too, a rational connection amongst all things, a rational connection that he won’t ever be able to finish knowing it through his rationality. The human being is, in his being, an embodied logic, but he sees also an extended logic, one impossible to him to exhaust through his analyzes, a logic related to the whole universe. It is a logic that can be, in the same tie, shaped in diverse ways, by the human being’s freedom. The human being sees a logic also in his relations with the other persons, and he sees that logic while changing himself, and while enriching himself through the relations with those persons. The universe of the object and of his fellow humans, it can reveal to the human being other and other possibilities, other and other forms in harmony or in disharmony, having their cause in their freedom, in the relations of love or in the relations of egotism and enmity. Though, the human being normally lives a thirst for indoles love, one that opens to the logic of the relations amongst people, and between people and nature, endless perspectives. If this possibility of shaping the bodies, the economic life, and the social relations amongst people, by themselves, or by the interpersonal relations of the humanity, it was noticed by the medicine and by other sciences, they would pay more attention to heighten the ethical level of the spirit, and that would shun them from incomplete efficiency, an inefficiency coming from the fact that they reckon that the illnesses and the social conflicts are due to a nature which cannot be except as it is. They would see the material universe is mostly as the people make it be, and the fact that the people could elevate the relations amongst themselves and between them and the material universe, on levels of ever-increasing quality, and, so, their knowledge could be much more elevated and widened, and they would lose their rigidity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 143-144)

“The experience makes the man always new. The experience doesn’t have only a function of acquiring knowledge, but also of continuously building the man up. In the present experience I bring everything I have reached to be through the passed experiences, but through the present experience I also bring something new in my existence. On each moment I am everything I’ve experienced, plus the present experience. That’s why, I won’t ever be able to tell that I have finished knowing me in my essence, neither that I have finished building myself up. I will always be open to a continuous forming, through the future experiences, which, in the same time, they will enrich my knowledge. And in the fact that the man never reckon himself as reaching the end of his forming and knowledge, it is implied the man’s conscience that he is destined to eternity or to immortality. The man is made to continuously running towards, further away, in eternity. Saint Apostle Paul expressed this characteristic of the man, by saying: "I haven't taken the reward, neither I am consummate, but I pursuit it for I may catch it. Brothers, I still don't reckon that I've conquered it. But I do this: the things from the past forgetting, and tending towards the things from ahead, I am running to the target, to the rewards of the godlike calling, into Christ Jesus" (Philip. 3: 11-14)." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 32-33)

"The human being wants to know all the things for, the more he knows many things and the more he communicates with many persons, the more he encounters their thirst for Absolute, a thirst confirming his own thirst." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 35-36)

"The man's unilateral contrastive unity is shown also in his quality as hypostasis, or as person composed of spirit and body. Through his spirit, the man can tend towards an ever-greater participation to God, while through his body the man can tend to know the whole world. But only for the man has his spirit into his body, he is able to embrace in his conscience the world, to an ever-greater extent, and he has the possibility of extending his knowledge and his work upon the world, ever-further. With his eyes the man looks at the things up far, and through instruments he always increases the range of his look. In this we can see that the man is, in the same time, a unitary and composed hypostasis: the powers of his soul and the powers of his body are concentrated in a unitary conscience and they come out of it. The body, by having the soul within, it is commensurable in this sense to the universe. And, as the man is never satisfied of extending his knowledge ever-further, the universe, for it corresponds to this unquenchable thirst of the man for knowledge, it has, at its turn, an extension which the man won't ever be able to reach at, or, the man practically cannot even imagine it. But, in the same time, in this extension of the universe, which margin the man cannot imagine, he sees one of his insufficiencies, equivalent to a limitation in all regards, inside which the man doesn't want to remain, but he tends towards the really infinite Absolute Who maintain within man his eternal thirst for knowledge." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 43)

"The known and the unknown me, are the same, but still, in the action of knowing, there occurs also a certain duality between the known self and the knower self. If I had been only a knower self, I wouldn't have been preoccupied except with the things and with the persons differing from me. In such a case the human being wouldn't have had a self-awareness. Consequently, he wouldn't have been either a knower. So, the human being cannot have a spiritual life except in this duplication between the knower self and the known self, the last one being sunken in the godlike infinite. If there hadn't been this doubling, the human being wouldn't have been different from animal. The animal too, it is moved by his bodily necessities. But this movement isn't upheld by a self-awareness. It is something analogue to the body's processes which aren't noticed by man through his conscience." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 63)

"Within man, there takes place a "renewal" of him towards himself. As the knower-me the human being turns towards himself as the known-me. The human being turns towards himself through his self-awareness. The human being looks at himself with the light of the self-awareness. By receiving the light from this self-awareness, he turns that light towards himself. And in his self-awareness, there is equally much light as he receives from his self-awareness. Although, he sees his self-awareness as springing out from a background of mystery, which it tends penetrate into. And even if cannot penetrate it, the human being has in another mode the conscience and the knowledge about that mystery: by living it. The own self fuels the light of knowing the self, but this light makes the own self only partially known to the human being. The more he knows his own self, the more the own self reveals his quality as mystery." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 63)

"My knower-self doesn't know only on himself as me-to-be known, but he knows also a depth which he is sunken within, or which he is crossed through by. This is for the me-to-be-known appears to the knower-me not only as a me standing by himself, but more than that. In this quality the me appears as having within himself inexhaustible reserves which exceed him. By this, even the knower-me knows on himself as receiving light not only from the known-me, but also from what is above him, as eternally shining within him unknown reserves, of as being in an intimate connection with God." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 63)

"In his need of continuously asking on himself and in his need of constantly answering his questions, it is shown that the human being is thirsty for an infinity of another order. In his thirst for infinite in the self-knowledge, the human being knows a real infinity which is not his. Even by answering his own questions in an unsatisfactory mode, the human being advances not only in his own self-knowledge, but also in the knowledge about God and, thus, he also exceeds himself. That's why, the human being never reaches the end of his questions and of his answers, or of his thirst for more life, which implies also a knowledge of, or a thirst for God. But this implies the human being's need to prolong his existence forever. This is for nothing is so addictive and nothing give more joy to the human being, than to know all the things and to unite himself with all the things, and that cannot be accomplished except by knowing God and by uniting with God. If the man never fully satisfies his thirst for knowing all things and for uniting himself with all the things, it means that the human being won't ever reach the end of fully understanding his existence. Saint Gregory of Nyssa spoke about the human being's epektasis. The human being always stretches himself from what he knows, from the reached kindness and joy given by a knowledge, towards a higher kindness and joy. He never finishes knowing on himself. In his endless thirst to know on himself and to make on himself better and more united with all the things, it is implied also his thirst for the endless existence and for the borderless life. Stopping himself somewhere, on an edge, it means suffering, consequently, a deadly boredom." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 63-64)

"The fact that the human being won't ever reach to fully know on himself or to fully accomplish on himself, in communion with all the things, it leads us to the conclusion that he constantly must manifest and confess his modesty. The human being is a wonderful being in his richness, especially in the conscience of the richness he can reach to. But, in the fact that he won't ever reach to be fully satisfied with what he knows and with his accomplishment as human in communion with others, it is shown that this richness of his it isn't through himself, but it is connected to a special source and it needs an external existence and a communication with the Person-Absolute in order to be achieved." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 64)

"The human being is endowed with soul's faculties, which he can be thirsty of knowledge through, and which can answer this thirst for knowledge through, and to know ever-more and to accomplish through an ever-deeper kindness an ever-deeper and an ever-wider communion, which leads him to the communion with the Person-Absolute. Namely, the human being is endowed with rationality, or, by and large, with the power of understanding and with the impulse to be kind and increasingly more kind." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 64)

"Even if we take in consideration only his thirst for knowledge, it shows us that the human being is endowed with rationality and with will in order to advance in the direction of his thirst. If the man hadn't been endowed with rationality, he wouldn't have had the thirst for understanding and the will to know, and to get along with others, and to enjoy the gifts they can communicate to him. If the human being hadn't been endowed with rationality and with the desire for knowledge and for uniting himself, endlessly, with everybody, the man wouldn't have asked, endlessly, about himself and about his mystery. In itself the continuous question about himself and about his mystery, it is shown his desire and his will for knowing and for uniting himself through knowledge and through kindness, with everybody, by feeling that only thus he can reach to be happy." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 64)

“Directly and permanently, I live only on myself. I gather within me the whole awareness from you, from him, and from the world (the world doesn’t have initiative in communicating it to me) and I communicate it to you and to him. Everything crosses through me. What doesn’t come within me, I cannot know that. What I do not find out that is communicated, I also cannot know. Even if the knowledge comes from you and from him, if that knowledge doesn’t come also from me, then I won’t know about that knowledge. Even if my fellow humans communicate their knowledge amongst themselves, if I do not know about that, it is like they won’t ever communicate that knowledge.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66)

“I am a gatherer and spreading of light center. And, if there aren’t you and him, I won’t be able to gather that light, I won’t have whom to communicate it, and I do not know about gathering that light and about spreading that light towards you and towards him, namely towards others. But I know too, that both you and him, or others, they are gatherer and spreading of light centers. I know too, that you and him are, each one, a me, or a gatherer and spreading of light center, like I am too.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66)

“If I didn’t know about you and about him, I wouldn’t have where to gather the light from, and whom to give that light to, as a gift. But you and him are centers to me, especially for the communicative and requiring force you manifest towards me.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66)

“What can be reconciled like, this apparent contradiction between my centrality and my dependence of the centrality of others? What can be reconciled like, the fact that only through me I am able to know everything and without me I won’t know anything with certitude? From the fact that I, you, and him aren’t simply exterior to one another, but in a sense you and him are connected to and condition my inferiority, by forming together a multiple triangle. I hold the position of a fix angle, but an angle that isn’t outside the connection with the other two angles. In the most direct manner, I know only about myself, but I do not know about myself without knowing about you and about him, even only through my conscience. I know that I don’t accomplish myself except by answering their conscious requests, and answering their need for communicating myself to them.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66)

“I am a transparent and springing of light wall, having you in front of me and having him aside, and others, as transparent and springing of light walls, addressing requests to me. Without you and him, I won’t be a living and lightened garden. I directly know about myself for I am sending light towards you and towards him, and I know that you send your communicative and requiring light towards me, and that both of us we send our light towards him and he sends his light towards us. I know about you only through myself, but not without finding out from you that you are open to me and listening to me, and that you communicate, on yourself, to me, and that to open me through your requests, and that I need you and you need me. I directly know about the wall from ahead, while about the side wall I know by the fact that you communicate than to me, or by the fact that he communicated, on himself, to me or that he will be able to communicate, on himself, to me, as a you. Sometimes, the place of the front wall remains occupied, but I know that that place can be occupied by a side wall. The role of this wall can be played by the side walls, one at the time, in their quality as him, and in such a case, you as front wall become side wall.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66)

“If it has been only me, and if I had known only about myself, I would have been locked up in my loneliness. Of I wouldn’t have known anything about myself, neither about my duties for you and for others. Each one will really live like me only if he knows about you and him, only by the fact that they know and their turn as me with a listening attention, requiring and communicative, directed towards the self, an own self seen by them as you and as him, or with this attention directed towards others, in their quality as other transparent walls, or as cells connected amongst themselves, of a honeycomb. If there hadn’t been somebody to tell me: I love you, or somebody to talk about me through somebody else: I love him, or I ask you, or I ask him, and I communicate to you, or I communicate to him a certain thing, I wouldn’t have felt myself as a center of life for others, but I would have felt myself outside any attention. I know myself as being a center to them, but I need you and I need him, as centers to me, or to ascertain that I am recognized as their center, as they are, at their turn, centers of my attention. The full value of each one it is upheld by being recognized by the others.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 66-67)

“The order of the meanings isn’t the product of the human psychic and it neither ends with human psychic’s processes. This is because it is imposed to us, whether we want or not, and through the aspirations it sows within us it exceeds our psychic possibilities. The man cannot live without it. But it imposes itself to us as a man’s personal, infinite, and superior to the man horizon, requiring the man’s freedom in order to impart the men with itself. It calls the man to a certain impartation of itself, in freedom, ever since the man’s earthly existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 17)

“This entering in report with God the Savior, it does not exclude the knowledge, but it barely means the true knowledge of God: “And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.” (Jn. 17: 3).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God wants His revealed truth to reach to be understood and lived in the whole its amplitude and deepness, of which the association with the experience and with the knowledge of this world - which we live into - it can be occasioned. Everything this world can offer us, like maximum knowledge and deed, it must be done the environment to which and which the light of the Revelation to be projected increasingly ampler through.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Our being isn’t only organic nature or inorganic nature, but it has also a soul endowed with mind and will. In his mind there is a relentless impulse towards knowledge. This impulse cannot be understood without the previous certitude regarding the existence of some external realities which must be known.” (Stăniloae 1992: 16)

“N. Hartmann (Metaphysik der Erkenntnis), taking an idea from the Christians thinker Simon Frank (Connaissance et Être 1931), he formulated even more clearly the truth that our mind has, before explicitly knowing a reality, the general conscience of that reality’s existence. Immediately that it has made explicit through knowledge a piece of its reality-object, it has the conscience that, beyond the reality that has become object of the knowledge, there is the trans-object, namely the reality that hasn’t yet become object of the explicit knowledge. The mind has previous evidence, of general order, of a reality that always falls beyond its ray of direct ascertainment.” (Stăniloae 1992: 16)

“Blondel (L’Action, vol. I: 368) says that the mind has not only the previous evidence of a trans-objective reality by and large, but also the evidence of an infinite reality. The mind is more or less aware of the fact that its thirst of knowledge won’t be appeased, and that no finite object will content the mind after the mind will have known it. From here comes to the mind, in the same more or less confuse mode, the evidence that this thirst will last forever – the reality having an infinity of relatively endless objects – or it will get rest, though being eternally fuelled, in the knowledge of a general integral reality, infinite in itself, of another nature than what can be finite. And as the first thesis scares the mind as a perspective of endless tiredness never finding its resting in a supreme, total, endless, and unlimited satisfaction, from the alternative staying in front of it in a general mode, it raises up more luminous and more convincing the second part of it.” (Stăniloae 1992: 16-17)

“Consequently, if the created mind comes in the world with the impulse to know – and to know the infinite One -, this impulse is the proof that the mind is made for infinite, that He has existed before the mind, if from the first moment of the mind’s awakening the mind presupposes Him as existing. And somewhere there will have to be found a reality to be known, bigger than the mind is, and infinite reality, if in the mind there is such a fiery aspiration towards knowledge and if no finite object can satisfy this aspiration towards knowledge, but rather it disappoints the mind's expectations. The mind is made for searching for God, and the finite realities as they are one by one reached and surpassed, they cannot have as object of knowledge the negative purpose of constantly deceiving the mind, of mocking the mind's impulse towards knowledge, but they must have the positive purpose of successively preparing the mind for the great encounter, for understanding the One Who stays at the final end of all things." (Stăniloae 1992: 17)

"Let's analyze for a moment the nature of the mind's impulse towards knowing God and the nature of this implicit certitude the mind has it about Him. Can these be understood in the frame of the thesis that there is a total separation between man and God? Would there be possible to understand this impulse as being locked up in a mind totally separated especially from the infinite reality, as also from the external reality by and large? This relentless impulse towards knowledge it cannot be upheld except by an inexhaustible source. Upon the mind there must be exercised an impulsive and attractive influence by the prime cause of the creation and the creation's ultimate purpose. And the mind's implicit certitude about an intelligible infinite reality, as long as the mind hasn't actually known that reality, certitude upheld by this impulse towards knowledge, it shows that, before seeing, the mind touches (feels, E. l. t.'s n.), somehow, the reality that follows to be known; this means that the mind is previously in some kind of unmediated bond with that reality, and that reality is felt by the mind like in some kind of darkness." (Stăniloae 1992: 17)

"The gifts from the Holy Ghost guide us and uphold us in knowing God in a mediated manner. Differing from this it is the direct knowing of God, which will constitute the third step of the spiritual ascent or the phase of the union of the soul with God or of the union of the soul with God, or of seeing the godlike light. In the second phase, namely that of the illumination, we occupy ourselves with knowing God through the mediation of the nature and of the human deeds, individual and collective. This is a knowledge that follows immediately after the stage of the dispassion, which is a cleaning up of passions, but still not a cleaning up of the simple images of the things. After the mind will be cleaned up not only of passions, but also of the images and of the simple representations of the things, we will be given the direct knowledge of God, the theological knowledge from the phase three." (Stăniloae 1992: 161)

"For the unmediated knowing of God still is a knowledge through the Holy Ghost, namely through the gifts from the Holy Ghost, even from the second phase of knowledge the man “knows into Ghost”. But it is “knowledge through the Holy Ghost even from this phase, for it takes place after the man through his virtues, and through the gifts from the Holy Ghost, he has unlocked the or he has actualized the ghost from within himself, as the central and intimate place of the mind, and he has opened this eye destined to seeing God. The illuminating gifts of the Ghost become obvious to the man only through this opening of this eye of his, of this pantry destined to be filled up with godlike life. The Holy Ghost makes Himself known to us only as activating our ghost.” (Stăniloae 1992: 161)

“Knowing through the Holy Ghost it means knowing through the mind returned back into its ghost, from the scattering at surface. The “knowing into ghost” it is knowledge from this intimate interior of the man, from the place of the godlike light which fills this ghost up. Through this light all the things become transparent to the one who known “into ghost”, for to his sight, the surface of the things and of the human deeds is no longer an opaque wall, but it is a transparent which one can see the meanings and their connection with God through. He no longer stops himself, through passions, on the surface: he has crossed beyond his surface and beyond the thickened surface of the things.” (Stăniloae 1992: 162)

“It is a great mystery this seeing in the depths of the things and of the human destinies. These depths cannot be opened exclusively through the sensorial noticing of the things, because if that had been the case, anybody would have been capable of noticing them as one notices the thing’s sensitive structure, through the generalizing rationality, or the bunches of common features of the individuals of the same species, through the so-called “notions” or “essences” which are immanent to the things. But if the depths become transparent only to the one who have been elevated from his thickened shell to “his ghost”, it will mean that this ghost has a power of penetrating the things’ depths, either for the light from the ghost penetrates into the things’ depths or for it makes the light hidden within things to become transparent. Only on the measure which somebody has become to himself on, the things also become transparent to him. This is for the same power working within him it will then stretch outwards. The Holy Fathers use the following comparison: as in order our eyes to see the physical light and the things from within it, likewise, in order the eyes of our soul to see the light of the intelligible and divine realities, namely the thing’s depths, these eyes of our soul must be previously filled up with the light irradiating from these realities. Within the one who sees there must be something out of what he sees. That’s why Saint Maximos the Confessor called the depths of the Holy Scripture as “its ghost”, like the depths from within man he called it as “the ghost of the man”. That one notices the ghost of the Holy Scripture who looks at the Holy Scripture through his ghost. In other terms, the depths form within man and the depths of the things are illuminated by a common light, or, out of them it irradiates a common light. A common light unites the human subject with the things or with his fellow humans. Who has received this light within himself, he has penetrated in the area of the depths differing from him. His self and those depths form through that light a dual unit, like in a more reduced measure they form such a unity in the world's visible area too, through the physical light engulfing it, or that crosses through it, with the seeing power of the bodily senses." (Stăniloae 1992: 162-163)

"The separation between subject and object it is overcome on the plan of the mysterious knowledge in ghost, without these two to be confounded. The subject and the object are different to one another, but they aren't separated. It is overcome the separation between subject and object and though both of them are saved, for the subject experiences in his depths an "object" differing from him. But the "object" experienced within subject, by being a spiritual reality or by being connected inwardly to the subject, it is in continuity or in a inter-communication with the knowing subject and, both of them, with the supreme Subject staying at the basis of all things. Of course, that spiritual reality isn't a uniform one, but it is various, it is a world full of rationalities, out of which it is incorporated the structure characteristic to each thing in its seen countenance, the structure characteristic to each person, or to each individual action. But it is not less true that they too are intertwined in an ensemble, or that they are merged in the same understood and understanding light. And when that light has filled our inside up, it doesn't appear to us as limited by the margins of our being, but as extended over all the things which we united ourselves with, through cleanness and love.

Through this light the singular things and the nature in its totality, they become a transparent which their higher rationalities and their connections to God become transparent through. Through thing is seen, somehow, God Himself." (Stăniloae 1992: 163)

"Like the Law is a pedagogue towards Christ, likewise the man, as long he is child in his understanding, he is being guided by the mirrors and by the riddles of the created world towards knowing God. The rationalities from within the created world take the place of the sights and they make possible a partial understanding of the wisdom of God." (Stăniloae 1992: 164)

"This glimmer isn't an objective given to anybody, but one discovers it only in a spiritual feeling, only by seeing it "in ghost", as Saint Maximos the Confessor would have said. But for this sight "in ghost" of the world's rationalities, a sight differing from knowing them deductively, or rationally, one needs a previous purification of his being, through long asceticism." (Stăniloae 1992: 168)

“The world’s existence if proven as having, in addition to other meanings, also that one of exercising all our soul’s powers in our ascension towards God. If God had wanted to make Himself known at once, or directly, the things’ world would have been lacking one of its meanings. The existence of the world itself as road towards God it is a proof that the supreme knowledge about God it isn’t and irrational act, but it is a supra-rational act, namely it isn’t done by prematurely renouncing to rationality, namely through a direct jump outside rationality, but it is done by surpassing the rationality on a level that doesn’t abolish the rationality, but it implies the rationality, after activating and using all the rationality’s resources, and after a fuller exercising of the rationality’s powers. We will be elevated to a supra-rational knowledge about God, but not to an anti-rational knowledge, after through our rationality itself, exercised at maximum, we understand that the domain which we have penetrated in, it exceeds the limited rational powers of ours, by a plus of light, and not by a minus of light. On the peak of the knowledge about God we know too much, we notice too many meanings and in a too luminous form, and not too little, related to the rationality’s pretenses. This is the fact stopping us from claiming that this abundance has its source only within our rationality. It has its source also in a supra-rationality from above its own powers, but which doesn’t annul our rationality. But, in order to reach this too-much intelligibility, we must have reached to know the upper powers of our understanding power.” (Stăniloae 1992: 169)

“According to the Holy Fathers, in order to discover the rationalities from things, it is needed a long purification of passions and a prolonged exercise, and this fact shows us that neither the “rationality” in its common meaning, it is that one that notices the “rationalities” of the things and God through these ones, but it is about a rationality exercised also by choosing the rational deeds required by the godlike commandments and through the gradual “rationalization” of the man, which is achieved through virtues. But this gradual exercising of the rationality through knowing and doing, it has at its basis the act of intuitively knowing, which the long-exercised rationality is involved in.” (Stăniloae 1992: 169)

“The rationality which we contemplate within the world’s things are, according to the Holy Fathers, the God’s ideas. Better said, the things send our mind towards the ideas from within God, which the things are created according to. These are the rationalities of the divine Logos, and as they form in Him a unitary ensemble, likewise the things are such an ensemble. The wisdom, by noticing the unitary truth from within all things, it notices the ensemble of the divine ideas of the Logos.” (Stăniloae 1992: 181-182)

“In order the man to know the Logos out of nature and out of Scripture, and this will be necessary to him if he wants to reach the consummation, he must understand both of them in “ghost”, by crossing beyond their material shell.” (Stăniloae 1992: 183)

“According to the explanation given by Saint Maximos the Confessor to the Lord’s Transfiguration, the shiny face of Jesus means the law of the grace, which is no longer hidden by the veil, and the white and changed vestments mean in the same time the Scripture’s letter and the nature, both of them becoming transparent in the light of the spiritual and by grace understanding. From the human face of the Logos, it is spread the light upon the old law and upon nature.” (Stăniloae 1992: 183)

“The spiritual understanding of the Scripture it is a steadfast tradition of the Eastern spiritual writing; Saint Maximos the Confessor had always the harshest words for the ones who cannot elevate themselves above literally understanding the Scripture. Over those ones, as also upon the Jews understanding the Scripture bodily, it masters the hell, namely the nescience.” (Stăniloae 1992: 183-184)

“Spiritually understanding the Scripture, or getting into connection through the Scripture’s words with the “words”, with the living meanings and with the intentional energies of God, it needs a preparation, as also for knowing the living rationalities or words and of the actual works of God through things. The ones who are full of passions, as they remain stuck to the seen surface of the things, likewise they remain stuck to the Scripture’s letter and to the Scripture’s history, both the nature and the letter of the Scripture being to them the wall closing their road towards God – instead of being transparent to, or guiding them towards God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 184)

“The Scripture, as the nature too, they must be considered as a symbol - in the meaning shown before – as environment which is transparent to the infinite depths of the spiritual meanings communicated by God as Person. The one who doesn’t sink himself into these depths, the one who doesn’t have this capacity, and who limits himself to the surface letter, that one cuts off the connection of the Scripture with the deeps of God. If the Scripture comprises the divine cogitations and intentions addressed to us and if these cogitations and intentions are eternally valid, so that the Scripture will have to have an infinite depths and a permanent validity, fitting any time and any person. Understanding the Scripture thus, it means getting out of the letter’s margin and of the temporal moment, which the godlike word was for the first time uttered on, and to understand that by referring to myself, to my generation, to my time, to my future, it means that while reading the Scripture’s letter I hear God Himself speaking to me and to us, today, or about me and us, and about our duties. Understanding the Scripture into “ghost” it means seeing the report from ever between God and us, and living this report in what concerns me, on the present moment, for I am living the present instance.” (Stăniloae 1992: 184)

“Both the Scripture’s words and the God’s deed from within Scripture, as supra-natural Revelation of God, they have a cleared meaning and a more direct character of claiming us than the meanings of the words of God incorporated in things and in the persons’ relations with us. The whole life of Jesus, interpreted by His words, His deed of being Crucified and or Resurrecting Himself for us, they propose us more direct meanings, and more profound, and they ask us to live a life in His image, in order us to reach the resurrection and the union with God as He wants.” (Stăniloae 1992: 184-185)

“Understanding the Scripture’s “ghost” won’t be available except to the ones having within themselves the non-embodies and embodied Word’s Ghost, namely the ones reading the Scripture through this Ghost. This doesn’t mean that the subjective state of the ones who are reading the Scripture could loan the Scripture new meaning which are not objectively comprised by it. Such meanings wouldn’t be any longer the objective meanings of word of God-the Word. This is for the preparation we have described, in a previous chapter, they have made their mind able to receive within it the power of the Ghost of Christ, in order to be able to notice the deeps and the claims from within Scripture. By becoming people living into Ghost, they perceive the Scripture’s ghost (the Scripture’s deep and permanent meanings), for the same Ghost Who worked in inspiring the Scripture and Who is hidden in the Scripture’s text, He set their ghost in working, of the deeps corresponding in the inner man’s life to the deeps of God. Namely, by living according to the objective norms of the spiritual life and out of the objective source of the Ghost, they perceive these norms and this source in the Scripture’s text. The light of the Ghost from within myself it is projected upon Scripture, penetrating thus the text’s wall that covers up the light or the Ghost from within Scripture, or the light from within Scripture it is made known to the ones who have eyes for this light. That’s why the light from within me isn’t a subjective light, but it is still the objective light of the Holy Ghost, a light achieved by us through purification of passions and through the long exercise of cogitating at God, and of praying.” (Stăniloae 1992: 185)

“There are two things guarding this understanding in ghost of the Scripture against becoming subjective: a) The spiritual meanings of the Ghost, or the Ghost of Christ working within Scripture, they correspond to my soul’s dispositions and aspirations (yet not to any of these ones but only to those which I have conformed myself with to the objective model Who is Christ, with the help of the grace of Christ), to the Saints, and by and large to the objective norms of the spiritual life from within Church. Then my dispositions are according to the general model from within Church. I have been shaped according to the ones who have within them the Ghost, having the Same Ghost. b) The often reading of the patristic interpretations, as also the long cogitation at the Scripture's texts in the light of these interpretations, they will accustom me to unveil immediately the analogue meanings from any other text of the Scripture." (Stăniloae 1992: 185)

"The virtuous life, according to the living role models from within Church, and firstly according to the role model of Christ, and the readings from the Holy Fathers sharpen acutely the discernment related to the Scripture's texts, which becomes ever nuanced, ever deeper, and ever more rapid, as we have seen in the case of the discernment referring to the things from nature, to the human persons and their deeds. This preparation being a growing up in the love for Christ, it makes me feel increasingly more Himself Christ speaking through Scripture. In time, the spiritual man achieves a capacity of ensemble understanding the Scripture's meanings, seeing all of them as irradiating out of the Same Christ, Who shows Himself in the interpretation of each text. This protects the reader against getting astray, by forced interpretations. This is for in the Scripture there is the unitary wisdom of Christ, communicated through the Holy Ghost, achieved by the spiritual man too. For our inner being too, as the nature too, likewise the Scripture, but in a clearer degree, more directly, it has deeps leading towards the divine infinite and they make felt the Person of the godlike Word. It lets open an infinite progress in deepening the Scripture and in feeling Christ ever more accentuated. Any concepts, which we would comprise the new meanings we have discovered in, and which we would express the presence of Christ with, they are always exceeded by the evidence of a wider content, or a more felt presence of Christ, though there cannot be any contradiction between what we have achieved, on a certain level of the understanding, and what remains ceaselessly to be deepened. The progress in the spiritual deepening of the Scripture it depends on our progress in that life according to the ghost, it depends on our purification of the passions' egotism and, consequently, it depends on the love for Christ which we have grown up to through virtues, a love developed by effort too, but also by the gifts of the Holy Ghost, gifts coming from Christ, namely by Christ's love coming to us." (Stăniloae 1992: 185-186)

"If spiritually understanding the Scripture means also referring the Scripture to my own life and to the contemporary generation, so that understanding the Scripture will actualize the Scripture, and each character from Scripture will become a type for our own soul, and each moment from Scripture will become a real or possible event of our own soul's life. All of those types are types for what takes place with the people permanently: King Hezekiah in his diverse phases of life, it is the human soul, and therefore it is my soul too in the diverse phases; David is the mind cleaned of passion, mastering upon the peaceful soul as upon a Jerusalem being the peace's stronghold; Saul is the soul having a bodily understanding of the law; the iron gate opening before Apostle Peter, in order him to be able to get out of prison, it is the callous heart of all times, and therefore mine too; Babylon is the soul engulfed in the passions' confusion." (Stăniloae 1992: 186)

"Knowing God through the nature's rationalities, through the rationalities of the human life's unfolding and through the rationalities of our knowledge about God, it represents the affirmative way of knowing Him. But, as we have seen, in the progress of this knowledge it increasingly more appears the conscience that God exceeds what one can expressed about Him in concepts and words, and on the peak of this progress this conscience to become preponderant. So, the affirmative way is united, in the beginning lesser and then increasingly more, with the conscience of the untold character of God, and after a long ascension, the knowledge almost totally crosses in a conscience of the helplessness in catching and expressing God in concepts. That's why, the cogitation uses, alternatively, the affirmative concepts and expressions and the negative ones, and after a long spiritual ascension, it uses almost only the negative ones." (Stăniloae 1992: 188-189)

"The negative concepts and expressions - (of the apophatism, E. l. t.'s n.) - do not express a conscience of the soul that God isn't known by any means. Namely, the theology of the negation isn't only a unilateral act, a simple awareness of the impossibility of knowing God, but in it there is also expressed a "feeling" of the God's infinity, and it is also told about experiencing Him that increases on the measure of the ascension of the spiritual man. This "experiencing" can be describe in positive terms too, but these terms are associated with "correctors" showing that it isn't about a usual meaning of the terms. For instance, this experiencing of God is named as "seeing" God, as "seeing the godlike light", as "feeling" God. But it is always specified that it is a light above any material light, a 'understanding feeling" above any feeling etc. All the Eastern Fathers spoke about such a "understanding feeling", about such a "seeing" God, about such "experiencing" Him." (Stăniloae 1992: 189)

"In order to discern between the simple denial of the God's cognoscibility and "experiencing" God, which is achieved not through the human powers but through the Holy Ghost, we use for the first one the expression of negative theology, while we use for the last one the expression of apophatic theology, though sometimes even by using the negative terms one can express a mysterious "experiencing" of God." (Stăniloae 1992: 189)

"The foundation of the in cognoscibility in the Dionysus's system it is found by Lossky in the fact that, in the Dionysus's conception God doesn't stay in continuity with the world as Plotinus's "One". At Plotinus, the mind must leave everything in order to reach at the "One", because of between them he presented a crumbling of the "One", and not for this One will be transcendent to everybody and non-cognoscible through nature. Actually, one can reach at the "One" after the mind has become "simplified", for the "One" is in continuity with the multiplicity of the things. But one cannot reach at God either after surpassing all the things, because between the things and God there is a discontinuity of nature which cannot be crossed over from mind's side. The discontinuity of nature it is expressed through the uncreated character of God and through the created character of all existing things which also we belong to.

This is the basis of the divine non-cognoscibility, affirmed through the apophatism of the Eastern theology. This apophatic character was defended, as Lossky says, by the great Cappadocian Fathers." (Stăniloae 1992: 190)

"Lossky find the apophatism to the most of the Holy Fathers as religious attitude towards the divine non-cognoscibility. According to Clement the Alexandrine, the conscience itself of the inaccessibility of God couldn't be achieved but only by grace. The theme of Moses coming close to God on Mount Sinai, in the first place used by Philo from Alexandria, it became the preferred figure of speech to the Holy Fathers, in order to express the experience of the divine inaccessibility. Saint Gregory of Nyssa consecrated an entire special treaty on "Life of Moses", in which the ascent on Sinai towards the darkness of the non-cognoscibility, it is reckoned as being the contemplation's way, preferable to the first meeting between Moses and God, when God appeared to Moses in the burning pyre. Moses knows God for he realizes that he cannot know God." (Stăniloae 1992: 190)

"Through apophatism Lossky doesn't understand the negative theology as intellectual operation, for, in order to experience the divine non-cognoscibility requires not only a purification of an intellectual nature, as the Platonic one, but it requires a renunciation to the entire created domain. It means an existential self-overcoming engaging the whole man, and it is a supra-conceptual union with God, a union having diverse degrees." (Stăniloae 1992: 191)

"Lossky is right when saying that the apophatism is present on all the levels of the spiritual ascension. But sometimes he created the impression that he accentuates so much the God's non-cognoscibility than he almost excludes the other side of some knowledge, though he let us understand that he doesn't actually despise the knowing God by experiencing him, but he only disregards the attempts of knowing God conceptually. But, if we can say everywhere something positive regarding God, so that we won't be right speaking about a "total, absolute non-cognoscibility", as Lossky sometimes says. This comes from the fact that, allegedly, he hasn't preoccupied himself with diverse levels of the apophatism." (Stăniloae 1992: 194)

"In reality, the non-cognoscibility it mysteriously intertwines with the knowledge and, to the extent that we ascend towards the divine mystery we are filled up with more knowledge, of course it is about another kind of knowledge, but we are filled up too with the conscience that the divine nature is above any knowledge. Or, in the terms of Saint Gregory Palamas, not because of the absence of the knowledge the experience on the higher levels it is no longer called as knowledge, but due to its supra-abundance." (Stăniloae 1992: 194-195)

"To the Orthodox, after knowing the divine rationalities and energies through the mediation of the nature, there follows the knowing of the unveiled divine energies. Of course, knowing these energies it is accompanied, especially in the second case, by apophatism. In addition to that, knowing the energies wrapped up in nature it is accompanied by the awareness about not knowing the unveiled divine energies, and knowing these unveiled divine energies it is accompanied by the awareness about the absolute non-cognoscibility of the divine Being. Thus, the apophatism is present in the same time with the knowledge, or alternatively, on both levels, but it is more accentuated on the second level." (Stăniloae 1992: 195)

"Between knowing the divine rationalities and energies through nature, a knowledge having something apophatic in it, and seeing them in an unveiled manner, there take place a hiatus. This hiatus represents an apophatism almost unmixed with any positive element of knowledge. This is the intermediary apophatism which we have forsaken any mental operation within - even the denial operations - but we haven't received the light yet. We are highlighting here the fact that the whole time while we are knowing through concepts the energies from within nature, we are accompanied by the awareness about the fact that these concepts are unfitted for the energies manifested through nature and, more than that, the concepts are unfitted to the divine unveiled energies, and the concepts are totally unfitted to the Being of God. In this sense, not only the intellectual negative theology, but also noticing these energies by feeling them, they always accompany or alternate with the affirmative theology." (Stăniloae 1992: 195)

"The intellectual negative theology is the first form of apophatism. But like the affirmative theology doesn't exist without the negative theology, likewise both the negative theology and the affirmative theology do not lack the company of an apophatism of the unexplainably feeling these energies. But by being elevated above what the nature can give us, the awareness about the existence of a hiatus or the awareness about the total insufficiency of the concepts determined from nature, and of our mind's helplessness and of our feeling's helplessness, of knowing the divinity through themselves, we reach ever higher levels, namely the apophatism of the negative theology and of the untold feeling of these energies it becomes almost total. This apophatism is the supreme awareness about our impossibility of knowing God through human spiritual activity. On the moment we forsake any consideration of the concepts formulated out of nature and any preoccupation of even denying these concepts, namely when we are elevated above any feeling of them apophatically, we enter a state of silence produced by prayer. Now we are on the second level of apophatism. It is a much stronger feeling, but it still is a feeling in darkness of the divine energies, a feeling that has surpassed the intellectual negative theology and the apophatic feeling accompanying it." (Stăniloae 1992: 196)

"We reckon that the second level of the apophatism mustn't be identified to the supreme level of the spiritual accession, as it seems that Lossky does. Also, we reckon that neither the Mystical Theology of Dionysus the Areopagite takes this second level in consideration. This is for Saint Gregory Palamas showed, in his polemics with Barlaam, that the Areopagite's texts refer to other darkness too, namely to the supra-luminous darkness which doesn't mean either only a negative theology, nor only to feeling God in darkness, but they are something else than the theology by negation and even than some apophatic feeling Him in darkness. These are darkness not because there is no light in them, but because they are a too big abundance of light." (Stăniloae 1992: 196)

"The negative theology still is a mental operation, the last mental operation, but mixed – as the prayer is too – with the feeling of the helplessness of comprising God. The negative theology stays in connection with the contemplation about God through nature, through history, through the Holy Scripture, through art, through dogmas and, by and large, through everything that is in the middle between us and God, either as an external reality or as system of symbolic concepts and images. For any reality, concept, or symbolic image, on one hand it mirrors God and on the other hand it awakens within us the evidence of the non-explicitly feeling that God is totally different, in comparison to these ones, they challenge us to deny all the positive attributes which, on their basis, we have granted to God. Namely, all the things from the middle, by opening us the perspective towards God, they place us in the same time in the front of the infinite precipice of the divine reality, which we cannot comprise with our mind, and which, in the first place, they do not show us anything of what the created realities, the concept, and the symbolic images show us. But our mind facing this precipice still doesn't renounce looking at things too, at concepts and at symbolic images. But our mind moves its sight from these ones to that one, ascertaining that these ones do not offer the means for characterizing that one. By trying, sort of speak, to measure the abyss by using any measure from the world, namely by using each feature or image, or each concept formed on the basis of the created things, the mind ascertains that no one is fitted to that. And then the mind throws all of them one by one. Therefore, the negative theology is a mental operation for it studies the content of the diverse features and concepts in comparison to the divine abyss, as lived, somehow, by it, with its feeling, and it ascertains that they are insufficient.” (Stăniloae 1992: 202-203)

“In a certain sense, the negative theology still is a rational operation, by being an exact weighing of each concept, whose margins only now appear in all their clearness to the mind. But for this comprising of the defined content of a concept it is done in the same time with the throwing of the sight upon the godlike abyss which the rationality cannot comprise, but which the mind is intuited by a sight or by a feeling of another nature, this operation, though partially mental, it isn’t only rational, it isn’t only deductive, but it has an intuitive element too, of ascertaining what it is borderless and therefore it cannot be defined. It is a rational operation which the mind ascertains with, though, the insufficiency of the rationality. It is an operation which the nature itself becomes aware of its own insufficiency through, and of its helplessness of noticing the infinite and totally different One. The mind doesn’t totally leave with its sight the solid shore of the defined things, but, by being helped by some kind of feeling of it, it moves its sight from them to the godlike abyss, it stays in balance between those two. The negative theology doesn’t renounce at or it doesn’t forget about the positive concepts collected from the created world, as these concepts would be totally useless. This is for the negative theology, even if it ascertains that these concepts do not fit God, though, only in comparison to these concepts it ascertains that God is different. The mind thinks at these concepts, on by one, when denying these concepts to God. That’s why the negative theology it doesn’t make useless an enriching of our spirit with ever higher and increasingly nuanced concepts. This is for by measuring the godhead with these concepts, and by finding the godhead as always not-comprised, the mind is overwhelmed increasingly more by feeling the godhead’s overwhelming greatness. In this sense “knowing God is a dynamic process”, as a Christian thinker said.” (Stăniloae 1992: 203-204)

“The negative theology still needs the positive terms in order to deny them. The higher the positive terms are, the more subtle they are, the more they express not only through themselves something from the richness of the power and of the imagination of God Who has created the realities expresses by these positive terms, but they also occasion through their denial an icon (in negative) of the divine greatness which is above them. The negative theology doesn’t justify a law of the laziness, an abdication from rationality, but it demands a continuous elevation of the rationality’s scaffoldings, in order the limitless of the divine ocean to appear to us, from ever higher levels, in vision that to impress us increasingly deeper. The negative theology, far from pretending us to renounce forever to the rational concepts, it wants us to increase those concepts. The negative theology is the supra-rational point of the tireless straining of the rationality which mustn't end ever its researches upon nature, upon the human life, and upon Scripture. Any progress in knowing the physical, biological, spiritual-human processes from the bosom of the creation, it means a new state on the scaffold which the negative theology – driven by a feeling of the mind – it takes and even deeper and more comprising look at the divine limitlessness, which at its turn makes possible the continuous elevation of this scaffolding. That's why we consider as inappropriate the contempt which some theologians speak about the positive theology with. If the world and the Scripture are the revelations of God, and these ones tell us something positive about him, then, obviously, the positive theology will have its rights. What if we would say nothing positive about God, not even that He exists? Wouldn't have been in such a case endangered the religious life itself? What would have happened, if we hadn't said that God is great and He is full of love? If God hadn't unveiled Himself through creation and through the supra-natural revelation, we wouldn't have known Him at all. But since he has deigned to unveil Himself through these ones, we must use them in order to say something positive about Him. It is right that the positive theology is a theology of the infinite, but far from excluding the infinite, it makes possible the elevation towards the infinite. Only if the positive theology isn't alternated with the negative theology, it becomes “a pragmatic-juridical, exoteric-social science”, which by being infinite and inexhaustible it cannot be circumscribed in rational concepts.” (Stăniloae 1992: 204-205)

“We must say that not only the positive theology continuously needs the negative theology, but also the other way around. The one who makes negative theology he still borrows the terms of the positive theology, and then he continuously denies these terms. Even more, he must have tried and he must continuously try to get closer to godhead with the terms of the positive theology in order to ascertain that these terms do not fit the godhead and, consequently, to deny these terms. In other words, someone cannot do negative theology except by alternating it to the positive theology. The cause for this fact stays in the human spirit as well, but it doesn't stay only in the human spirit, being deeper.” (Stăniloae 1992: 205)

“The two deeper causes due to which the negative theology must be alternated to the positive theology are:

a) On one hand, the last creator principle it has given the existence and it can explain the existence, it cannot be like the worlds itself is; otherwise, it wouldn't be an ultimate and transcendent to the world principle; otherwise, the uncreated being wouldn't differ from the created world. But, on the other hand, this principle and this source must comprise everything that can explain the existence and the content of the world. Therefore, the absolute and transcendent principle cannot comprise any of the qualities which are in the world or in a certain part of the world. It cannot be a part of the world neither can be a foundation of the world, of the same essence with the world, neither the existence itself as we know it, because this existence requires an explanation in something superior that is superior to this existence and different from it. This principle cannot be except the negation of the existence, if we understand through this the imperfect form of the world's existence – the only one we know; this principle is the negation of any category of this existence, shortly speaking: it is the non-existence. But for the absolute principle is the source of the power which has been made everything, which has made possible the existence we know and which explains the nature of all things, it must stay in some connection with the things and with the world; it must have a certain resemblance to the things which creator principle and foundation is to. The existence, with its entire diversity, it must have something in itself that makes the existence possible on the ground of some rationalities and energies, which correspond to the diverse features of the world.

Thus, right in the report of this creator principle with the created world it stays the cause due to which we must speak about the principle in contradictory terms, of positive and of negative theology: this principle is fitted in a certain mode all the world's features, but, in the same time, none of these features fits it adequately, not even the existence. This principle resembles to each thing and it allows to be participated by all things, but in the same time this principle is absolutely "different", totally unlike them. On one hand this principle is inaccessible to understanding, for it totally transcends the understanding; but because, on one hand, something that couldn't be understood in no way it couldn't be the principle of the world, so that it must be somewhat understood, in order to be possible all things to be explained through it.

Both ways of approaching the absolute, the positive one and the negative one, they are equally necessary and legitimate, as they are equally insufficient, for the prime cause being, as Dionysus the Areopagite said, above affirmations and negations. Only both of them together can guide the mind's sight rightly towards Him, but neither both of them together can reach to Him. If God had been only an infinite in report with the world, and not also different from the world, the negative theology wouldn't have been necessary. It would have been enough to stretch through our imagination any world's feature to infinite, through the so-called via eminentiae per analogiam and we would have had a feature of God. But this would have meant that God is in a continuity of nature with the world. So, if there would be a difference between God and the world, this wouldn't be a difference of nature between God and the world. But God isn't only infinite, but he is also absolutely different from the world. Therefore, only via eminentiae or the method of the analogy, it isn't enough in order to correct the insufficiencies of the positive theology. God is absolutely indeterminable, not so much for any determination is a rounding in finite frames and He is infinite, but rather for no known category of the existence doesn't fit Him, since not even the most general category, namely that of existence, it doesn't fit Him. Actually, His existence isn't framed, to say so, in the wider genre of the existence as such. But He is outside and above the existence in general; not even the terms "is" or "exists", which we designate everything that is most general with, what it is common to all things and beings, these terms do not fit Him, for He at His turn does not get us out of the created order. That's why it isn't enough in order to characterize Him only to amplify to infinite the features from within world, not even correcting these features through an analogue attributing, which considers that must be denied even the equivocal idea of analogy, no matter how many possibilities lets in order to keep God in a great difference from the world, though, on the other hand, the things from within world must have a certain analogy in God.

b) Another cause which the negative theology it is necessary for, but in alternance to the positive theology, it is the fact that the being of God is different than His manifestations, or different from what His works can show it like. All the attributes which we call God with, they refer to these manifestations and works, showing their effects in the world's things and features, and not to the divine being. That's why, on one hand, we refer to God countless attributes, and on the other hand, He is the not-called One, the One Who, according to His Being isn't fitted by any name. When we think at God's manifestations, we make positive affirmations about Him; but when we thing at His Being, we deny all affirmations. The attributes we give to God refer to the divine energies descending to us, as Saint Basil said, and not to His Being that remains inaccessible; the attributes refer to the powers launched as some rays from God, creating everything and upholding the diverse aspects of the world. Being it is the name given to the being-maker energy; wisdom, it is called the wisdom-giver energy, as said Dionysus the Areopagite. But above all these there is the divine "hidden", to Whom no name can be given, and Who doesn't enter any relation, and Who doesn't share Himself at all. (...) But this hidden remains above these powers, for He is above being, or above godhead, above life, above any name, and above any impartation. Of course, the attributes - which we have borrowed from the effect the divine energies have within world -, they do not reach adequately not even these energies. That's why denying the attributes it is justified even while thinking at them. But we still attribute them to God by adding them the coefficient of utilization per analogiam." (Stăniloae 1992: 205-208)

"Not only the godlike being is borderless but so it is also the light irradiated by the godlike being, as existential being of Him. That's why this light isn't a definite form and it doesn't stop the longing of the one who sees it for seeing increasingly more of it. This is for the seer has the certitude of not seeing everything, that the divine reality is much more than he sees and, no matter how much he would progress, he won't ever reach to know it wholly. Thus, Palamas spoke about the "ceaseless advancing of the angels and of the saints into the endless age, to ever clearer sights" and he concluded: "so, by seeing, even by my sight I know that that light is above sight; all the more I know God Who shows Himself through that light" (Word III)." (Stăniloae 1992: 296)

"The apophatic theology is an icon of that shapeless sight and of that filling up through vision, which is done into the Holy Ghost in a way above mind. It isn't itself that exceeding. That's why the ones accepting this mystery with faith, they can extoll God through the apophatic theology, but they won't be able to see Him through light and they couldn't unite themselves with Him, if they haven't received after working the commandments also the power of the sight from above nature." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 62)

"As the man tends to exceed his knowledge and to enrich what he can be given by the whole universe and by all the people, we think that the man is destined to reach to a knowledge and to a communication with the infinite Person-absolute, Whom the human being is attracted towards, even in the human being's life in the material body." (Stăniloae 1995: 94)

"The human being cannot reach the full knowledge and the full union with God and with his fellow humans, through his material body, except through a profounder spiritualization of his body, but without annulling his body. Thus, the man is made to comprise, through his body, everything that comes from God, all the way to everything the universe has in its roots deepened into God." (Stăniloae 1995: 94)

"Because the universe is, through its insufficiencies of satisfying the human being's superior needs, but also through the mystery of its existence and greatness, transparent to another plan of life, namely to God, or an environment requiring to be exceeded, or that invites to be transcended, the universe is, in a way, a means of spiritual enriching through a spiritual knowledge." (Stăniloae 1995: 121)

Law

“If the one who norms up his life lives an individualistic existence, an existence related to an impersonal norm whose fulfillment depends on the man himself, the One Who has Christ within him, he has Christ as living norm and as spring out power, and that’s why he can live a life of communion with Christ, out of Christ’s power.” (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

“He didn’t come to break the Law, which is a godlike Law and in the same time it is the Law of our nature (Rom. 2: 14), but to fulfill the Law (Mt. 5: 17), namely to ask the people to go higher, towards the target of their fulfillment as people, a target he stands at. The yoke of these commandments is light, for it corresponds to the most authentic human aspirations, and the one who takes this yoke upon himself he will find the true resting for his soul, for this yoke sets the man free from the tearing apart and the discontents which agitate him (Mt. 11: 29). On this way the grace meets the nature, if we understand by nature the true human nature, open to the dialogue with God and ascending in Him towards its accomplishing.” (Stăniloae 2006: 14)

“Christ fulfilled the law and He got rid of it as painful consequence, by obeying the law, through kenosis, and therefore also by birth in a body submitted to the affects and to corruptibility. This is because He didn’t want to remove what the law essentially wants, namely the fulfillment of the will of God and or the order God has placed in nature, or to artificially and non-organically get rid of the law as painful consequence of this unfulfillment. Christ wanted to get rid of that painful consequence represented by the law, by fulfilling what God wanted by giving the law. Only by this fulfillment of the law one can get rid of the law as painful consequence of not fulfilling the law. Christ, says Leontius of Byzantium, he didn’t try to fulfill a law He wouldn’t have fulfilled before, and which, in such a case, He couldn’t have fulfilled it because of that weakness of the body, which, in such hypothesis, it would have made Him before, to transgress the law.” (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

“Obviously, it isn’t about fulfilling a law in the sense of an external satisfaction brought to God, but it is about fulfilling the will of God and the necessities of the human nature, through a life that brings the human nature back to its true state, by the union with God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

“Of course, Christ has come or He has been sent like His own “Apostle”, like He has made, on Himself, His own “Prophet”, and this is for only He has made, on Himself, man too, by remaining God too, namely for He has humbled on Himself, by taking the human mode of communicating, He had been able to become accessible as God and He could enter this direct dialogue with the people. Like Patriarch Jacob peeled the twigs, likewise Christ has peeled the meanings of the law. He “has peeled the shadow of the law, and He has removed the veil from on the prophets’ writings, and He has shown the rationality from within them as whitened and full of spiritual charm. By doing this, Christ has removed the shadow that has been placed in law upon Him, and He has come out from the indirect plan He was in the Old Testament, and He is now on the plan of the direct dialogue.” (Stăniloae 2006: 51)

“While Moses couldn’t take all the people up on the mountain of the infinite and direct knowledge of God, Christ can do this. On Mount Sinai, said Saint Cyril of Alexandria, the people couldn’t climb. “It was impossible to the people to come close to God while being guided by Moses. It was impossible to come close to God by types and by shadow”, because of these ones being intercalated between people and God. But when God entered the direct dialogue with the people, by removing the intermediary types, the people suddenly found themselves before God. “The law was tending towards the beauty of the truth” ... “And the truth is Christ, by Who we have achieved the entrance and we have reached close to the Father, climbing as on a mountain, to the knowledge of the truth”. “The end of the law and of the prophets is Christ” (Rom. 10: 4). The law was pointing towards the Mystery of Christ, but the unveiled Christ wasn’t in it. “And by mountain one understands in these, the above nature and above all knowledge, of the Mystery of Christ”. “Moses brought the people nigh to the mountain, but he didn’t bring them up on the mountain. As I just have said, the consummation and the height and the wisdom and the knowledge, we gain all of these through Christ, and not from Moses. The last one is a servant and a pedagogue, whilst the First One, as everybody’s Lord Has shown, on Himself, like the giver of the true knowledge”. This knowledge is joined with our changing towards glory. “And nobody remained not to hear and to know the glory of the Savior”. This is for in Him God Himself has entered the direct relation with us - God Who is fire, and Who burnt down our sins.” (Stăniloae 51-52)

“The rationality requires such a law to have a superior and conscious author, who, so, he can escape the law’s power whenever he wants to give the people’s life a meaning, by His coming as eternal man amongst people, for the people to get rid of death, at their turn, through the willing union with Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 209)

“The Law does not allow the man to totally forget about God, about his obligations towards Him, like the civilian laws do not allow him to disregard and annul the reality of others. The Law puts through fear, through force, bridle to the egocentrism, and it maintains a minimum of communion. The laws between people are a complex of reciprocal breaks of the egotisms. They are the more severe and they ask the much less, the more the state of selfishness it is developed.

The laws are good, but they are insufficient. They indicate towards the big law of love, in which they comprise unitary and consummately. But because the love cannot be realized by man without the descent of God, neither the laws can be respected but forcedly, having to be increasingly many, by giving a rising sphere to the egotisms. Only who lives into love, he fulfills all the laws. The Love, the communion, it is the consummation of the Law.

Until there comes the reality towards which the laws indicate, in their exterior and fragmentary manner, the man under their regime he feels his sinfulness, from his conscience and, especially, for accomplishing the target which they indicate towards, the total leaving of the egotism and entering the communion. The laws, through them, they grow up the conscience of the ethical incapacity. Through this the man lives into the tension of the waiting for the divine help. From under the law, the man, in a necessary way, he looks towards a future époque, which to exceed the law. The law claims a surpassing, an abolition by filling up of the scheme and the gesture sketched by them.

As the law is an unconsummated closeness of God, a draft of His will to embody Himself, a foretelling of the Bethlehem, as the Old Testament sacrifices are a foretelling of Golgotha, expressing on one hand the necessity of an expiatory sacrifice for the sin of the man in front of God, and on the other hand, their insufficiency to accomplish what it is sketched in them like intention. Being instituted by the God's command, but insufficient, they manifest the will of God to help to produce at once the true expiatory sacrifice, consequently being signs of the divine covenant, reasons for confidence and waiting. They were the anticipation of the permanent quake, which will have to take over the human generations through the Golgotha's sacrifice. The shed blood of the animals from the Old Testament it symbolized the necessity of the destruction of the creation in the actual form, in order to be remade into a new shape. Spraying with that blood, the defiled ones in order to "sanctify" them (Hebr. 9, 13), it was prefigured the necessity for the people to be imparted with true purifying blood, like a participation with the own being to the destruction of the One Who sacrificed Himself for them and to His resurrection. Through this act from the Old Testament, it was foreseen the communion with Christ Who sacrifices Himself, a communion which, like a repercussion into the intimate spiritual plan, it means staggering repentance, birth giver to a new being and, by this, a victory over the walls of the egotism and entering the direct communion experienced with Jesus Christ, namely Resurrection.

Like the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, it consummates the communion between us and God, initiated through embodiment, likewise the Old Testament's sacrifices were completing the Law on their way, standing on a line with it.

The view of the insufficiency of the law and of the sacrifices, the discontent with them, not by mutiny, but by the moral helplessness which they highlighted and maintained, it was growing up. When I've said that the prophets transmitted the law, I added that also the prophets were showing the insufficiency of the law, prophesying about Messiah, like a positive preparation of people to welcome Jesus Christ. And, as the time was passing, and the laws were multiplied and they showed their insufficiency, the prophets showed they increasingly discontent with the regime of the Law and they were foretelling about the Fulfiller. By this, they unveiled also their insufficiency into the Revelation of God, and to the salvation of the people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The law of the birth of the punishments from the done evil, it is wanted by God, but it is nothing but the expression of the sole possible way of existence of the created beings, which refuse the communion with God for which they were created. If the man was created for communion and it was created like that because God Himself lives into communion, it will be easily understood that the refusal of the communion it causes in the man's being the state of abnormality, of dissatisfaction, of torment. And into communion God doesn't want to keep him forcedly. The communion is accomplished only when each person voluntarily sees the other person and live for that person. God could forcedly impose Himself to the human sight, overwhelmingly. But this had not been a communion, because the man would have felt himself as annulled in report with God. God presents Himself to us in a discrete way, while we are on earth, in order to rather be found by us together with the whole importance of His being. Before arriving to the face-to-face report with God, we must grow up in conditions which not to annul, from the start, the entire our daring. If we do not force ourselves to find God, to take not of His presence, we cannot raise up to the state of communion with Him, and we do not feel either the satisfaction that makes us to spiritually grow up." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The law of the impossibility to escape the sin, other than by satisfying the divine honor, we feel it, thereby, like a concrete law in our intimacy, not like an abstract formula. So, even if the terms of honor and satisfaction, of Anselm's theory, they can be used, there must be specified their meaning into a way adequate to the divine being." (Stăniloae 1993)

Laymen

“Even the Christians who are on the highest levels of the holiness, they sip further their spiritual power from the Holy Mysteries and therefore they stay in respectful dependency on the hierarchy entrusted with the Mysteries’ celebration. The ones who use the power of the grace for cleaning themselves of passions and for achieving the virtues, they achieve diverse charismas, as the lives of the saints and the lives of the spiritualized believers attest it. Thus, the three levels of the laymen (catechumens, believers, monks) are completed with the much more supple variety of the spiritual states of the Church’s members. Today there aren’t catechumens, and the penitents do not constitute anymore a separate category, so that the deacons wouldn’t have a category reserved to them, identical to that of the ones who are being purified. The believers can no longer be reckoned that all of them are exclusively on the level of the illumination neither all the monks are exclusively on the level of the consummation. Many believers still are in the phase of purification and, likewise, many amongst monks still are on the two inferior levels. On the other hand, the purification, the illumination, and the consummation, in the radical and spiritual meaning these states do not make useless the impartation with the Holy Mysteries of the believers who are on those levels.” (Stăniloae 1992: 47)

“The road to salvation of the other Christians who are not monks, it is a longer and less sure road, but this doesn’t exclude that some of them will reach the top of the holiness; or, anyway, even if the Christians from within world do not reach just there, any Christian owes to strive himself towards a certain spiritual progress. And this progress depends on some restraint too. The Christians living within world they of course cannot practice a radical restraint as the monks do, but they can practice a certain temperance which, by growing up, in time it will bring them to monastic restraint. If the toils out of our own initiative lack – our willingly toils –, God compensates this lack by giving us a plus of trouble, hardships, and life’s duties, which we must endure unwillingly. If we receive these with patience, they will be able to purify us of passions, almost like in case of the monks. If the restraint is rather a virtue belonging to the monks, the patience it rather belongs to the laymen, though neither of them must totally forget about the others’ virtue.” (Stăniloae 1992: 118-119)

Life

“The inexhaustible life of the subjectivity cannot consist in a passing from the preoccupation with a thing to the preoccupation with another thing. The eternal life of the subjectivity cannot depend on finite objects, even though these objects are thought by the subjectivity and they are infinite in their number. Such a life, even it had been infinite, it would have made out of finite moments, or it would have been composed out of finite thoughts. If that had been the case, God would have had to think at finite things in order to have life – His life it would have depended on what it is finite, limited, and perishing. Even in the divine life there would have taken place a continuous passing, and that it wouldn’t have been a true eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 180)

“The life of the eternal subjectivity it must be a imperishable plenitude in all regards; it must consists out of a love for another subjectivity and in a consummate union with this subjectivity who has the same plenitude, in order to be, in the same time, inexhaustible life. The life of the eternal subjectivity it is an infinite reference to his subjectivity contemplated in another self, in order to truly be love, and eternal and inexhaustible love; the life of the eternal subjectivity it is a reference to another self, who is also the bearer of his infinite subjectivity and who answers with the same eternal, inexhaustible love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 180)

“But only because this waiting for death, to yourself, it means accepting to live out of God, this death brings the true life. Otherwise, you die unwillingly toward each instant that passes, without you achieving the life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 195)

“We bring arguments in favor of the decisive character of the present life out of the Holy Scripture, from which one can draw a series of conclusion. The Holy Scripture shows that the life on earth is the arena which the human being decides his eternal fate in, and that after his death the human being can no longer change his fate. This is said firstly, by and large, by reckoning our life as “the time” we have. “As long as we have time, let’s do the good to everybody”, it is said in Gal. 6: 10; “I ought to do until it is daylight the things of the One Who has sent Me; for there comes the night and nobody can work any longer (Jn. 9: 4). Then it is specified that the life on earth it has a decisive character, for it is life in the body: “For all of us must present ourselves in front of the judgment chair of Christ, in order each of us according to his deeds which he has done while living into body, to receive either good or bad” (2 Cor. 5: 10). Or: “The one who sows in body, out of body he will reap corruption, and the one who sows in the Ghost, out of the Ghost he will reap eternal life” (Gal. 6: 8 and the followings; Ephes. 6: 8: Rom. 2: 5-6).” (Stăniloae 1997: 166)

“The Son of God, by making Himself man and by coming on our plan, so that our communication with Him to be possible, He has made of our life on earth the direct gate, and open to absolute. The life on earth is no longer a life amongst many others, lost on some stage of an evolution which never reaches the consummation, but it is a life of unique importance, in the process of being filled up with the eternal life of God as Person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 171)

“The man is created as having an aspiration towards the eternal life. The man is prepared during his life on earth towards the eternal life, through his noticing rationality of light, and through the rationalities of the material nature or through their light, noticed by his rationality. With his rationality of light, the man sees the nature’s rationality as also transparent to an Author and Upholder of his and of nature’s, an Author Who has made both the man and the nature towards preparing the man for an eternal life in union with Him. But in this sight the man needs also an uncreated light, coming from the world’s Creator, a light keeping the man in connection with the Creator. Without that Author Who lets Himself to be seen both as the target of the man’s light, and of the nature, the man and his relation with the nature are illuminated only partially; and, so, regarded as the sole reality, the man and the nature are surrounded with darkness. The man and the nature are shown as fully illuminated only through their Author Who is above them.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 6)

“The life in fullness and endless, it cannot come to the created ones except from God Who is infinite in life. So, after the Son’s embodiment, the full and endless life comes from Christ, through His words, deeds, and any self-giving and communication of His. And just because He gives full life to the world, he gives to the life also the light, or vice versa. The true light is life, the true life is luminous light. Where is no life, the light doesn’t come either; or, from where it comes no light it is shown as darkness and as death. This is said by Jesus when He declares that the one who follows Him, he will see the light of the life, as also the one who doesn’t follow Him, he remains in the darkness of the absence of life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 46-47)

“I said that the light of the life is one with the kindness, and therefore with the communication too. This means that the increasing in life is had not only by the one who receives it from another, but it is had also by the one who gives it. This is explained by the fact that he receives the kindness, that one which is one with the life, from God, by receiving the God’s light. Even the impulse of giving out of his kindness, it is an impulse from the good, and infinite in life, God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 47-48)

“If I hadn’t had within world other conscious people together with me, if I couldn’t live in order to help others, in order I to rejoice of others and of myself, or, helped by others, I to understand something from the world or I to be loved, consciously, by others, I couldn’t have had a full life, or a light making me understand the life’s meaning, because of not being there anyone to show me that I can prepare myself for an eternal life in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 49)

“The earthly life is only a preparation for that eternal order. Our being is an existence accommodated to that order and to the possibility of continuous spiritual consummation, not-subservient to the nature and to the repetition. That order is not produced by the repeating nature, but it rather is organized the entire cosmos for serving the man, so that the man to work regarding his supra-terrestrial purpose.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 17)

“We believe that for our being, the meanings of the existence cannot find their fulfillment in an immanent spiritual life; this is because its relative variety it moves, actually, in a monotonous frame, and it ends with the body’s death, as natural repetition phenomenon. The meaning of the existence cannot be crowned except in the unlimited and eternal light of a transcendent life, free of any repetition’s monotony, and of any relativity. Only on that plan our life can develop infinitely, in an endless novelty, which is in the same time a continuous plenitude.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 17)

“Through time we are hurrying up towards more satisfactorily answering the appeal of God, and the offer of His love, and God Himself draws us towards this, he attracts us within Him, as in the true existence. This is for the answer we have already given, it no longer keeps us in existence, for God launches towards us in within us a more advanced offer, and therefore a more advanced energy, corresponding to what follows to the state we have reached to. That’s why we must make ourselves dead to the present moment, in order to work in the present for the future, in order to find out in the future our true existence. We must leave what exists now, for something that doesn’t exist yet, because what exists now it is about to become dead.” (Stăniloae 2003: 194)

Logos

“Knowing the Logos, it means participating to His rationality-giver and upholding work.” (Stăniloae 2003: 136-137)

“The union of the people with the world and with God, it was fully accomplished firstly in Christ, as the divine Logos Who restored the human rationality in a totally dispassionate work. The Son of God has made Himself a man, for the man is the unifier ring of the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 216)

“The Logos or the Word of God is in the worlds ever since the beginning, on one hand in the rationalities, which are images created and sustained by His eternal rationalities, and on the other hand, through the human persons who in their living rationality are the images of the His hypostasis Himself, created on the purpose of thinking up the rationalities of the things together with the divine Rationality as Person and in a dialogue with Him.” (Stăniloae 2006, 5)

“The divine rationalities aren’t only meanings of the infinitely deep richness of the godlike Logos, but also rays of divine life and of power, irradiating from the ocean of life and of power hypostatized in the Son and the Word of God, as also in the Father and in the Holy Ghost. The things created as rational images of these rays which irradiates within them, they are too, because of that, unities of power and life. Their last substrate is the energy that has within a meaning or a complexity of meanings, and it includes the tendencies of some indefinite interference producing so many unities connected to each other. The things are the images of the divine materialized, full of power images and carried on by the tendency of countless references amongst them. In their materialized state, in their unity from the divine Logos.” (Stăniloae 2006, 5)

“The harmonious totality of the rationalities, which the people’s rationality tend to comprise it, by communicating amongst themselves, to the extent of the efforts they people make reciprocally helping one another, it imposed they conclusion of their cause in an eternal conscious Rationality, above all the conscious rationalities and above all the unconscious things which reciprocally limit one another and make whole to one another. He is the Logos Who has all the rationalities (logoi) of the world, from eternity, and through Himself. To this conclusion the man doesn’t reach through a certain effort, but through a judgment which searches for the light, and for the existence’s meaning.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 33-34)

Love

“To Christendom, God is a trinity of Persons Who have everything in common, namely the entire being, without being confounded amongst Them as Persons. This implies a Perfect love. This is because the love requires a full unity and a reciprocal affirmation of the persons who love each other.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“In this supreme unity and love - which affirms the eternity of the divine Persons - it is given the basis for in its work directed outwards to be felt the love from inside the Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“The force of the consummate love, involved in the unity of being of the Holy Trinity, it is manifested not only in shaping a world which is one and diverse and in shaping a humanity with a common nature accomplished in multiple persons, but also in a will of communion with the creation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“The Trinity reflects, in the salvation plan, something from Trinity’s inward love, without reaching through this the unification in being, with the creation and with the mankind, a fact that would diminish the value of the Trinitarian Persons and the love amongst Them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82-83)

“The union between the two natures (in Christ, o. n.) it has the character of a maximum love, in the condition the two natures remain unmerged, by the fact they are united in a hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2003: 83)

“The love between persons it realizes the maximum union between them, but it also produces the rejoicing of one for another, and the difference between one another.” (Stăniloae 2003: 96)

“The theologian must participate to this prayer and to the Church’s life, for the theology wants to know God by experiencing His savior work upon people. But the theology won’t know this work if it doesn’t enter a personal report of love with God and with the believers, through prayer.” (Stăniloae 2003: 103)

“(…) he is a theologian, that one who prays with the other members of the Church. This is for in their common love for God, it is even more unveiled the savior and consummator work of His love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 103-104)

“God being a Person, between Him and us it is established a report of love, a report that maintains Him and us as persons. We experience this love not as an always identical infinity, but as infinity with the perspective of a continuous novelty, as an ocean of always new richness. We will advance always in this love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 125)

“The more we know God the more we want to know Him even more, the more we love God the more we are stimulated to even more love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 125)

“God is the source of the power and of the light, attracting us constantly higher in knowledge, in the consummation of the life. He isn’t a limit which to stop our ascent. He is the Supreme, but he is the endless and inexhaustible Supreme in the attraction he exercises upon us, in His gives He pours upon us. Actually, this isn’t possible except he is Person, and our relation with Him becomes a relation of love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 131)

“More painfully it imposes to us the sufferance of the righteous. Job is tormented not only by pain, but also by not understanding its causes. Through Job’s example, God shows that the love for Him it must cross through the fire trial of the sufferance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 148-149)

“A divine self he loves with an eternally inexhaustible love, what it is characteristic to him, or his plenitude, as it would be that of another self, and this in reciprocity. This is the godlike life. This life is in accordance to the inalterable plenitude. It is the same infinite existence of the love, the love of an infinite person directed towards a person who is worthy of an infinite love, and vice versa, but within the same subjectivity. Otherwise, the infinity would have been an unbearable boredom, if it had been the appanage of a singular conscience, or it would have been nonsense, if it had been the appanage of a substance or of a law aiming towards nothing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 181)

“God, by being eternal interpersonal communion, he can enter love relationships with the temporal beings.”

“The Holy Fathers highlight the fact that, the one who has become wholly of God, he participates to the eternity of God, for in this case God too has become wholly his. But this means a total love between man and God. But one reaches this state through effort and in time. But the love starts from God as an offer and He makes this offer continuously. The man’s love it is only an answer to this offer, and the man’s love couldn’t have taken place if this offer hadn’t been there; this offer is in the same time a power the man is given in order to answer God. This means that the eternity of God it keeps the creature’s time tied to itself, or the creature’s time is continuously tied to the eternity of God. Moreover, the eternity of God is present within man’s time through the offer of His love, an offer that provokes and helps the man to answer.” (Stăniloae 2003: 186)

“Love is the self-offering of a self, to another self, and the waiting for that one’s offer, as answer to the first one’s offer. Only in the immediate and full answer of the one whom the love is offered, it is removed any waiting, any temporal interval, by being accomplished the immediate union. God offered us His love since our creation. But our answer to the Self-giving of God it isn't a self-giving of ours which cannot be fuller, namely to remove the waiting and the hope of a fuller giving. We are limited creatures, but in the same time we are capable of exceeding ourselves and we tend to surpass ourselves. This fact introduces the time, namely the past with our discontent because of what we have done and because of the degree we have self-given us in, and the future with its tendency to be more and to self-give ourselves more." (Stăniloae 2003: 188-189)

"In God, the duration of the waiting is reduced to zero, for the love amongst the godlike Persons it is simultaneous in the whole its perfection. Not being there any room for growing up further and not existing there the possibility of falling off this simultaneity and consummation, the godlike love persists, as offer and answer, in an eternal bilateral (or trilateral) act." (Stăniloae 2003: 190)

"The partners God created, of the love amongst themselves and with Him, because they couldn't be like Him, by nature and by themselves, bearers of His infinite subjectivity on all its aspects – therefore also of love –, they must reach by will, to the perfect relationship in love, and therefore to eternity. They cannot reach the eternity except through the unlimited answer to the unlimited Self-offer of the eternal god, for only by doing so they open themselves to the eternity of God, or they are able, by doing so, to participate to that eternity." (Stăniloae 2003: 190)

"The divine Persons do not receive the eternity from outside Them, because They do not receive the plenitude of the life from outside Them by answering the love of a superior being. The being created with a limited existence, they must answer the love of God in order to open themselves to Him, and they cannot do that except gradually. This means growth and effort. Therefore, their answer couldn't be from the beginning a self-giving and, consequently, a love equivalent to the divine offer, and therefore having a simultaneous promptitude and a consummate plenitude. To this, God offers them, at his turn, gradually and on the measure of their growth and depending on their capacity of answer, His love. Thus, their full answer will take place when God will fully offer Himself to them, after the created beings would have been grown up in this direction." (Stăniloae 2003: 190)

"This is a kenosis voluntarily accepted by God, for creation, a descent (katabasis) in report with the world, a kenosis that is lived simultaneously to the eternity of His Trinitarian life. God lives both of these by the fact that he makes felt the offer of His eternal love even in our temporal moment. But that means that in our necessity to answer, we live too, not only our temporality but also the eternity wherefrom this offer comes, even though we only partially answer it, or even though we refuse to answer it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 191)

“God participates somehow to the man’s sufferance. We use to say that God will suffer if the man doesn’t answer His love. But God suffers not because He would need Himself our love, but he suffers for all the sufferings appearing within us because of our refusal to answer His love, and to our reciprocal request for a complete and unfaltering love. God gives us His benefactions in the shape of His love and of the love amongst ourselves. Whether we refuse this love, or its plenitude, through our complete and unwavering refusal, we refuse the benefactions from God. We refuse Him. The sufferance of God for us it comes out of the sufferance we sink ourselves in by doing that. This sufferance comes out of the fact that he cannot make us share His benefactions due to our refusal to accept His love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 199)

“The interval between the offer of love from God and our answer to it, it takes time also because the necessity of a spiritual growing up of ours, through our free effort. The people get mature gradually. We cannot continuously give the most adequate answers to the requests addressed to us, before a certain time to pass. Here one can see the importance of the lessons of the past generations, the importance of the human dialogues, of the experiences they are based on, of each person’s thought. God directs His demands towards the people and He communicates the gifts of His love to the people, depending on their spiritual level.” (Stăniloae 2003: 199)

“The not-changeability of God, to which He makes partakers the one who increase in love, it is a not-changeability in the fullness of the love life, above which there cannot be anything else.” (Stăniloae 2003: 201)

“While God offered the conscious creatures, before Christ, His love through things and through the uncreated divine energies, into Christ God gives Himself to them as Hypostasis. In Christ it is accessible for a full communion, the godlike Hypostasis Himself, to us on our human level. The divine Hypostasis surpasses in Himself the interval between Godhead and the mankind, and between Him as God and us. But this state is accomplished for us only in a first fruit and virtually.” (Stăniloae 2003: 202)

“Being ontologically above the space on a certain degree, we need to surpass it by will and by grace. If the time is duration between the appeal of God to love and the human answer, the space is the distance this duration is tied to. The interval between the appeal to love and the perfect answer of the people to this appeal, it is constituted out of duration and distance. Both of them represent a distance between world and God, but in the same time both of them are given by God as a distance that has must be surpassed. Both of them are given as distance between human persons, as an interval between the one's appeal of love and the answer of another, but as an interval that must be surpassed. The time interval is called duration and the interval of space is called distance in a strict sense. But both of them are distance or interval in a broad sense." (Stăniloae 2003: 208)

"The time as duration will come to an end, but the space won't cease existing but it will be overwhelmed. The one who will answer immediately and fully the appeal of love from God, and from his fellow humans, he will be everywhere with them, without his variety to cease somewhere. God will be transparent and felt through His energy, through all the things. But also, each man will be present to each one, through his energy, penetrated by the divine energy, through all the things." (Stăniloae 2003: 209)

"In Christ, the Son of God makes Himself the bearer of the perfect Trinitarian love towards the people, and of the human love elevated to the quality of perfect answer to this love. And in the state of Resurrection, Christ unimpeded extends this consummate divine-human dialogue of love, accomplished in Himself, by also attracting us in it. In Christ the man has received the power to love God in a unique love with the Son of God the Only Begotten One, and to love the people with the love of God. And in His state of Resurrection, this power is being communicated to us, following to be fully impropriated by us in our state of resurrection." (Stăniloae 2003: 234)

"The transparency which is an effect of the overwhelming of the matter by the spirit, and that is therefore, at the peak, equivalent to resurrection, it isn't a physical moment and with a spectacular character, but an existential communication and irradiation of the love, of the interest in other people, and a participation to their pains and to the shortcomings of their life. It is the vibrating sympathy in the highest degree. It is serenity and unveiling of the great own love for them – that makes the other bearing their pains more easily. In this sensitiveness of the participation, the saint lives his humanity on the highest degree. But this humanity of the saint it is lived also by the one who enjoys the participation of the saint to his problems and pains. In this is revealed also the character of personalism of the holiness." (Stăniloae 2003: 274)

"The godlike love is the movement of God towards creatures, towards the union with them. But in order to be there a movement towards somebody, there must be such an eternal movement in God. If, generally, the eros means the movement, full of longing, between two parts, there won't be eros where only one part is person and the other one is a passive object of longing and love." (Stăniloae 2003: 288)

“In God there is a community of Persons amongst Who the love is manifested. The love in God would imply at its turn a movement from a Person towards Another. But for in God there isn’t a movement for surpassing a degree of love towards a more intense degree, and therefore towards surpassing a distance remaining amongst the divine Persons, or towards a fuller union amongst Them, the movement of the love of God is paradoxically united with the lack of movement.” (Stăniloae 2003: 288)

“On one hand, God puts His power in movement in relation with the creatures, and on the other hand, He instills them, through this movement of His love for them, their love for Him, after he has given them this capacity through creation, and He has restored this capacity by the grace of Christ. God, by bringing us to existence and by endowing us with so many gifts, amongst which there is also the gift of the knowledge, it appears to the creatures a worthy to be loved, and this is another form through which He sets the creatures in the movement of love towards Him. Although, this movement being weakened by sin, there were needed new going outs of God to the creatures, in order to restore their movement towards Him. Actually, it is difficult to discern between the creation of the love within them, by the fact that He appears to them as worthy to be loved through the gifts He gives them through the act of the creation, between the work of the Providence and the restoring of their powers, and between His new and permanent going out to them into Christ. All these three kinds of going outs are manifestations of His love for creatures but, in the same time, they are actions through which he makes Himself worthy to be loved by creatures, and therefore they are actions which lead their love towards Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 290)

“Out of the love of God for the creatures it springs out the creatures’ love for God, and therefore the creatures’ love for Him it cannot be separated from His love for creatures. That’s why the Holy Fathers do not make a separation between the two kinds of love. The creatures’ love for God it is the gift of God, a gift produced by the love of God for the creatures which turns back towards God with the fruit of the creatures’ love. The love with which the creatures move themselves towards Him, it is the love through which God moves the creatures towards Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 290-291)

“Two persons who love each other, they no longer know what has each one of them in this love from oneself, and what is from the other person. If the second person doesn’t love the first person, the first person won’t have, at its turn, power to love the second person; and if the second person doesn’t love the first person, that one won’t have power to love the second person. Each one makes the other person able to love through the own love, and in the same time through an attraction exercised upon that person. But the attraction itself that is exercised upon that person it comes out of this person's love for that person." (Stăniloae 2003: 291)

"In the earthly life we are on our way towards the perfect love of God and for the fellow humans. We will reach the perfect love with God and with the fellow humans in the future life, if we strive to do that in the present life." (Stăniloae 2003: 292)

"The love supposes two kinds of selves, who love one another, or a self who loves and a self who receives that love, or about whom the one who loves knows that that one is aware of his love. And this must be in reciprocity. But in the same time the love unites the two selves, proportionally to the love between them, but without confounding them because that would put an end to the love. Therefore, the perfect love paradoxically unites these two things: several selves who love one another, still remaining unmerged, and a maximum unity between them." (Stăniloae 2003: 293)

"Without the existence of a perfect and eternal love, it cannot be explained the love within world and it cannot be seen either the purpose of the world. The love from within the world it supposes the eternal and perfect love amongst several divine Persons. This love doesn't produce the divine Persons, as the catholic theology affirms, but is presupposes Them. Otherwise, there could be conceived an impersonal love also producing and tearing apart the human persons. The divine Persons maintain Themselves consummate from eternity, for Their love is the perfect love, a love that cannot increase the communion amongst Them. Otherwise, it would everything has started from the supreme separation, from the lack of love. The love supposes a common being in three Persons, as the Christian teaching says." (Stăniloae 2003: 293)

"The reciprocal love amongst people implies also several persons capable of love, on the basis of a being of their, that is in some measure common to them. But this imperfect love amongst us, it supposes the perfect love amongst the divine Persons with a common being. Our love is explained out of our creation in the image of the Holy Trinity, the origin of our love." (Stăniloae 2003: 293-294)

"The evil is no longer evil when another person communicates with you and you communicate with him. It is a good to be with another 'for better and for worse. The evil is overwhelmed in communion, for this is a fulfillment of being. And the good is no longer good when you impose it to another person, but you do not love that person, and you keep yourself at a distance from the communion with that person. The other one actually needs your love, and you need his love. By this you give him everything, and he gives you everything. In the other's need of your love, you ascertain that you really exist, and in your need of his love you ascertain that he exists in a way that is superior to the objects; you ascertain that he accomplishes you, and by this you experience the good. But through these you ascertain that you exist by strengthening the other, and he exists by strengthening you in existence. And the love means remaining into communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 501)

“According to the Christian teaching, if I orient myself only according to my rationality in deciding what is good to the other and what is good to me, I proudly and egotistically make use of my rationality and I get out from the truth and from the good. In such a case, I do not strengthen my existence out of the communion with another. Such a decision cannot bring me ever a good for me and for another; it cannot increase my existence out of another and his existence from of mine. Only the love or the communion in freedom is the source of the good; only the love strengthens the existence of the two ones in common; or, only the decision from and for love – or made in common out of love and for the reciprocal love – it serves to the true good, and not the singular decision according to a norm established individually.” (Stăniloae 2003: 502)

“According to the Christian doctrine, only the one who serves is saved (Mt. 20: 26-28). If I want to serve through rationality, my good and the good of another, I won’t be able by any means to do that only by my rationality, but I must consult also his rationality, for each one starts from concrete circumstances and needs, and, anyhow, the final good is clarified in dialogue with that one. I must not submit the good to the individualistic rationality but, on the opposite, I must submit the individualistic rationality to the good, or to the superior rationality of the communion from love; I must submit the rationality to the live.” (Stăniloae 2003: 502)

“The me-you love it is the love between subjects. But the love doesn’t stay exclusively in the power of the two subjects, for in this case the love between them it could be permanent and consummate through itself. Or it is sustained and relit in its moments of weakening, of interruption, by the responsibility towards the supreme Subject. He gives power to the love and he leads towards consummation the love amongst the human persons. He deepens in front of us the value and the mystery of the other person, and by doing this he strengthens our love for that person and vice versa. In this is made obvious to me the love of the supreme Person for the person of my fellow human, and to the person of my fellow human it is made obvious the love of the supreme Person for me.” (Stăniloae 2003: 518)

“The supreme Person, or God, by the absolute price he granted the human persons, out of His love, as Creator and Savior of theirs, He leads the love amongst them towards the ever more uninterrupted and ever higher states.” (Stăniloae 2003: 518)

“We experience God through our fellow humans, in the love we have for them, or we verify our experiencing of Him in the fully responsible love for them, but not by identifying God to them, and not by identifying God to our love for one another, but we experience Him as source of supreme personal love, a love that gives us the power to ascend to an ever-higher love for one another. This makes possible both my prayer towards God and our common prayer towards Him. If God had been identical to the love between us, the prayer would have been meaningless. Maybe that’s why some groups of Protestant students in theology refuse the prayer in their church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 518-519)

“The first element of this “transcendental Christology” of the Logos it was seen by Rahner in the man’s need for absolute love. This absolute love answers the commandment of Christ to see, in the neighbor, Himself (Mt. 25). According to this commandment, “an absolute love, radically and without any reserve directed towards a man, it implicitly affirms Christ, through faith and through love. And this is true, for the simple man, finite and lacking firmness, he cannot fully justify only through himself and for himself, the absolute love he is offered, in which a person engages himself and has the courage to totally offer himself to another; for himself, the other one could be loved only with reserve, with a love the one who loves reserves himself to himself, or he has the courage to give himself maybe to a reality empty of meaning... But the love wants a unity of the love for God and for the neighbor, within which, the love for the neighbor is, in the same time, also love for God, and only by this is the love absolute. Through this, the love searches for God-the Man, namely That One Who can be loved as man with the absolute of the love of God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 8)

“Actually, the suffering of the human weaknesses, not-foreshadowed by sin, and the endowing of the human nature with godlike power in order to overcome the human weaknesses, both they are the manifestation of the same godlike love descended on the level of the human nature. Love is power, the most authentic power. The more the One Who has the love lowers Himself without changing Himself, the more the love manifests its power. This is for the true and authentic love isn’t altered by lowering itself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 32)

“This appearance of lowering the power through love, it hides the presence of His power to a worldly inferior judgment - this one reckons that there is a contradiction between power, as worldly understood, and humbleness. But the spiritual people feel, in the not-foreshadowed humbleness, the true love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 32)

“By the fact that Christ has made, on Himself, man, there hasn’t been introduced any diminution in the equality and in the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. Although He is also a man, Jesus Christ keeps His position from ever within the Holy Trinity. Although he has become man, Christ remains in the unity of being, from ever, with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, and he has in this quality too, the glory He has been having even before the world has been made (Jn. 17: 5). It is a glory that reverberates upon all the people who are united with Christ (II Thess. 3: 14). He is the Pantocrator in human body. In His luminous human eyes “like the fire’s flame” (Apoc. 19: 12), it shines the infinity of the Father and of the Holy Ghost. And through His eyes too, it is shown us His endless godlike Love. We are “called to achieve the glory of our Lord” (II Thess. 2: 14). By recognizing that Christ receives as man too, a glory equal to the glory of God, we confess our faith that we too, will be imparted, by Him, with that glory. He is the bridge between the Father, with Whom He is of-the-same-being according to Godhead, we also, with whom He is of-the-same-being according to the quality of human being. All the gifts from God, we have them forever and ever through Christ and in Christ. In Christ there are hidden all the treasures reserved to us in eternity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 45-46)

“Christ remains after embodiment too, a Hypostasis of the Three Hypostases of the Holy Trinity, in community of being, with Them, though He enter the community of being, with us too, like man. Neither has been His Hypostasis altered, not His godlike nature, by embodiment. That’s why, though this Hypostasis has assumed the human nature, He is worshipped, as Hypostasis, together with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. By the fact that the same Person of Christ is in community of godlike nature with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, but He is also in community of human nature with us, he actualizes the community of being with us in the same culminant love which is accomplished in the unity godlike being, with God-the Father and with the Holy Ghost. By being, ontologically, equally united with us, according to the human nature, like He is with the Father and with the Ghost according to the godlike nature, He is, in what concerns the love too, equally united with us like He is with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, though he has, towards the Father, the love as man obeying the Father, and towards us, he has also the love as work of elevating our nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 46)

“It is to be noticed the tight correlation between the sanctifying work of God and the priestly work through which it is obtained the sanctifying work of God. It is the correlation between the self-giving of the being and the sanctification obtained from God. Actually, the quality as priest, of the man, it isn’t but the last conclusion of the man’s quality as responsible being. Like through the quality of responsible being the man answers God Who offers the man His love, likewise through his quality as priest, the man gives himself to God by answering the same calling of His Who wants, by His own giving, to fill the man with His gifts. But if the love sanctifies the one who gives on himself, the self-giving itself, of the man, it fulfills a condition of the man's sanctification, or it is a premise of the man's sanctification." (Stăniloae 2006: 57)

"Only in the state of good fragrance of this sacrifice we are well pleasant to God, namely only by renouncing to ourselves we can accomplish the relation of endless love with God Who is endless in love." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

"In the state of sacrifice, we are being cleaned of sins, being imparted with Christ's sacrifice, namely we go out of passions' slavery, which narrows us, and we gain the liberty in the relation of the endless love with God Whom we surrender ourselves to, being imparted with the analogue surrender of Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 92-93)

"For He loves us, Christ doesn't want to stay alone, as sacrifice, before the Father, He doesn't want to obtain, as man, the Father's love only for Himself, but also for His brothers into humanity. "Christ remains forever in the Father's sight. This is for when the First-Born has made, on Himself, like us, then He has entered (as man) the Holy of the Holies (in the intimacy of the Father (through the great and consummate tent, namely in heavens, to show, on Himself, as it has been written, in front of God, for us (Hebr. 9: 24)". (...) In Christ we have entered and we are entering the infinity of the life and of the love of the God, which spring out of the Father, for this infinity of life and of love, by filling up the humanity of Christ through sacrifice and Resurrection, it has been made accessible to us too, through the sacrifice that bring us to resurrection." (Stăniloae 2006: 93-94)

"We must not die of bloody death, as Christ did. This is because not within us is defeated, as in the mankind's first fruit, the death. But in our deeds of continuous renunciation to sins and of advancing in virtues, as getting out of the egotism's limitation and as openings towards the infinite God, and towards the relation with our fellow humans within Him, He continuously activates our will of no longer living to ourselves – namely the life that leads us towards death – but to live to the immortal God and to our fellow humans, in God. In this active intention it is virtually comprised even the capacity of our physical death for God, and for helping our fellow humans, in order to get ourselves out of the narrowness of the own egotism that leads us towards death, and in order to enter the infinite life and love of God." (Stăniloae 2006: 94)

"Our sacrifice, by being continuous renunciation to sins, as forms of the egotism, it takes the shape of the virtues and of the continuous advancing in virtues, it takes the shape of loving openness towards God and towards our fellow humans, given the fact that all the virtues are animated by love towards God and towards our fellow humans and the virtues end in a culminant and endless love. As such, our sacrifice or our virtues have a dynamic and uninterrupted character.” (Stăniloae 2006: 94)

“To the one who feels himself under the flux of power and love of the embodied Word, under His endless wave of live and of light, it is impossible to him not to feel Christ as the source of the same life and power of all the ones who open themselves, through faith and through will, to Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 107-108)

“In Christ the endless love of God meets the humanity’s love, which opens to His love, by integrally surrendering itself to God. And Christ is the One Who conveys His endless godlike love as God, but He offer His love as man too, to God, by entirely surrendering Himself to God, on our behalf, as our Hierarchy, for, as being filled up also as man with the godlike love He has consummately opened himself to, to convey this love to us too, and by this to sanctify us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

“The Christ’s state of sacrifice it is a state of love towards the Father and towards us, once only the love for another person determines a person to renounce to himself. This is the good fragrance of Christ’s sacrifice before the Father. Christ has reestablished thus our relation with the Father.” (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

“The holiness as state of sacrifice before the Father, it is a state of love, out of the Father’s love. And for the love of God is endless and eternal and it gives our love these qualities too, God, by making us saints into Christ, He gives us the eternal life. By making us saint, God makes our persons eternal, namely He highlights our persons’ imperishable value. Of this state of holiness from Christ, and therefore of love between us and God, we are imparted within Church and this love is the force keeping the Church or its members in unity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 114)

“If the grace is a manifestation of the love of God as Person, it is natural to Him trying to awaken through His love our free love. A loving person, even when he is stronger – as in this case –, he can limit the manifestation of his power in order to give the dialogue partner the possibility of freely manifesting himself, for he wants his love. Such a loving person works not through power, but through love which is at its turn also a power of love to the one who freely accepts it. A person who comes with love close to another person, he awakens the love of the other person as free manifestation. The report of love is an agreement between two liberties. It is true that the grace, as manifestation of the love of God, it precedes; but this is not in order to pull us forcedly to love, but it is in order to solicit us our love and to give us the power of feeling the love of God and to manifest ours, but still letting us free to negatively or positively answering.” (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

“Christ has done everything in order to enter the dialogue of love with us. He dwells in the altar of our being, bringing Himself sacrifice for us – as Hierarch – to the heavenly Father, in order to strengthen us too, in an unknown way, in order to add the sacrifice of our being next to His sacrifice, in order to renounce us to ourselves too, to enter the dialogue with the Father through Christ, as Christ has entered by the sacrifice of His being, as man, in this dialogue with the Father and with us. To Christ’s humbleness must be answered by our humbleness, in order to accomplish the mystery of encountering Him in love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

“Christ as Hierarch He is a Mediator, but not like in a place stranger to us, but between the abyss of our heart and the godlike abyss, being in both of them and being a bridge between them, for He has both of them within Him. Being such a Hierarch, Christ wants to open the abyss of our heart to the abyss of God: Christ wants to awaken the endless thirst for love, of our heart, in order our heart to drink out of the endless spring of the godlike love. And Christ can do this by being with the abyss of His human heart open to the godlike abyss in our heart’s abyss.” (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

“From Christ Who dwells within us since Baptism, it comes to us the power of opening ourselves to God. From the Hierarch Who sacrifices Himself there, in the fire of love for God and for us, it comes to us the power to add, with a warmth out of His warmth, our sacrifice to His sacrifice, our renunciation to ourselves, for this sacrifice of ours to be taken by Him together with us and consumed by the fire of the same love for God. Form here we see that, though the power of the work comes to us from Christ, we must work too, our work being warmed up and strengthened by His work. “Therefore, oh, you man who have been baptized into Christ, you give just the work for which you have taken the power and prepare yourself for receiving the showing of the One Who dwells within you. And thus the Lord will show Himself to you too, according to the promise, in a spiritual manner, as Himself says: “And the Lord is the Ghost; and where the Ghost of the Lord is, there is the freedom” (II Cor. 3: 17). Then you will understand what was said: “The Kingdom of Heavens is inside you” (Lk. 17: 21). Namely, encountering God in love it takes place inside us, in the hot synergy of the love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

“This framing of mine, as subject, in the subject of Christ, being the alter of the supreme love, it is in the same time the act of the fullest opening of the heart – of my intimacy -, through which I elevate my life, when I gather myself from the self-forgetfulness, from scattering. The heart is meant to be open towards God as Person, and towards people, like a window is made to be opened towards the seen things. This openness of the heart for me and for Christ, it has started at Baptism, by banishing away the attachment to the egotism's sin, in which I believed my own self was being affirmed. By being my dialogical subject framed into Christ, my heart opens in the Christ's human heart, opened to the maximum of the infinity of God." (Stăniloae 2006: 148-149)

"The death has the meaning of the full love for Christ. But the love is the virtue that crowns all the virtues and it comprises all the virtues. And the virtues aren't but the habits which our human nature has achieved, by steadfastly fulfilling the commandments, with the help of Christ's power, or with the help of the Ghost dwelling within our heart since Baptism. The commandments aren't but the invitation to the full opening of our heart to Christ, and to our fellow humans, done by us too, with the power of Christ Who offers Himself to us, through the commandments, with His power, but also with the appeal to our efforts in order to put us in accord with Him in love. The fiery love for God, which crowns all the virtues, it is a fruit of the Christ's Ghost Who dwells within our heart, but it is an answer of the man as well; it is a full encountering with Christ Who is full of the godlike infinity, within our heart; it is a full revelation of the Christ Who is within our heart." (Stăniloae 2006: 149)

"The man's man opens to God through a love which isn't only the top of the virtues, but it is also the top of the knowledge of God, being the appanage of a mind that has been cleaned, of passions. Besides, the virtues by cleaning up the body and the soul of passions, and by filling them up with the love for God, they clean the mind as well of the passionate cogitation - which distorts the things and the persons and locks them up in a narrow horizon, by elevating the cogitation through a wide and luminous horizon to the knowledge about God."

"The love is the greatest force. But the love is strong only when is upheld by Christ's Person Who is infinite in power and in love – and this love is one with the true faith. This love will last even after the faith will come to an end, namely when Christ will show us Himself in revealed manner." (Stăniloae 2006: 152)

"The new life received through Baptism it is manifested as power of maintaining and of increasing in cleanness and in good deeds, which are developed in the virtues culminated in love. The love isn't a simple sentiment of euphoria, but it is as well steadfastness in thought and deeds of kindness, namely it is a true general priesthood of giving the life to God." (Stăniloae 1997: 44)

“The Eucharist is the completion of the salvation’s oikonomia, of the oikonomia of love of God for people and of His union with us. If the Son of God wanted to come so close to the people than to unite Himself with them, as sole mode of their salvation and deification, He won’t be content only with His embodiment as man with the intention of remaining separated from the others, but in order to go forwards, so to say, by embodying Himself in all the people, but without impeding them to remain distinct persons and not ceasing Himself to remain a distinct person for practicing the perfect love. He wants to come within us not only once, but always, so that on one hand He is within us, and on the other hand He remains distinct from us and above us, in order to come again in a increasing degree within us, towards the continuous increasing of the relation of love, towards fueling the love, which is shown also through the union of our body with His all-clean body and blood. A friend, though he has become interior to you by the fact that he has given himself to you as a gift, he is always giving himself to you, increasing his interiority within you.” (Stăniloae 1997: 63)

“The fact that we can see God through another person, that the love for the other one it makes that one transparent to God, it is a gift of the Word’s embodiment. Through this, the Word of God has given us the possibility to see Him through the human face, firstly Himself, and then all the ones in whom Christ dwells Himself, or He continues to embody Himself through Mysteries. Only for Christ, as God, He is transparent in the other one, and He adorns the other one, these things appear to us as worthy of endless love; the love for another it isn’t ever exhausted. Besides Christ, the permanent love for a concrete person, it would have been impossible.” (Stăniloae 1997: 120)

“The two ones they love one another for they complete each other, for they are not uniform to one another. The love isn’t born between two souls who sound the same, but who sound harmonically, says Schiller. The love is an exchange of being, a reciprocal completeness. The love enriches each of them for each of them receives and gives endlessly, whilst the hatred impoverishes, for it doesn’t give or receive anything.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122)

“The man finds in woman an indefinite mystery. She knows some insufficiencies which require to be made whole through the man, and that’s why she loves her man; likewise, the man. The marriage is in the same time love and help, enjoying the other one, and suffering him. For all of these the ones who marry are given the godlike grace. The love gives birth to the bewilderment in front of the other one, and the enduring of his helplessness, and helping him in that helplessness. In love, both of them become strong.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122-123)

“An important role in the gradual spiritualization of the bond between the two husbands it belongs to the exercising and by the growing up of the responsibility for one another. The love grows up of the exercising of the reciprocal responsibility and the responsibility grows up out of love. The love between beings conditioned by so many needs of the bodily life, it is not only a happy contemplation of the bodily beauty and then a n increasingly lived contemplation of the other soul’s beauty, but it is that too; but it is the engine of some endless acts of responsibility for the other. And this imprints itself as an important factor of spiritualization in the acts of bodily love.” (Stăniloae 1997: 125-126)

“How weak, how insufficient is the love or the friendship on earth, impeded by so much reticence, by so many doubts! And though, it is heavenly comforting in our life, by banishing away the heavy darkness of the feeling of loneliness, of broken piece and ready to sink into the dark ocean of the endless loneliness, in the absence of any connection with the objective reality of the shore which stay strong, but which is stranger to you.” (Stăniloae 1997: 278)

“The heavenly love and friendship constitute a perfect transparence and communication, unimpeded by bodies – as it is here on earth – but still being accomplished through bodies, in its consummate form, as also through bodies it is accomplished an imperfect love on earth. This is for also through different bodies, but in communication, the ones who love each other they know one another as different persons. In the organism of the universal communion, I still discern my body as environment of noticing the others’ bodies, which I distinguish as their environment of manifestation. In heavens there will take place a pneumatization of the bodies and of the relations amongst them, but not a confounding of them in a uniform “universal body”. In the great light of everybody there will be distinguished the lights of the different bodies and souls, or better said, of the unique persons in their soul and body of light.” (Stăniloae 1997: 278-279)

“After resurrection the people will be like the angels, for they will love each other with a love totally spiritualize, personal, liberated from the urge of the nature and from the sex’s lust. But the entire variety of the persons will be preserved, likewise the angels represent, as persons, different spiritual modalities.” (Stăniloae 1997: 286)

“The criterion for judgment it will be the practicing or the not practicing the love for people, having its firm foundation in seeing God through man, in rooting the man in God, in understanding the fellow human as image of God. By this, the one who loves he accomplishes himself as image of God, as real man. This is for, by loving the people, he collaborates with God, and he unites himself with God in His work, and by doing this himself is fully actualized as man. The diverse steadfast forms of levels of the love, they are the virtues. Through virtues the man gives human image of God in him. That's why God gives Christ to do the people's judgment (Dan. 7: 12), for Christ Himself to ascertain on what measure the examined ones have His image imprinted within them, or they have become like Him and they have accomplished through this the true man within themselves, a fact impossible without they living in communion with Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 292)

"Christ will reckon as being in His images, they who love the people as he did, the ones who love Him within people, for this gave them the power to love. He will judge us on what measure we worked like Him, by identifying ourselves to Him, as he identified Himself to the people. Christ especially assured us about His identification to the persecuted ones, and he will judge us on what measure we loved those people. Christ declared that at the eternal happiness, consisting in the consummate communion with God and with the fellow humans, and by this in the impartation with the infinite spiritual plenitude of the whole, he will cross the ones who departed from here in the tension for this communion, the ones who saw in his most persecuted fellow human his endless value, the face of untold depths of God mirroring Himself in that one and keeping him tied to Him, and he honored this image, this mirror of God, trying to escape him from the shortcoming and the humiliation thrown upon him by the sinful indifference of his fellow humans, and by the way of existence of this world bearing the consequences of the sin, and its own ignorance and weaknesses. Who truly loves the man, he sees somehow the One Who transcends the man, and he sees God Whom the man has his foundation and source in, of his power, of knowledge and of love. And truly loves the man as man, the ones who loves the one despised and disregarded by everybody; to that one it has been revealed the supreme hidden value of the man. The one paying attention only to the ones who are in good material situations, he respects them not for they are humans, but for some own interest, he doesn't love the man as man, unlike the one who leans with love towards his fellow humans who are persecuted and in difficult situations. On the other hand, especially the needy unveils under the attention rays of his fellow human, his profound humanity and therefore also God within him. The others get even haughtier for the honors they are given, thus covering their authentic humanity and God within them, and letting the communion unaccomplished. Then, in the man shouting out with a voice or voicelessly, but heart-breaking, asking for help, or in his eyes closed with pain, Christ Himself is the One Who shouts out or looks at the people's heart, for the sufferance as human sharp sensitiveness it is an adequate environment for the revelation of God Who aims also to awaken the human sensitiveness. The impoverished and the grieved are such a help, a more efficient help, given us by Christ, in order us to enter the relation with Him, for our awakening." (Stăniloae 1997: 293)

“The one who loves the Lord Who humbled Himself as the last man, he does the work of the Lord or the Lord’s work is being done through him. God has made Himself man in order Himself to possibly be loved as man, and in order to show in His example what the man must love his fellow humans like. He wants us to love Him as man, asking for our love, and he shows us how to love. He enters the relation of love with us and he strengthens the love relations amongst us, by making Himself addressee and human and divine subject of the love. He strengthens our love, by attracting us to love through the face of the one in sufferance, and he gives us the power of loving for he is the One loving that one in an exemplary manner. He eases our love, by awakening the mercy he has sown it in a natural mode within our being.” (Stăniloae 1997: 294)

“The divine Self manifested through Christ’s humanity Who has made Himself the human self too, it has a width, a divine complexity, and an infinite depth, through which He manifests His character as role-model and as ground of all the human hypostases as source of their power for love, still manifesting Himself as human. Each one of us will fully love Christ when he will love any man, because of not loving a man you do not love a ray of Christ, of the divine Hypostasis in human countenance, or better said in a all-human countenance. That’s why Christ’s humanity isn’t that of a human hypostasis, but it is of the divine Hypostasis, so that it isn’t the organ of manifestation of an individual self, and that’s why individual at its turn, but He is the organ of manifestation of the divine Self, the original role-model and the maker and the upholder of all the human selves; Christ’s humanity is therefore a humanity capable of presenting and showing the human universality, a humanity that needs to be loved in all the persons and which gives us the power to love all persons.” (Stăniloae 1997: 294)

“We may not see now Christ in our fellow human, or our fellow human in Christ. We might know this, for now, only by faith. But this fact will be revealed to us at the final judgment. In Christ we will see then the image of each man; in each man we will see a ray of Christ’s face. Then we will see that by not loving a man, we actually didn’t love Christ in that man and we didn’t allow Christ to love him in us. We have an example in the report between a parent’s face and his children. The image of the parent comprises the images of all his children and the image of each child represents a ray from the parent’s face, of the entire specific of the parent’s face in that ray. He who doesn’t love the image of a child he doesn’t love entirely the parent and he doesn’t follow the parent’s example. Christ reckons as referring to Himself all the love deeds of or the non-love deeds addressed to the people, like we refer to ourselves all the honoring or the dishonoring addressed to our mother, or to our brother, or to our children.” (Stăniloae 1997: 294-295)

“Because we have told that the salvation consists in elevating the man from the simple state of an object, to that one of a subject, of the divine love, the question that arises is: does love constitute the perfection of the character of the subject, and God too has the love? In order to answer this question, there are necessary few words about love.

Love has the surety, the experience of you like a reality which arises above the world of the objects, like a reality which does not exist only to stay at my discretion, or to be swallowed into the mass of what it is indifferent to me. All my inclinations and attitudes, through which I am using or trying to use something, because of making me lonelier they aren't either love or subject of love, or even subject in a full sense. I can become wholly conquered by this kind of inclinations or attitudes. Love is that sight from me, which, when discovering a you, it gets me out from my loneliness, it gives me the experience of the fellowship, of the deep friendship - a total one -, of that you are with me to the deep on my heart, into the most intimate joys and pains, that I hold on you, that you are helping me, that you are caressing and relieving me, even into the most dreadful experience of the death's loneliness. But I have through you these joys and this relief, not because I am thinking at me. Immediately that I have this selfish thought, there isn't love any longer, neither fellowship, but only loneliness. I have all through you, because I am no longer thinking at me, but I am aimed only towards you, towards your experience. I forget then about all my matters. Nothing hurts me anymore, nor makes me restless because of what concerns me, but I am preoccupied only with what concerns you. I cast away all my burdens, by taking you exclusively to be my concern and my burden. I am living through you. The ones who love each-other they reciprocally carry their burdens. (Jesus takes our sins and we take His sufferings). In love I have found my supreme happiness in you. Love is the supreme responsibility for another. On this way we experience also the love for our fellow human: like a subject burdened by the supreme responsibility for us, and having in this his supreme happiness. All it is owned by a person it serves like an instrument to communicate love. As ownership, the nature makes no sense; likewise, the man's body; the same the intimate features. The one who is in love with somebody he gives everything to the other one, even his own self. But even in total surrender of himself, he still remains the subject of the surrender. Everything serves to love, to communion, to the me-you report. Through love we discover, like a supreme reality, the another like a subject, like something who limits us, like something that is no longer below us, but he is in front of and above us, in the sense that he compels us with an infinitely deep seriousness, like something which we cannot control, even if physically we could. And in the same time love is the assuming of this responsibility and full joy in serving.

By combining all these manifestations and countless other manifestations, we can tell that through love we affirm the other one like a free subject, like we are, and we do not reduce him to the state of an object, so that he also will affirm us. We make our happiness addicted to him, after we generously recognize him and help him to consolidate into the dignity of ultimate and free center of his acts. Through love we give everything we have to the other one, accomplishing him, and then we receive everything from him. Because we need our confirmation in existence, through the free appreciation and consideration of the other one, we do everything to elevate him to this state¹⁷⁸.

The love is the leaning towards the other one, in order to give, and not to receive (not to pluck from him, like from the object, without the consent of him, but to depend on his will).

How much it gets along then, the love with the sovereign character of the subject? And how much it fulfills him?

It was noticed that only the love makes us fully free. Only what we do out of love we do that by being ourselves completely in freedom¹⁷⁹. The sovereignty does not mean selfishness, but lack of compulsion, namely spontaneity. By giving everything to another one, we do that in freedom, and by receiving everything from the other one, we receive that only from the one who loves us, and who, therefore, does not force us, but he increases our liberty. The love of the other one - its manifestations -, it softens your obduracy, and it deepens what is noble into you and it makes you to find yourself into your intimacy. The liberty of both of them, it increases in this communication, in this encouragement and in this reciprocal affirmation. The man becomes the slave of the passions, getting weaker in his character of subject, when he does not love. The selfishness, the envy, the fear, they are forces which limit his liberty and sovereignty. The subject is a subject only in communion with other subjects. So, the full subject is the subject being the bearer of love; the full subject is an unreserved intentionality after communion. The conscience and the liberty, far from excluding this intentionality, they serve it. By the fact that the man is the full subject only when he is a love bearer, there occurs the consequence that the full man's existence is not possible without the love from God, without the report with Him. A human nature existing by itself it is an eo ipso into an under-natural¹⁸⁰ state. Without the permanent love from God, the man lives an ill existence.

¹⁷⁸ LOUIS LAVALLE, W. c. 526-30.

¹⁷⁹ LOUIS LAVALLE, W. c. 526-33.

¹⁸⁰ The Catholicism sustains that the man went out from the connection with God, through the fall, while still remaining with the "pure nature". This nature is, in any case, "something tormented, something that God does not want".

But though, so blunt and incomplete, the capacity of being a subject of love, and therefore the subject character itself, it may be found also into the man who has not in him the love for God, namely the fallen man. He feels over him the force of the other's look and opinion, and he feels himself compelled to take the other one into count; in everything he does, he feels the another somewhat like a "subject" who does not stay in a simple subordination and indifference like any object does. He feels himself towards another like being into a special reference which is above the objects, in an obligation to answer the expectations of the other one. As that one is a subject, he is a subject also, whereas he is capable of answering and he feels himself compelled to responsibility¹⁸¹. He feels the other one like a subject because he feels himself compelled to refer - in everything he does - to the opinion of the other one, to the expectation of that one, and to respond through all the action and through all his life to that one. He feels that he does everything for the other one. The other one's advocate in us, which makes us to be accountable to him, it is our conscience. On the measure we feel the obligation to answer the other one, on the measure of the strength the conscience's voice has, it grows up within us the capacity of love and the subject. Most of the time the man struggles against this obligation. Though involuntary he works for the other one's sight, he perverts this work by mixing it and contaminating it with the sentiment of vanity. But the vanity, of which force no man - from the ones who are deprived of love - can escape, by mixing in it the pride and the care about others, it is also a confession of the man's responsibility, of his character as a subject. The intentionality for communion, which it is the characteristic of the state of love, it manifests - no matter how had the man tries to chock it -, even in the man's fallen state, like a fundamental structure of his being. The newer philosophy has established this thing with full clarity¹⁸².

If the final destination of the man is to be a subject of love, by being created on this purpose he has received the seal of God's image, and if the salvation does not aim but only the raising of the man to the likeness with the Son of God, by making him also a son, and this is done by sending the divine love, namely of the Son's Ghost in him, then the godlike model which stays at the basis of the creation and salvation, the divine model of the man, or the "heavenly man", he won't have to consists in something else, but into the consummate character of the love in communion. And this is God because He is a Trinity of Persons." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁸¹ E. BRUNNER sees into the responsibility the human being and the God's manner in him. (Der Mensch im Widerspruch, Berlin, 1937).

¹⁸² For example, M. HEIDEGGER says: "Als Mit sein «ist» daher das Dasein wesentlich um willen Anderer. Das muss als existentielle Wesensaussage verstanden werden. Auch wenn das jeweilige faktische Dasein sich an Andere nicht kehrt, ihrer bedürftig zu sein vermeint, oder aber sie entbehrt, ist es in der Weise des Mit seins. Im Mit sein als dem existentialen Unwillen Anderen sind diese in ihrem Dasein schon «erschlossen»". Sein und Zeit, p. 123.

“God is endless love, say the ones who do not see in the death of Jesus also a fulfillment of the justice. His Being imposes Him to infinitely forgive. “This is His job: to forgive”.

This kind of thinking introduces a dangerous relativism into the moral order. If the mission of the man is to sin infinitely, and the mission of God is to forgive infinitely, if nowhere it is put the foot down against the human sin, what authority will God still have and what force will still stay in support of the good and of the moral order? In this case, not God is the Sovereign, but the man. God has no other choice but to continue walking on the tracks of the man for cleaning his mess. In this case, there doesn't exist a moral order which the man to feel above him and around him, but the man himself is his own law, if there can be any law.

It is said that the superior man forgives, so God must forgive all the more. But the people have to forgive one another, because no one is without sin, and no one can truly make himself a judge to the other¹⁸³. They can forgive, so that, because they have not the responsibility of keeping the moral order. In fact, we can also see amongst people that, immediately when is about the ones who represent and who take care of institutions, who take care of establishments based on a certain order, they cannot forgive anything and however, like the private individuals can, no matter how much they would want this in their personal quality. About the state, Paul the Apostle, says that it carries a sword for the punishment of the evil ones, and the state, in his way, is from God. But Jesus asks the individuals without public roles to forgive for seventy times seven.

God, though, He is the supreme preserver of the entire moral order.”
(Stăniloae 1993)

“The love is an element which strengthens the unity in the frame of the human nature hypostasized in numerous selves. And the lack of love weakens the human nature, or, at least, it takes the moral-spiritual character, living it at most like a fact of substance. Jesus, by having an unlimited love towards any man, He creates a maximum closeness between the human nature hypostasized in Him and the one hypostasized in all the human subjects. His love is the magnet which attracts upon Him everything that has resulted like guilt from the sin manifested through all the human subjects.

¹⁸³ PAUL ALTHAUS: Das Kreuz Christi, in Mysterium Christi, Furche- Verlag, Berlin, 1931, p. 245.

But, if it had been like that, it shouldn't have attracted, this love, also the sinful thought and impulse which moves itself into the hypostasized nature into the human subject? The love for a fellow human it doesn't compel you to commit the sin with him. A contrary, it compels you that, besides all the closeness to him, to keep yourself clean, to be able to help him to raise up.

The intimacy of the fellow human you can find it, you can meet it, and you can look at it, in its face through your intimacy, without this making yourself sinner like him¹⁸⁴." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Even the individual who has reached the peaks of the spiritual living, when the main thing to him is no longer the external activity, but it is the contemplation, he exercises an influence upon the world's development, through the attraction and the power which he exercises upon his fellow humans, in order these ones to become – by the same fulfilling of the commandments, by the same virtuous work – like him. he imitates God Who, though He is unchangeable, he doesn't stop through this non-changeability the dynamism of the creation – but, through the impulse and through the ceaseless attraction He exercises upon creation, He upholds the creation's dynamism, by giving it as ideal target His supreme perfection, which is unchangeable just because of that. The spiritualized man who has reached the peak of the consummation, he exercises upon his fellow humans some impulse and an attraction making them to strive in order to reach the final target. This is for the highest virtue which the spiritual man struggles for, it is the love. In love there is knowledge too. And the love for God cannot be separated from the love for people." (Stăniloae 1992: 28-29)

"The true manhood and the true initiative are proven in his live not by that one who thinks that he is carried without freedom by the indefinite flux of the world, without any direction, but by the one who knows the direction and the target of his life's consummation and of the world's consummation, and he knows that through his freedom he can contribute to the normal guiding of this unfolding which advances towards love, and who is responsible for the spiritual form which he imprints to his live." (Stăniloae 1992: 29)

¹⁸⁴ This is the sense of the general and concise formulations of the Saint Maximos the Confessor regarding the assumption of the sins of the humanity by Jesus Christ. After him, there are two kind of assumption of the states and of deeds of the other: one relational and one natural, ontological. The first one it is realized through intentional acts, the second one through organic transmission. Through relational assumption I assume acts and states which I am not doing or suffering. The not sinful shortcomings of the human nature, the ones who represent the punishment of the sin, but there are not sinful themselves, like the need for sleep, food, the fatigue, the pain to the tears, the fear of death Jesus has assumed them ontological. The sinful tendencies and states, He has only rational assumed them.

“It is enough to remember that who says “me” too often, in order to highlight that he has accomplished some things, and not somebody else, he actually end up cutting off his connections with his fellow humans. Not having love for other he won’t benefit of others’ love. His pride has cut his nature off from others’ nature, which, even borne by several subjects, it still is one in its seen and unseen communications, and only thus its strength is being maintained and it is growing up, ceaselessly being enriched. Actually, the complete cutting off of the nature between individuals cannot ever take place. This would mean total death to them. If still is maintained, even in the most egotistic individual, though in a tormented form, it is due to the fact that his nature still remain in some connections, be it crooked ones, with others. This is for, in reality, there isn’t a thing that somebody could do it by himself, even if apparently nobody has helped him. The idea of that deed, the incentive towards it, the skillfulness required for it, and so many other conditions of it, he has been given with from the environment which he has grown up in. Each one should say regarding everything he has been able to do: “we” have done it, and not for calling himself at plural, but in order to admit the others’ contribution to any of his own feat. “Me” is an expression of the pride, indicating a dangerous cutting off of the nature. “We” is the expression of the love, of the humbleness, or recognizing the nature’s unity and the synodal quality of the subjects, founded on this unity of the nature. That’s why Saint Maximos the Confessor said that only the love removes the tearing apart from within the human nature” (Epistle II towards John Cubicula; G.P. 91, 396).” (Stăniloae 1992: 70-71)

“There is a tight connection between love and dispassion. The love presupposes the dispassion and at its turn it strengthens the dispassion, by the fact that it is opposite to the passions which represent the egotism. Where there are passions, there the love cannot be. That’s why the love comes within our soul in the whole its amplitude after we have reached the dispassion, after we have liberated ourselves of passions. Of course, the culminant prayer too, above the prayer through concepts and words, one will achieve it also only after the liberation of passions. This is for cannot pray appropriately the one who is not appeased and who cannot direct himself exclusively towards God, and while he still is preoccupied egotistically with himself. In this sense the love sums up all the other virtues, for through each virtue it is killed a passion. But the love is the immediate fruit of the prayer. “All the virtues help the mind to reach the love for God but, more than all of them, it helps the clean prayer. This is for by flying through this one towards God, it gets out of all the existing things”, said Saint Maximos the Confessor (G.P. 90, 964). The passions mean, shortly, the love for the self, the love for God is the opposite of the love for the self. “The one who loves on himself he cannot love God” said Diadochus. “But the one who doesn’t love on himself due to the overwhelming richness of the love from God, he loves God, for one like this he doesn't search for his glory, but he searched for the glory of God. This is because the one who loves on himself, he searches for his glory, while the one who loves God, he loves the glory of the One Who has created him. This is because it is characteristic to the sensitive soul, on one hand to always search for the glory of God in all the commandments he fulfills, and on the other hand to delight himself into his humbleness" (The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 343)." (Stăniloae 1992: 255)

"The love for God, on the highest level, it isn't only freedom from passions, but it is the gift from God that descends within the soul who has reached this state." (Stăniloae 1992: 255)

"While the clean prayer starts from below, of course by being helped by the hidden grace of the Holy Ghost, the culminant love it is the answer from above, the answer of God. Through it, the godlike is unveiled to us and is felt by us." (Stăniloae 1992: 255)

"The man has the virtual capacity of becoming subject of the divine love and in a certain measure the man tends towards that. The godlike image from within man it consists of this. But the man cannot have the love itself, in its fullness, from himself, but he receives the love from God, and this means that the man cannot achieve the likeness to God except in communion with God. Namely, even if in the image is hidden the virtuality of the likeness to God, this virtuality cannot become actuality by itself, but only under the flame of the godlike work or love." (Stăniloae 1992: 256-257)

"We cannot find the nature in its pure state, but we find it only as sub-nature, or in state of nature penetrated by grace. So, we cannot know the natural love in its purity too. The love we see at man, outside the connection with God, it isn't even the natural love. The great deficiencies of such love show us that the true love cannot be except a gift from God. When the nature has reached its healthy state, in its love will be the divine grace too." (Stăniloae 1992: 257)

"In this natural love there is active the man too. But above this level, there is the one in whom it works exclusively the God's love. Actually, we can discern three levels of love: a) the tendencies of natural sympathy in the state of the nature fallen off grace; b) the Christian love which by using these tendencies it grows up out of the divine grace and out of the own efforts; this grows and becomes firm; this love takes the nature to some kind of nature's fulfillment; this love is, at the beginning, little firm, and it later becomes increasingly firmer and more intense. Diadochus refers sometimes to the first kind of love, and sometimes he refers to the second kind of love, when he speaks about the natural love. At its beginnings, the second kind of love, being hesitant, it can easily be confounded to the natural sympathy, of better said, to the love of the one who lacks the grace. But, to the extent it progresses, it becomes fortified, and it comes closer to the love as ecstasy, which is a gift exclusively from above. The second love, called also as Christian love, it prepares the soul for ecstasy. These two can be sometimes wrapped under the same name, especially when it comes about the highest levels of the first kind of love. c) Finally, the love as ecstasy or exclusively as gift from above, it comes after a long preparation through the second kind of love, and it lasts for short moments, in order the second kind of love to gain a new force and to continue its growth. While during the second kind of love the man is elevated to the state of the nature restored in grace, the love as exclusive gift from above it elevates the man above the nature's limits. When we speak about true love, we often speak about the second kind of love, in opposition to the first kind of love which is overwhelmed by egotism. But this true love we are speaking about it still isn't the love as exclusively godlike power." (Stăniloae 1992: 257)

"The full love it means a total victory of the man upon himself, not in the sense that he would despise on himself, consequently to a discouragement, but in the sense that he positively affirms the life, but he considers that the true life in itself it experiences an infinity of the power of self-giving, which he obviously cannot have it from himself." (Stăniloae 1992: 257)

"The divine love has a firmness which no vicissitude can shake it, and this is stranger to the natural love. The one having this love he feels within himself a spring always gushing up light and joy. The natural love cannot have these virtues, for the natural love falls so easily and which is weakened by any evil thing it suffers." (Stăniloae 1992: 257)

"The godlike love descending within man it presupposes a victory upon the egotism manifested through passions and, by being a man's positive getting out of himself, it is the same time love for God and love for fellow humans. Of course, by being the power of this love received from God and by being obtained through aiming our soul - through prayer towards God -, it is correct to say that the love for God is the source of the love for people, and not the opposite. Not from the love for people one reaches to the love for God, but from the love for God one reaches the love for people, the last one being a prolongation of the first one. (...) This doesn't mean that the love for people can sometimes be absent." (Stăniloae 1992: 258)

"Of course, the man cannot comprise in himself the whole love from God. But it isn't less true that, having the love from God within himself, the man feels it like something endless. This love grows up on the measure of exercise and of the will to intensify it. This is for on the measure the man opens his heart towards his fellow humans he widens his heart for the ocean of the godlike love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 259)

“The godlike love is drunkenness for it overwhelms with its enthusiasm the mind’s worldly reckoning and the body’s feeling. This love moves the one who is partaker to it on another reality plan. He sees another world, a world having logic that darkness the logic of the usual life, and he receives the feeling of other states overwhelming the feeling of the bodily pains or pleasures. That’s why the martyrs seem fools to this world, but they are the true wise men.” (Stăniloae 1992: 259)

“Amongst the ones who love one another there is not separation. On the other hand, it would be simplistic to conceive the love only as a communication of energy from one to another, and there would be totally wrong too, to conceive the love as identification of selves. The energy communicated from one to another amongst the ones who love each other, it hasn’t a physical character and it isn’t communicated in the form which the physical energies communicate it in. In a certain meaning, the loved one doesn’t send only an energy of his in the being of the one who loves him, but he sends on himself as a whole, without ceasing to remain in himself too. He projects the whole his being through his energy in the soul of the one who loves him. And the image of the loved one it doesn’t impose forcedly by itself, but it is received and it is kept with joy, better said it is absorbed by the one who loves, so that one cannot tell which of them sends together with his image a greater energy from himself to another: the loved one or the one who loves.” (Stăniloae 1992: 260-261)

“This reciprocal communication of energy takes place between two people as between God and man. Here, in the first place, God sends His energy within man. And the divine eros by descending within man it makes him absorb in himself the projection of the image of God. But it is not less true that the divine energy, since communicated to the man, it turns back towards God and in this turning back it has the form of the affection of the human subject, awakened by the divine energy. This is for not only God loves the man but the man too loves God, or, the man sends towards God energy of his own, or the divine energy dressed up and imprinted by the intentionality and by the affection of the human subject. If, as Saint John Climacus said, the face of the loves one it transforms us entirely according to its image and it fill sup our face with joy and charm, it means that his energy it is sent within us and it works within us, but not in a physical or subconscious manner, but by our will, affection, and conscience, all of these eased by that energy that works in a deeper mode within us.

This work of the loved one absorbed by the being who loves him and vice-versa, it was noticed and insistently described by Ludwig Binswanger. He called this absorption of the loved image and the transformation this absorption causes it: imagination or imagining in the etymological sense of the words. This imagination isn't a simple fantasy or illusion, without a real object, but it means receiving within soul the image of the real being, an intimate connection between the two beings who love one another. The image of the loved one, or of the one who loves, it is lived as a true upholding or foundation of my life.

Binswanger wasn't content only by ascertaining this fact of the "imaginative" love, of the joy of always seeing the image of the loved being in thought, but he also searched for an explanation of this. And the explanation consists of a fundamental union accomplished by the persons who love each other. We have seen that we experience God in prayer as absolute and sovereign subject. We also experience as sovereign subject any of our fellow humans, and our subject too. Neither our own subject nor the subject of our fellow human cannot be captured, comprised, subordinated, or made object. While I cannot capture my fellow human's subject, and this happens especially in love when I do not even try something like this, so that I cannot annul his sovereignty, I still experience him in love as he gives himself to me; I do not feel myself as a lonely individual in opposition to him, or I do not feel him in opposition to me, for, if it was like that the love connection would be broken. In love I do not live only on myself, or through myself, but I also live my fellow human and through him, without him ceasing to be a subject independent from me. This still means that I do not have him as an object of mine, as part of my individuality, but he is in connection with me not as mine but as ours. His subject is given to me, or he unveils himself as given to me, as my subject does too, in as sovereign existence, but still depending on my existence, and lived together with my existence. He becomes more intimate to me than all things I possess, I feel him penetrated within me more deeply than anything, and I penetrate within him more than all things he has. The intimacy is fuller between me and him than between me and all things I possess, but I still do not possess him as a thing, I cannot reduce him to something mastered by my own "self" and I cannot possess him by myself.

If you give yourself to me but you still remain free and sovereign, namely not subordinated to me as subject, and if I give myself to you likewise, it means that neither me or you won't become the exclusive property of someone, but I will be yours without ceasing to be mine too, and you are mine without losing your freedom, without ceasing to be yours too. Namely, I am ours, and you are ours. Actually, neither I or you are ours in the meaning of some common objects, but both I and you experience us as a unity of free subjects who are so tightly connected than they cannot be separated from one another, as a unity lives by each one of the two subjects, your subject being equally intimate and necessary to me as mine is, or even constituting to me, or to my subject, the center of preoccupation and the source of living, like my subject constituted to you such a source too.

We are in a unity, each one looking at another. You are necessary to me, you belong to my experience, without being incorporated into my own self, and I belong to your existence without being incorporated within you. You are necessary to me not in order I to make of you my subordinate and servant, not because I would feel the need for such a subordinate and servant, but in order you to be my center of preoccupation and service. You are necessary to me as autonomous subject, and not as subordinate subject. You are necessary to me in order I to replace the care for me for the care for you, in order to place you in my self's place. You become so intimate to me, so much one with me, I attract you so much in the center of my existence, so that you substitute my "self". You hold the place of my "self", you hold within me the place of the prime person, but still remaining independent from me. (...) In the same time, you are doing the same to me, and in this is being manifested the independence of your subject from me, and just by this your subject makes me fully happy. This is a substitution of the selves. I was given, by you, the place of my "self", and I have taken the place of your "self" within you, by your will and not by constraining you.

But you have taken the place of my "self" within me by still remaining autonomous, and therefore there isn't about an absorption of you within me, but it is also about mine getting out of myself, mine living not around my own self, but around you, as there it is also about a living of yours around me. I do not experience only your living around me, but I experience my living around you too. For the center of my living is no longer me but you are, I experience you as center, but for I am the center of your living, my value is rewarded through you, so that through me I experience your value, but in the same time through you I take note of my value too; thus, even about me as value I know through you, or I have on myself in my own depth, through you. My conscience is not detached from the conscience of you, from the conscience of "us". (Stăniloae 1992: 261-263)

"Actually, neither belong I to you nor you belong to me, but both of us belong to a common "us". I exceed myself in the connection of love with you, I am no longer locked up in me, but now I am somehow between me and you, I am out of the circle of my property, as you too are out of the circle of your property, and we created a unity that is no longer reduced to the property of a single self, mine or yours, and which still isn't outside us both. It isn't about having us both in a common property, like we can have diverse objects in common, but as my singular self is above the quality as property of mine, but I still live it, likewise our selves are above an individual or common property, but we live them in common; both me and you we are living out of the unity of the two subjects, without these two subjects ceasing to be two; I live "us" and you live "us" too. That's why my report with you it cannot be expressed as incorporation of yours within me, or as mine incorporation within you, but it can be expressed as "encounter", as mine getting out of myself and yours getting out of yourself; I stand open before you and you stand open before me. This reciprocal openness is appurtenance and freedom in the same time. I cannot exist without living you nor can you exist without living me. I grow up spiritually by living you, and you do likewise. It is a completion of mine through you, and it is a completion of yours through me.” (Stăniloae 1992: 263-264)

“I need to communicate you some meanings, and if you listen to me with understanding, I will gain a new understanding too of these meanings. I gain in depth, and I become transparent to me as subject, by the fact that I penetrate the depths of your subject, or by the fact that you open your depths voluntarily. You are my hope and my strength, and I am your hope and strength. Just by the fact that you know you are my hope and strength, you are getting stronger, and I likewise, just by the fact that I know I am your hope and strength. My and your appurtenance to a common “us” it determines me, when you shout out for my help, to feel that something belonging to me is suffering, and if I hit you I would diminish and lessen myself of something that is much more essential than losing one of my belongings. Maybe that’s why the French says: “Partir c’est mourir un peu”. Leaving you, I somewhat die, as you die too when leaving me. So it can be explained the acute feeling or conscience remorse for the evil I have done to others and the responsibility I feel for my fellow humans. Only by the fact that through love your appurtenance to the circle of my existence it is revealed to me, as part of “us”, as part of a common reality which both of us belong to, and only the fact that in this “us” which I cannot normally exist without, I have the role to receive from you, as you have the role to receive from me, it explains that thing which I feel like a wonder to: that you love me. Each subject understands what he loves the other subject for, for he sees in that one a series of features and helps, he feels that he couldn’t live without another. (...) No one can realize how much he means for another, but he can realize how much another means to him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 264-265)

“Love is the reverse of the pride and of the self-appreciation. Love reveals the fact that nobody can be happy without others, that one’s existence becomes rich and deep through other people. By exclusively living within myself, my existence gets exhausted of any content.” (Stăniloae 1992: 265)

“The Christian love is intertwined with the humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1992: 265)

“All the more difficult is to understand the mystery of God’s love for us and the God’s desire that we to answer Him with our love. The value granted by God to us it is amazing. The love is the proof of our eternal existence and the means for our consummation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 265)

“Sometimes, this sentiment of our lack of importance makes us hesitating to say some appreciation words to somebody who seems to us as being too superior to us in order to need that from us, some other times we address harsh word to the people, reckoning that our words cannot have any real effect in them. But later we are surprised by how much could those words hurt, or how much hurt the lack of a good word from us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 265)

“It would seem at a first glance that what determines us to not pay our attention to some persons who seem superior to us it is the same humbleness which our love must be accompanied by. But the true humbleness doesn’t hesitate paying other the whole attention; the sentiment of the own smallness, by being overwhelmed by the sentiment of other’s value, it must make us forget about the lack of importance our words and attentions could have, and to pay to another the whole our attention by no longer thinking at us but by exclusively thinking at him. The love is in this sense too, a surpassing of the self.” (Stăniloae 1992: 265)

“The humble feeling of this smallness of our being it doesn’t exclude an own growth through our fellow human’s love. I feel that if I lived through myself outside the relation of love with somebody, I would be nothing, but in the love relation which I am in I am growing up, but I reduce to him the whole plus that I am experiencing. I have the same sentiment when I am growing up in the love for God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 266)

“Love is achieved when two subject, in their quality as subject, they encounter one another in a reciprocal feeling, namely without reducing one another to the state of objects, but by unveiling themselves at maximum, as subject, and by reciprocally giving themselves to one another and into the whole their freedom. The love is the reciprocal penetration of two subjects in their intimacy, more than the interpenetration between a subject and a thing. The two persons do not cease, while loving each other, to be sovereign and autonomous. Through love you penetrate the intimacy of one of your fellow human, in the core of his being, more than you penetrate in the being of an object, even if you assimilate that object by eating it. You penetrate your fellow human without destroying him and without diminishing him, but, on the opposite, by giving him the occasion to grow up. That’s why the love is the supreme union and reciprocal promotion, and, just because of that, the love is the supreme knowing in which the fellow human isn’t passive, but he is freer than in any other state or relation. The more I love him, the more he reveals himself to me. The human subject can actualize such a connection with any other subject when he has noticed him through the mediation of the senses. So, virtually, the human subject is in such a connection and he is called to actualize it with anybody. But the possibility of this relation to be actualized it is more or less impeded by the attempt of the subjects to reciprocally reduce one another to the state of objects, or by the lack of attention which a subject he passes by another subject with. The pride, the egotistic passions they atrophy the normal connection which a normal virtuality from within us it asks for to be developed within any individual. When we develop this connection or when we unveil ourselves in it, we place ourselves much more than ever before, in the interior of another, but also in our interior too. Now it is achieved and it becomes transparent our own depth and our fellow human's depth. It is revealed, it gives a considerable plus of reality. The other one reveals to us as having an amazing depth, an unsuspected richness. But what it is odd it is that this plus cannot be exactly defined. While by remaining in the contact with our fellow human, when the great richness of his subject if covered to us, we can formulate in definite concepts some features of his and we tend to define him exactly, and unveiling his subject places us, a contrary, in a connection with a unmatched greater plus, but which is impossible to specify, in its essence, in concepts." (Stăniloae 1992: 266-267)

"The love is a huge plus of knowledge, in the same time producing a plus of life in the loved one and in the one who loves him, by developing at maximum his being and my being. But one cannot formulate this knowledge in concepts. Here we can see the meaning which Binswanger gave to the term: "imagination". By realizing through a direct experience that within the subject of my fellow human there is a richness which cannot be delimited in concepts, I employ the imagination for the whole plus from within him, which I experience, but which I cannot formulate in concepts." (Stăniloae 1992: 267)

"This imagination has multiple grounds of truth. In the first place, the subject of each one, he hides indefinite potentialities, which can be valorized through love. That's why the one who loves notices in the one whom he loves, these potentialities increasingly more. This is for, in the first place, for he notices in his voluntary manifestations and in his soul's vibrations a multitude of nuances revealing latencies unnoticed by the quick or superficial look of the ones who are hostile or indifferent to him. In the second place, for the one who love he really beautifies by his love each trait of the one whom he loves, not only for he projects from himself a veil of light upon them, but also by the fact that the one who is loved, by feeling another's love, he lives that love as a power that brings forth from his depths everything he has better and in the same time it increases him considerably; actually, by our love we make other to be better and more beautiful, ads we do with ourselves too. And in the third place, the one who loves creates within himself some kind of image of light of the one whom he loves, and this is due either totally to the potentialities hidden in the traits of the loved one, or to the ideals which the tendencies of the one who loves aspire to in an unknown manner, or to the fact that there is a synthesis of the aspirations of one of them and of the potentialities of another, which seems more probably to us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 267)

“By and large, the imagination is the product of some forces, of certain latencies, or of some possibilities from the common content of the two ones who love one another, out of the content of “us”. And if the one who imagines them, he strongly believes in them, and this takes place in the true love, the force at their basis - which the will is engages in too, being communicated from the one who loves to the loved one - it determines the loved one too, to strive himself towards actualizing those latencies of his, not to say that within him there works also the ideal image he has about another. The indefinite so rich in nuances of the loved subject, or the enriched duality of the subject who love one another, it comprises as potentialities everything that is expresses through their imagination, and the force of this imagination which is the force of the love, if it is true love, and steadfast, and strong, it succeeds in actualizing these potentialities in each of them. Thus, the image of the loved one, idealized by the imagination of the one who loved him, it becomes a model force transforming the loved one, day by day, while the one who love he actualizes increasingly more his idealized image created by another. Actually, between my image actualized by the one who loves me, and his image idealized by myself, there takes place a reciprocal fusion by communication, and I, being transformed according to the idealized image made to me by another, I actualize in the same time my idealized image which started to be the idealized image which the other one shapes himself according to. And by each one of them looking at another, in the light of the reciprocal idealized image - for by looking at another each of them sees an idealized image of himself -, each one of them sees an idealized image of himself which he shapes himself according to. Of course, the new image of both of them doesn't bear only the traits of one or of another, but it is a synthesis of both of them, for it isn't an egotistic victory of one “self” but it is “our” victory upon my and your egotism, and a growth of mine and of yours.” (Stăniloae 1992: 267-268)

“If the imagination had lacked, each one's image would have become callous, and it would have been lost its beauty. The imagination is the force which the one who loves he brings like a diver with, out of the infinite richness of the one whom he loves, new beauties and lights and transparence, on that one's face and then on his own face, or on the common face, and partially he enriches the one whom he loves in a real mode with them. If the love has ended, the imagination will stop. The imagination's force is the love, and the love's force is the imagination. And for the love is in contact with a deep and true reality, the imagination has at its turn a real basis. On the other hand, they have a real creator power.” (Stăniloae 1992: 268)

“We can go even further in clarifying the whole power of this imagination. As we have seen before, the one who loves, by unveiling the indefinite deeps of his fellow human subject, he also unveils his ones, without this meaning that he couldn’t descend through himself too, to these own depths, of course if he doesn’t lack the love for people by and large, but he will be able to have this power only if he has love for God. But we have seen that the one who descends in the indefinite deeps of his own subject he intuitively, in connection with his own indefinite, the divine indefinite too.

Of course, the way which, in such a case, the subject descends in his depths on, it is the way of the prayer. To the one who would reckon that, by admitting such a way of descending in the own depths, we contradict our affirmation that without other’s love we cannot unveil our own subject, we answer that the prayer does not stay in contradiction with the way of the love, but it is at its turn a way of continuous growing up in love. This is for by advancing through the Heart’s Prayer to the mental prayer within heart, what upholds us in this effort is our love for Jesus, a love that grows continuously, transforming us, by spiritually imagining His spiritual image, in His image, and by feeling Him increasingly united with our own “self”, in an “us” which I no longer am able to get out of, because of the danger of being lost. And not only I receive within me the “Self” of Christ, becoming in His image, but also His “Self” receives my “self” within Him, and He receives even my body in Himself, so that He frames me too, in His clean senses, and in His clean deeds. Thus, all of us who believe, we become one “body” with Him, and amongst us, a fact that will come to perfection in the future life.”

This is being done especially through the clean prayer addressed to Jesus. And the one who accomplished this substitution of “selves” between me and Christ, and between all the ones united in Christ, he is the Holy Ghost. He is the Ghost of this communion. For the Holy Ghost is the Ghost of communion in the Holy Trinity too. But until becoming capable of such a prayer which fills me up with Christ, I must have grown up considerably in the love for my fellow human too, and in the intervals which this prayer is interrupted on, I must feel increasingly fuller the love for them. The levels of the spiritual ascension aren’t so separated as we have described them due to methodological reasons, but they coexist several of them and the one who has reached a level he doesn’t remain forever on it but he descends on lower levels too, but he still brings with him new spiritual riches, and he still remains capable of ascending more easily on the levels which he has descended from. No one can be, while still on earth, always in prayer, or always in feeling an actual love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 268-269)

“The true love for any fellow human, the love that never fails, it cannot be born in the absence of the prayer and in the absence of the purifying of passions asceticism. It is true that without the fellow human subject’s unveiling in the true love, we neither unveil our subject’s depth, so that we do not reach the ultimate consummation in prayer; but neither can we achieve, without prayer, the full love for people. We believe that the prayer as love for God, and the love for our fellow humans, they progress in parallel and in an inter-conditioning. But the faith in God prevails. The faith in God it gives power to our will of loving our fellow humans, as also in sustaining our effort in prayer.” (Stăniloae 1992: 270)

“We reckon that who unveils himself he loves the other one, helped by prayer too, or he has ascended on the level of the mental prayer, helped by love too. And by unveiling the indefinite of the own subject, he unveils in connection and in communication with him the divine infinite too. All the more is this as he unveils also in the deeps of the beloved fellow human and in inward communication with him the divine infinite. If so, the “imagination” of the love has an infinite source in dressing the fellow human up with the traits of the most ideal features, for our fellow human can appropriate all the things in an actual mode, by being in connection with Christ, either directly, or through myself, for I love him out of my connection with Christ Who is the source of all virtues.

This is the full meaning of the loving imagination. But the infinite that opens in front of the love it isn’t an infinite in continuity of substance with us. It is right that, in the loving form of “us”, the existence finds an indefinite overflowing in each one of the two selves as a flooding with joy, as an overwhelming drunkenness. But no matter how much we would feel the indefinite of our fellow human, we still realize that as our indefinite isn’t everything, but it stays in connection with a source differing from it and infinite, likewise the richness of our fellow human, or of the community between us, it has a source differing from him, or from “us”. Otherwise, the loving community doesn’t last, it quickly exhausts its upholding spring. The love places “us” in connection with the infinite, only when this infinite is godlike, when it differs from our nature, namely when we are imparted with this infinite as a gift. In the community of love between me and another there is God present too, without this meaning that the love for another it anticipates the encounter with God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 270-271)

“Binswanger reckons that the infinite of the love it is an infinite of the universal nature and that the road towards encountering this absolute leads only through a concrete “you”. That’s why in his opinion there isn’t a road leading firstly to the Absolute as Person, for Binswanger doesn’t think at an Absolute as Person. We, the Christians believing in the Absolute-as-Person, we reckon that we can encounter this absolute “You” and only Him can and wants to direct our love towards the persons created in His image.” (Stăniloae 1992: 271)

“We can spend a longer time in the drunkenness of the love for God at the end of the clean prayer. This is explained firstly by the fact that the long prayer, with the forsaking of the narrow forms of the images and of the interests for the limited objects of the world, it has accustomed us to the: “wideness of the heart”, in order our heart to be able to comprise a joy that overflows our heart’s margins. Of course, on these culminant levels of the prayer the drunkenness of the love it doesn’t appear as a product of the preparation through prayer. The prayer leads to the mind’s “stopping” from any activity directed towards what is limited. But the drunkenness of the love for God it descends unexpectedly and suddenly from above. Of course, as we have seen before, we must specify here that besides this love as spiritual drunkenness, as overflowing joy, which expresses the total absorption of your face within another and of his face within you, there is also a calmer love, led by rational considerations, that grows up little by little. This is a preparatory condition for the other kind of love. This love too one gains it with the help of the grace he has received at Baptism, but without the own efforts to be excluded. The other love comes from above, and not as produced by the calm love, though still needs preparation through the calm love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 272)

“In our love for a fellow human we also distinguish this more prolonged stage and the overflowing joy of some moments as a gift from above. If we are engulfed sometimes by such a joy for a fellow of ours without us having prepared for it through a special love for him, this is due to the fact that our soul has been preparing, by and large, for love, through the prayer as loving road towards God and through the consequence following from there in loving any man. Anyway, the moment of ecstatic joy for a man, by not following to a special preparation for enlarging our heart by forsaking all images, concepts, and limited interests, it cannot last except much less than the drunkenness of the love for God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 272)

“A second motif making the ecstasy of the love for God to last longer, it is the fact that God Himself, being now in relation with us, and therefore close to us, He gives out nature a wideness capable of experiencing more steadfastly the love’s infinity. This infinity itself overwhelms our being so much than it seems that even our bones, which are the more resistant frame of our being, they are melted down. The spiritualized man no longer feels anything human in the love which he loves God with, but he feels exclusively the power of the godlike love poured within him, and he loves God with the same love which God loves him with.” (Stăniloae 1992: 272)

“The ecstasy of the love, namely, or the sentiment of the union with God, the sentiment that one forms together with God a “us” presently experienced, that ecstasy becomes longer, producing an increasingly happy joy and warmth of the soul. And the prolonged ecstasy makes also the intervals between one ecstasy and another to become increasingly fuller with the conscience of God’s actual presence, of His most calm love, intertwined with the mind’s work, so that the man’s life gains a continuity of uninterrupted love. This continuity was expressed by Saint Apostle Paul when he said: "If we went out of our mind, it is for God, and if we are with our mind whole, it is for you" (II Cor. 5: 13), understanding here also: "but for God too". (Stăniloae 1992: 273)

"Only in the daily calm love, manifested in deeds and thoughts, in the Christian love in a wider sense, we can experience more or less a love for all the people. My interests, my passions, my contradictory opinions, as voluntary manifestations, they no longer tear apart the unity of nature between me and my fellow humans. On each moment I accept judging the things from the point of view of my fellow human, by renouncing to my own point of view. By doing this successively, with diverse fellow human whom I come in contact with, it is being strengthened the sentiment of my union, actual and virtual, with anybody. From my part there is no longer any division between me and them; I no longer see any division there. If they still see some, I don't." (Stăniloae 1992: 274)

"My steadfast behavior in love strengthens the sentiment of my unity with my fellow humans into God. This reliefs on moments of ecstatic love, on moments of contemplating the subject of any fellow human in what he has conquering, indefinite, and mysterious, and the living of a consummate union. At their turn these moments strengthen my full of attention and abnegation behavior towards any fellow human. My love's energy for one of my fellow humans, grown up also through the will's effort, but especially on those moments of ecstatic contemplation, it is then easily directed towards other persons too. And I gain everywhere a steadfast disposition of love for anybody, a rejoicing of everybody, a conviction that in each of them I can discover the mystery of some charming deeps. I feel myself as virtually united with everybody and on each concrete occasion this virtual and indirect union it will easily become actual and direct. And the love which I manifest for my fellow human it as well fills them up with its energy, and that has as consequence the coming back to me of that love and its propagation towards other fellow humans of theirs. The energy of the love descended from above it has the tendency of becoming a universal bond between people and God." (Stăniloae 1992: 274-275)

"The love for the fellow human it grows up out of the love for God and especially by living the love for God as ecstasy on the culminant level of the prayer, and the love for God it becomes easier to us by getting us accustomed to the love for our fellow humans. Our soul when filled up with love he behaves likewise towards God and towards all people. Our soul feels as being partaker to the universal "us", as partner of God on each moment, and ready to become partner on each moment with one fellow human or another, in the bond of the actual or ecstatic love." (Stăniloae 1992: 274-275)

“The discovered through love unity of the nature allotted in subjects it is differently valued, and that’s why it fuels up a ceaseless joy and affection. Binswanger says: ““We” achieved through love it is a sign, a salute, a call, a claim, embrace of the human existence in itself, with a word: meeting” (p. 70). We would rather call the encounter out of love, as “retrieval”. This is the sentiment experience by two human being who have opened their souls in love. The human nature retrieves through love its unity previously divided because of the sin. From here, the sentiment of the one who loves, that he finds his own “home” in the beloved one, after he was wandering outside. For the “home” is the interiority, the ultimate headquarters, the resting hearth, we can say that the man, as long as he is alone, even in state of “interiority”, he isn’t truly “at home” in himself, namely he still isn’t in his true “interiority”.” (Stăniloae 1992: 275-276)

“The joy we have for encountering god in love, it shows us that here too is about retrieval. The human nature, by being the work of the creator love of God, it stays in a kinship and in an original closeness to Him. The union achieved through love gives us the sentiment of retrieval, of coming back “home”, of entering the resting, according to the word of Augustine: “Inquietum este cor nostrum donec requiescat in Te”. We have the sentiment that in the love for God as ecstasy, God has opened His heart as we have opened our heart to Him in order Him to enter our heart. On the other hand, the coming back to God, to His heart, it means entering His house. The “house” of God wants to comprise all the people, for in His heart can comprised everybody, and when I enter His heart, I must feel that I am there unified with all the ones from inside it. By coming back into God, we come back in the “Shelter-Person” of ours, in the supreme parental “house”, together with all the sons of the heavenly Father. Being in the same parental “house” with all the beloved ones, it is the highest and the purest structure of the love. We will see what this structure revealed to Moses like, in the image of the “tent” from above, according to which he made the tent, the temple, and the Church from below. In this “house”, which is God Himself, one can endlessly advance, without being him able to enter the God’s Being Himself, namely to enter the “altar” (the Holy of the Holies). But the ones who love one another they dwell in each other. Not only us enter God, but God too enter us. The drunkenness of the love for God, experienced at the end of the clean prayer, it fills me up with the impulse of loving all my fellow humans, of receiving all of them in my heart, which is in God’s heart, the impulse of feeling that I am with everybody inside the same “house” of God, which is the Church.” (Stăniloae 1992: 276-277)

“We must notice that the stopping of the mental activity, imposed by the descending within soul of the godlike work, it doesn’t make useless the whole mind’s endeavor from before of sharpening itself and of widening itself in ever thinner and more comprising understandings. This is for the exclusive work of God, inaugurate during the ecstasy moments from here and which will remain the only one in the future life, it is proportional to the state which the mind has reached with its effort at, namely it depends too on the purification of passions, without which the mind cannot become able to be elevated at the ecstatic love for God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 278)

“During the moments of the ecstatic love are opened, by becoming loving and smiling to our sight, the deeps of the beloved subject. This is a knowledge above knowledge, after our subject or our mind has gone outside itself. During these moments we are sinking in the loving indefinite of His heart, and we forget about ourselves. But tries retrieval of the nature, in the loving “me-you” unity, if fill up both of us with an infinite joy. The face of the beloved one, which is no longer actually only a material image, it seems to us as filling up everything and out of that face it irradiates a charm and a light filling us up with light, as well. Who hasn’t noticed that in ecstatic sight two human being are lightened in a smile? We would say that the experience characterizing this state it can be expressed by three things: love, a knowing by experience above the conceptual knowing, and the light which is the expression of the joy. The spiritual light always is the expression of the subject who love one another. But this light is projected on the material plan too, and it makes this plan to be luminous as well. The reciprocal unveiling of the subjects by being the work of the love, it is equivalent to their luminous or smiling radiation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 280)

“The mind’s exit out of itself couldn’t have been accomplished if God hadn’t got out of Himself too; neither could have been seen His deeps of mystery, as light. This fact is illustrated, analogically again, by the moment of the ecstatic love between two human beings. If the beloved being doesn’t open himself in a smile, but he remains closed, the unifier ecstasy of the love won’t be achieved. The lack of light on his face is a sign that he wants to remain closed, it is a sign that he doesn’t come out of himself, or he doesn’t receive the another in himself. At people the ecstasy is achieved through a reciprocal getting out of one towards another, a getting out that can also be called as ascension, as also the getting out to welcome a beloved one it can also be called descent, and the actual entering within another, when he opens himself too, it can be called as ascension. But god’s getting out of Himself, in order to receive the man, it is a kenotic descent. God must open Himself to us through love, in order us to be able to enter and to see Him. If God had remained closed in Himself, we couldn’t have entered at Him. At us, the closing into ourselves it is egotism, and that’s why it is an unnatural state. To God though, His descend to people isn’t necessary and the absence of this descent it isn’t egotism, for God has a life of Love and of light in the inter-Trinitarian reports. That’s why when a man gets out to welcome somebody through love, what he does isn’t only a gift but it is also an internal need for fulfillment. The descent of God to man, through love, it is a exclusively a gift. That's why the divine love for man it is something else than a necessity of the God's being; it is only a benevolent work of His. Consequently, our union with God in love it isn't a union imposed by His being; if it had been so, this would have lowered God on our level, in a pantheistic sense." (Stăniloae 1992: 282-283)

"By opening us the access towards His interior, God doesn't give us His being, but he gives us only His work. That's why we do not become gods according to the being. God descends to the man in two meanings, though simultaneously. Through one descent He places within us the work of the love for Him, and through another He opens Himself in front of our love, that love from Him, which is now searching for Him. Firstly, God love us with such a love that He makes us loving Him too. Firstly, God searches for our heart, in order us too, to try after to enter at Him. About the second descend of God from Himself Saint Gregory Palamas said: "Our mind gets out of itself and so it is filled up with God, and so the mind becomes above itself. And God, at His turn, he gets out of Himself and so He unites Himself with our mind, but He descends. He gets out as driven by love and by the abundance of His kindness, but no living His deep, not getting out of Himself, out of His transparency, and He unites Himself with us through than above mind union" (Word III, Triad I)." (Stăniloae 1992: 283-284)

"This descent having as effect the mind's kidnapping from the relations with the created things and out of the order of its natural activity, on the divine's transcendent plan, it isn't actually a descent, but it means attracting the seer inside the darkness that separates the divine transcendence from the order of the created things. It is a descent only for it is a benevolence for elevating in His bosom a created mind." (Stăniloae 1992: 284)

"By loving you, I am experiencing you beyond any feature specified in concepts. When the love stops, I remain with your features; when I am loving you, I am not seeing except the light from within you and not the shadows too. I will see your features when I start judging upon your features." (Stăniloae 1992: 293)

"On that moment when I encounter you as a whole, you are light to me. When this ecstatic relation ceases, I have remained with a few superficial bits of you, cast in the concepts' drawers. The smile that light two persons on the moment they look a one another with love, it is the joy of the nature to find itself again in its intimacy, overcoming the allotting in different hypostases, or just because of that, for only thus it can be the love manifested in the nature. It is the joy of the nature in one person for encountering itself in another person. It is the joy produced by the awareness about this encounter, or by the awareness about the unity in love, or of the unity reflected and enriched in two consciences. Any human creature living a normal existence it reflects a certain light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 294)

“Binswanger noticed that the reality of “us” achieved through love it has a certain organization at its turn, which the two subjects are aware of, or, in other terms, each subject experience the other subject as having a full of harmony richness, with the whole his indefinite. He called this organization or harmony as “structure” (Gestalt). For instance, in another manner it is organized the experience of the structure of “us” in love and otherwise it is the experience of the same “us” as simple association of interests, or as collision of contradictions, when we no longer experience a so-called unitary “us”, but a ‘me’ and a ‘you’, or a “me” against “you”.” (Stăniloae 1992: 297-298)

“John the Evangelist united the consideration of the Son as the Word, with the love characteristic, in everything, to God, and therefore shown also in the harmony amongst the created things. Behold how John the Evangelist strengthens, also by this name given to the Son, the teaching about God as a God of the love, a quality shown by the Son of God through His embodiment, through His sacrifice, and through His resurrection, all of these being deeds of untold love for people, this being shown also by the effect of the salvation, brought by Him, He referring to all the things, and to strengthening the harmony amongst all the things.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 37)

“The word expresses especially the love deeds, done by God to us, and then the word confesses also the love deeds done by a man towards the other people, deeds which, if lacking, the words won’t be really able to connect the people, namely the words no longer help people, in this case, to communicate their life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 38)

“The Father, by creating the people through the Son, for a loving relation, he doesn’t impose the love to the people forcedly, but the people’s love for Him is a free answer. And this means that the people can also refuse to love God as the Father and the Son Who created them, and after the people refusing the love which the people were created through, God showed them again a love going all the way to the crucifixion sacrifice, a sacrifice brought for the people by the Son of the Father, as the people’s Brother. And this refusal of the Son’s Word of love, uttered towards them, it is manifested by people in not using the love words given them by God-the Father and the Son, and also amongst the people themselves, or in using those words cunningly and in a liar mode, in their reciprocal relations. The words of love, communicated through the prophets by the embodied God-the Word, the people no longer reckon as coming from Him and, consequently, the people disregard the urge to use the words towards love, an urge placed in their nature through its unity, and they use liar and deceiving words. Thus, the sin as disregarding the God's life, it becomes also a weakening of the unity of their nature, and even an occasion of birth and developing amongst them and in the bosom of their nature, of reciprocally enmity impulses, due to the unloving words they say to one another. This unity's weakening and enmity impulse which is developed within the human nature, concretely live in the human persons, it has at its basis the egotism of the love for their self, egotism which is contrary to the people's nature." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 40-41)

"The Word and the Light have between them and they communicate the life, for the Word and the Light have between them the kindness and the love. The Word, as Son of God, He loves the Father and the Holy Ghost and, as such, He can show the love and the kindness towards people. The love and the kindness of a man are reflected on his face as light, for he is open to the others, for he gives himself them as a gift. The kindness depends on the will of the person of self-giving himself as a gift, as the light is too. That's why, the one who lives his true nature he is himself happy, by giving himself as light and as meaning to others. If the love and the kindness irradiate from the man as light, all the more the love and the kindness will irradiate from the embodied Son and the Word of God, becoming thus the communicated, the revealing, the illuminating, and the loving Word, accessible to the people. His love, seen as love also on His bodily face, it shows that the matter can become communication environment for the spiritual state, namely it can be transfigured by the spirit. Between matter and spirit isn't maintained an impassable opposition or separation. If the light is communicated through itself, and this communication is done out of love and kindness, then itself the conscious existence will have in itself the communicative kindness as a light, or as a luminous impulse produced and upheld by love. And Dionysius the Areopagite said about God that, through infinity, he is in a continuous possibility of outpouring His life, though this is activated outside only through will. The one who is united with God he also communicates himself and, therefore, he illuminates out of love, and he gives as a gift, to the one whom he communicates himself, life out of his own life. But the egotist doesn't communicate anything of himself to another, and that's why he isn't either light or life for another. The egotist is an existence petrified in itself, lacking any movement, namely a "dead" existence. As such, he doesn't communicate life to other and he left them in what they have, and this will happen also in those ones' case if they lock up in themselves, and if they don't receive anything from others. And this locking up, motionless in itself, it is contrary to the man's nature and even to the created angel. They can go down out of the communication of their life, through the deceiving desire of affirming only on themselves, trying to exceed their limitation." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 45-46)

"An endless love of a person for another person, it makes him going even to death for that person. Of such love is capable a mother for her child. In this is involved the feeling that her son is of an eternal value and that she, by receiving death for him, she will defeat the death. But the desire surety, that her son has this value and that she, by proving a love to death, she will reach the resurrection, that surety had been given by Christ. He showed us and he has given us the capacity of receiving the death and of defeating the death, and not only for one person, as a mother does for her son, but the capacity of dying for all the people, out of love, and the capacity of defeating the death received thus, through resurrection. This is for the surety of our resurrection, shown through Christ's resurrection, but also the power given us by Him as God through His nature common with our nature, it is a surety and it is a power helping us too, to impropriate His love for every fellow human of ours, and it gives us too, the power of going, through love, to death, for that person's salvation and, therefore, the power of defeating the death through the resurrection to a happy eternity. This is for Christ wants to have the joy of seeing the people too, as loving one another so much, so that to be able to die, at their turn, for one another. In this direction our heart urges us to grow up. And we are helped to grow up in this direction by the power of the Son of God Who has made Himself man and Who loves us so much that he received the death for us." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 152-153)

"The human person looks at his past with discontent. It is about the regret for the evil deed done to others, or for their manifested lack of love, a regret interwoven with a pain that do not quench even when we are about to die. Only by living the people, at least in the last moment of their life, their union with Christ, they gain the power to answer our regret with the whole their forgiveness, like Christ did. We reckon that only through this we will be healed, in the future life, of the torment of this regret. But the people cannot do this except by having an eternal live and by being in a full union with Christ and in a full impropriation of His love. This imposes to our being and to our rationality the need for the coming of the Son of God embodied out of love for us, showing us how much He forgives us for our wrongdoings against God, Christ being God made man and He received death in order to obtain from the Father forgiveness for us, and our eternal happiness, despite all our mistakes." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 153-154)

"Only through the positive tendencies, our rationality waits for and it understands Christ, as the One Who fulfills our nature, a fact that we cannot accomplish only through ourselves. This helplessness doesn't come to us from God Who created us, but it comes because of a willing disobedience of ours, or because of the sin of our refusal to be united with Him. Consequently, by refusing the love from God we won't love our neighbor either, because we choose our egotism. That's why, God, because He saw our egotism, He made Himself man and He love us to death, in order to give us an example of power for us to defeat our egotism. And we wait for Him and we receive Him for we are discontent with our egotism which can makes us joyful but only for a short while.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 154-155)

“Only the love gives meaning and value, and therefore light, to all the things. And there must be a supreme source of the love or of the light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 157)

“This perfect love in Three or amongst Three, it is the supreme Light or the source of the whole light or the meaning of the whole existence.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 185)

“The one who enlighten another, through communication, it is natural that he doesn’t do that except for he wants a loving communication with that person. Only the one who really loves me, he gives my existence a meaning, by filling my existence up with a complete joy. And the One Who is enlightened and wise by Himself, namely from ever and forever and ever, he naturally has with the created one, whom He communicates Himself, out of love, such a communion for eternity.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 193)

“Only the love determines Jesus Christ to be close to each human person, as light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 197)

“God is in Himself the Absolute of the free love, for He is the Trinity of Persons and, as such, he has nothing stranger to Him. He has everything within Himself, for He is the unlimited existence from Himself, and also for He is the interpersonal love in Himself. The Trinity-of-the-same-being it is shown in the love of each Person for each other Persons, love that is made perfect also through the communion between me and you, and with the third one, and through the joy of the third one for the love of each person for another person. This love is brought to us, by the embodied Son of God, by Self-giving Himself to us, through His body and blood, and Who has made through the sacrifice brought by Him to the Father, the love of the Holy Trinity to be accessible to us too, and working within us, in the most impressive and efficient form.” (Stăniloae 1995: 206)

“We are elevated into the love of the Holy Trinity, which the Trinity’s unity of being is shown in, by being helped by One from Trinity Who descended as man, to us. This One has been filled up, as man, with the love of the Persons of the Holy Trinity together, and He gradually has been communicating that love to us too, to the extent we have been capable of receiving that love, in order us to reach the supreme level of that love in the live to come, He has brought that love to us too, in order us to be able to love, at our turn, the Trinity’s Person, and in order us to love on one another, and Them, with the love which the Persons of the Holy Trinity love us with.” (Stăniloae 1995: 206)

“The love existing within universe and cherished as the most undeniable value, it shows that at the origin of the love there stays the love of the consummate communion amongst the supreme Persons, and it shows also that the universe it has been created in order to be brought, with its collaboration, towards the perfect love which all the things originate from.” (Stăniloae 1995: 208)

“Only the one whom I love, he receives to me new heights, when he loves another too, and when he is loved by others, but me too, I receive new spiritual dimension when I love others, according to the multiple situations and relations which the people reach in. By and large, the connection with any other person poses me new problems and asks me for new answers, and it actualized within me new possibilities and new feelings. And, in the love between me and another, not only I transcend on myself, towards him, but him too, towards me, even if I see only him and I don’t see myself too. He moves, at his turn, in multiple self-transcending, though he transcends, on himself, towards me, in a unique mode. Myself too, I transcends on myself in many ways, towards others, even if I transcend, on myself, in a unique mode, towards him. And the whole this transcendence, it has within, a thirst for infinite. A father love in a unique and absolute mode, each one of his children, but he transcends himself in another way, towards each one. Also, I wholly have the one who loves me, while I still feel him, with joy, as spiritually richer, when he increasingly transcends himself towards others.” (Stăniloae 1995: 102)

“We cannot cogitate that the supreme Subject makes, on Himself too, as object of His, as we do. This is for He is wholly directed towards another, in a love that, together with the love That One answers with, it makes That One too, only as Subject. That Another cannot be either Him an object, for He is live only as loving Subject in relation with Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 116)

“At the basis of the human being’s need for another human being, there stays, and its target is too, the love. The human being lives, as essential movement, the need to love and the need for being loved, no matter in how many forms that would be manifested. The need to love and for being loved is, on one hand, the need of a person for another person, for only a person can love, and one can expect love only from a person. And this need could never be quenched. This need is unlimited.” (Stăniloae 1995: 118)

“In God, the need for love is satisfied, from eternity, in a perfect manner, and in a reciprocal perfect Self-giving. God doesn’t love the people because he would need to find outside Himself a completion to His love; God love the people in a free pouring of His love and of internal His Self-giving towards other persons created on this purpose, persons who aren't partakers to God's eternal existence. The people, by loving, they feel the need for growing up in an endless love for one another. That's why, the people's love in in a continuous increasement movement, endlessly. The people will have the full love only from God, when they will have grown up in love, as much as possible, in the conditions of their life in the material universe. Then, the love shown by people and the love from God felt by people, that love will have reached the consummation, or the resting, a fact that won't mean its ceasing, but it will mean a continuous tasting of its fullness." (Stăniloae 1995: 118)

"God is the God of the love – and only such a God is a true God -, and He created the human being out of His love, so that nothing was more natural than Him to go all the way in this descent of His, for His union with the human beings and for their eternal happiness in this union of theirs with Him. In this is shown that the humanity has been created capable of becoming the humanity of the divine Subject, a humanity marked by the divine Subject, and He thought through humanity, He manifested His will through it, He felt through it, and He expressed His words through it. In this it is valued at maximum the quality of the human being as image of God, with all its faculties. The image is a projection in which the original is the more seen and present as the projection is cleaner. (...) The human being, as image of God, he participated to God as to the supreme good. And one never gets enough good and one never stops advancing further into good. But when, through will, the human being weakens his connection with the Son of God, the Son of God makes on Himself, as the supreme Good and the source of the whole good, and as the Subject of the humanity, a humanity aspiring and participating to an ever-fuller union with the Good, for the humanity never to fall again from good, once reached at the greatest union and likeness with the original. And within us, as persons differing from the embodied Word, the maximum participation to Good, and the maximum union with Him, it takes the form of a loving dialogue with Him and amongst us into Him. This is for the ones who are animated by good, they tend just by that towards the unconfounded union amongst themselves." (Stăniloae 1995: 169)

"In Christ's humanity is imprinted a godlike love that is accessible to us too, a love for us, and also, by remaining the Son of the Father in this quality of His as man, He has remained too, in this quality, in the eternal love towards the Father, which He imprinted His humanity with, and that made that the love of the Father, from eternity, for Christ, to be also a love for Christ in his quality as man. This is for the Father to love all of us who are loved by His Son, as One Who has made Himself our Brother, and in order all of us to love the His Father as our Father. This is for the embodied Son, by gaining us to love Him, through the love He shows us, He gains also our love for His Father, for it is nourished by the love He has for His Father.” (Stăniloae 1995: 186)

“In the embodied Son Who loves us, we see His Father Who loves Him from ever, and Who loves us too, and Who, out of His desire for gaining our love too, He has sent His Son to gain us through His love as man, in order us to love the Father too, and to gain our love for Christ too, as One Who has made Himself as our Brother.” (Stăniloae 1995: 186)

“The Christ’s love for His Father, it doesn’t annul the specifically human mode of the love of the embodied Son for the Father, neither the human mode which we live the Father into His Son in, and according to which the Father loves us too. This is for the Son and the Father want us to be human being forever, and They love us in this quality of ours. The Son Himself has descended, for us, to this quality of ours, but thus He has elevated us to His quality as beloved Son, from eternity, by the Father, and at His quality as loving His Father. The Son and the Father show they joy for loving us in our quality as human beings, but in an absolute degree, and They want us too, to love Them in our quality as human beings, but as on Absolute. We keep the human mode of the love and the Son impropriates this human mode to His love for His Father, and the Father rejoices for our human love for Him, a love impropriated by His Son, and the Father loves us too, as He loves on His Son.” (Stăniloae 1995: 187)

“But like I feel, in relation with others, the desire of existing eternally, for I to be as much as possible accomplished through them, likewise feel others, in their will of having me endlessly as you and as him, cherished by them, in their desire that I to be eternal. I feel that, if they lose me, they will fall in an irremediable pain. And I feel that, if I do not have them forever, I will fall in an irremediable sadness and in an incurable reduction. I live a reserve of eternal and imperishable love in them, for me, as they feel within me a reserve of eternal and always new love for them, by being I lived like you and like him by them. Although, this feeling of their love for me and of my love for them, thirsty for being eternal, it is united also with the sentiment of the impossibility of eternally being with one another, as we wish, and of the impossibility of giving eternity to one another, as we are thirsty for. But this shows the need I live for a Me Who can give us the comforting reassuring of being with Him and with one another for eternity. This value of yours and of each him close to me, and my value for any close him, it shows also the uniqueness of each person, even if it has, in the same time, the role of me and of you and of him. None of them can be replaced by any other. And no one will be able to rejoice of each one of others, if he isn’t unique and differing from any other one.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 68)

“The human being’s freedom in fulfilling the responsibility towards God, from the part of God made man (Christ) or from other people, it determines the human being to fulfill his responsibility too, in full freedom. Neither God nor my fellow human place me in an inferior situation, by asking me to fulfill my responsibility, when they fulfill theirs, but God has given me, anticipatedly, the example of this fulfillment, and my fellow human gives it me, if not anticipatedly, almost sure consecutively, and that makes me feel how much they respect my freedom in fulfilling their responsibility for me. At the basis of fulfilling the responsibility, and at the basis of the joy caused by this fulfilling, there is, actually, the love. And through this fulfilling, it is the love strengthened. And in love, there is freedom.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 82)

“Each person is conveyed his uniqueness through the uniqueness of his body and soul, in different life circumstances. The warmth of a special connection is conveyed to the child through his parent’s special communion, they being united in their love for their child.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 86)

“Our death has been defeated by Christ through His death, for in His death was working the supreme love of the Son of God for us: His supreme love, as man, towards the Father, and His supreme love as God Who has made Himself man for us. The life of the resurrection, which comes of us out of that, it is the live of our consummate communication with God and therefore of the most vivid and endless communication of His with us and of our communication with Him. And this is also the most real mode we known God. This is for only in this dialogue with somebody you really know that one. And the most real direct dialogue is the dialogue of the love.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 19)

“The Creator Conscience must be a Person. And if the Creator Conscience is consummate, the reason why He created the world must correspond to His consummation, consequently that reason must be a totally irreproachable reason, and not a caprice, not a desire of having fun because of a boredom He would have wanted to escape, not a passing whim trying to get out of monotony. And the most irreproachable reason cannot be other than the love. Within the Creator Being there must be a previous love, from ever, for a conscious joy as it is the joy produced by love, couldn’t have come from exterior, by totally changing the Creator Being’s life and showing Him as submitted to the change, namely to imperfection, or to the thirst for perfection, a perfection that we couldn’t find within world. But there is no love where there is only one person. Even if a lone person is able to love, that person cannot love except another person.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

“The Christian faith connects tightly the creation to the Holy Trinity. The Christian faith teaches us that God created the world for He is a loving Father Who has a Son from eternity. For, by being a loving Father, He wanted to extend His love upon other conscious persons too. But He doesn’t bring these conscious persons to existence by giving them birth out of Himself, because this would have relativized the value of His unique Son, and the love for Him, which the love for creatures to be nourished from. The Father's love for the Son, it is an absolute love, for the Son is unique. Only through this love it can be explained the love directed towards other conscious beings, who do not belong, though, to the Father's own being." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

"For all the created conscious beings are endowed with freedom, in order to be able to freely answer the Creator's love, they have exited out the communication with Him and by that they have fallen in a rather dead than alive existence, or into an existence reduced to extreme. The Father went even further in His love and He made His immortal and of-the-same-being with Him Son, as man, in order This One to overcome the humanity's death by assuming it within Himself, and through His connection with the people to get rid the people too, from death, and even to elevate the people to the quality as sons, equal to Him in humanity." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24-25)

"One's rejoicing of Another, if hadn't been communicated to a Third One Who is connected to both of Them, it would have been a locked-up joy. Not communicating the joy and the love, it would have been accompanied by a fear of not diminishing the love for One Another, by communicating it to a Third One. This fear is manifested amongst people. The beloved one fears that the one who loves him will love him less, if that one communicates his love to a third one too. Not communicating the love to a third one, it means that each one of the two fears that the other one has too much intimacy with a third one, namely a too much openness of one of them to a third one. Here occurs the jealousy phenomenon. But this occurs only in the non-full love of each of them." (Stăniloae 1995: 17)

"The human persons do not communicate, to one another, only their content and the content of the universe as thought by them, but they also influence on one another, by uniting increasingly more, through words, and in nature they make possible, through words, the coworking in together discovering the energies hidden within nature, in combining those energies in new modes, towards an ampler usage. One can see in this that not only the human being is, as intellectual and biological unit, in unitary and multiple movement, but also the nature is a whole maintained as such, through a unitary and multiple movement of its components. In this too, it is shown the dynamic character, never reaching the end, of the human rationality, as also the fact that the whole universe is in movement, but its components remain the same, and in the same rational harmony. In this is reflected the fact itself that, the Word Himself Whom the universe has been created through, and Whom the universe is being maintained in the same harmonious whole through, He upholds the unitary and multiple movement in the universe's parts, through His work manifested in countless works.

And He also upholds a movement of knowing and organizing the universe's forces, corresponding to those works. He upholds this not only for He is Word or supreme creator Rationality, but also as Son of the Father Who wants to gather, increasingly more, the whole Creation, in His filial feeling towards the Father, by tying the universe, through the conscious persons, to God and through love. The unitary rationality of the universe makes possible the love amongst people and it gives everybody's unity with God and amongst themselves, the love's joyfulness." (Stăniloae 1995: 49)

"The universe's origin and target, it isn't an impersonal essence out of which the universe would have come and within which all the things will melt down meaninglessly, or which would uphold by this a rigid unity united with the death, but the universe's origin and target is a loving Father-Person. The whole existence has its origin in a loving Father and it tends towards union, through the human beings, with the Father, in the love's joyfulness, but without merging within the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 49)

"The people can, by their free thinking and actions, to discover and to combine, through coworking, the universe's movements which the universe's energies are manifested within, or these energies themselves, in other and other forms. But the people are often tempted by that, to pull the universe's energies out of their harmony, or to use the universe's energies against one another, and that has an unfavorable effect upon nature and upon people's lives connected to nature. The people do that relatedly to promoting within themselves some inferior, unilateral movements, some purely biological and producing of pleasures movements, by untying those movements from their spiritual life, and that impedes the love amongst themselves and also their love for God. Thus, instead of setting in harmonious work, through spirit, the nature's physical powers, and the biological organism's powers, by keeping the nature in its harmony that promotes health for people and the healthy biological organism, and by being overwhelmed by the human creator spirit, to highlight a greater light in universe and an irradiation of loving-power at distance, of the persons, it brings disorder within nature's forces and the human biological organism's forces and, by that, it brings a decomposition of their harmony, and that brings the death of the biological wholes of the human persons. Thus, the harmonious unity of the universe and of the human wholes, it gives room to disorder. The unifier rationality gives room to a false rationality of the decomposition, which some individuals justify their egotistic impulses through. This is a rationality emptied of love, of emptied of the harmony of the true rationality; it is a rationality making the people to reckon about themselves as not being brought to existence by a loving God, in order they to be united with the Son, and in order they love the Father together with the Son, but they see themselves as produced by an essence which they cannot feel filial love for, as they neither can feel love for their fellow humans who are brought to existence towards death, by the same essence.” (Stăniloae 1995: 49-50)

“The love is a freedom’s deed and it is addressed to freedom.” (Stăniloae 1995: 60)

“By gathering us within Himself, Christ unites us within Himself with all the human being created through Him and who accepted to be gathered again within Him, and he fills us up with His godlike eternity, and eternity lived by His humanity and bearing the traces of His temporality, and He makes us feel ourselves even closer to Him. He will reunite us, thus, in Himself, forever, with Him and amongst us, in a universal love, but which each person brings his/her personal characteristics in, and which the peoples bring in, their specificity too.” (Stăniloae 1995: 66)

“Thereby, itself the love God, like a love to the end, it must approve the sufferance of the man like a condition of his rebirth, or, because he cannot provide it, in order to pass himself through it, the embodiment of the Son of God it wasn’t intended only to give Him the legal quality to represent the people into the removal of a juridical conflict between them and God, but it was itself the beginning of the communion with the people. It wasn’t only a passing means in the service of God’s love, but it was the supreme showing of the love itself. Through it, God placed Him into the role of the Subject of the communion with the people. But, in order they to be able to place themselves in this report, at His calling, there must be produced their fundamental shaking through the sacrifice which will have to reestablish the moral order’s prestige in their conscience.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Who experiences the love of Jesus, he is unable not to love Him. But the love of Jesus is present together with His authority, and this makes us to lean upon Him with the whole confidence. The love of Jesus is a love which went to death for us. At our turn, our love for Him is capable to go to death for Him. Jesus has come to conquer us, to move us through the power of His love. That’s why it is told in the Apocalypse that Jesus is the King-Lamb, that He reigns not through violence, but through gentleness and through His sacrifice. This thing seems a paradox to us, because we know that the lamb is humble and disregarded; and, though, the Lamb is a king in Christianity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The power which we notice or which we of increase this closeness though, it is the love. The love helps us, consequently, to feel responsible for the sin of our fellow human, to consider that sin like being ours. This power unveils us our solidarity with the fellow humans and it produces a certain identification of our self to the one another, responsible for committing the sin. Love notifies, after it partially produces and increases, the intimacy, because where the love is, the closeness is so great that there exists a mysterious identification and substitution of the selves in what regards the responsibility. The prerequisite condition for notifying or for producing this closeness to the identification through love it is, in any case, the participation at the human nature. The simple presence like man among people it is, for a sensibility sharpened through love, the sufficient reason to feel the own guilt for the sins of the others.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But, because of His love, through maximum closeness which He placed Himself in, towards the intimacy of the human nature, it absorbed all the sin upon Him, His identification to the center of the humanity it must attract upon Him the entire reaction of the divine opposition towards sin. For Jesus really felt all the human sin upon Him, and for He really substituted all humane selves into the bearing of the sin, He must felt Himself as substituting all the people in front of the divine reaction. If the possibility of really assuming the responsibility for the others it is the expression of a divine order, indicating a certain ethical communication hidden among the selves, then this order couldn’t be sustained in all its gravity and seriousness but only if it is rounded by the correspondent conclusion which is pulled out by God, letting the sufferance to descend upon the One Who took the responsibility. All the expiatory sufferance for sin, of the mankind, it must concentrate upon Jesus Christ. Through the same sensibility of the maximum love, through which He feels the responsibility for the entire human sin, He feels also the expiatory “punishment” for it. Into the sensitiveness of His limitless love, through which He attracts upon Him the entire human sin, so, in that sensitiveness is comprised the end the dreadful sufferance which melts down this sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One could object that, if the world and the man are created as creatures, they cannot be except the work of the love of God, and then the love cannot explain the existence of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, from ever, from the being of the Father. But the Son and the Holy Ghost do not come to existence after the Father, but They exist from ever together, but also the Son is born from the Father and the Ghost proceeds, eternally, from the Father. They cannot be except together, from ever. The love didn’t exist before Them, neither Them existed before the love. They are the eternal structure of the love. The love is one with the existence. Otherwise, how could have been like the love, everywhere? The love is the eternal mystery of the consummate existence. It turns out that God is a common being in a Trinity of Persons, and that makes possible that Him to create, out of love, a world from nothing, and God to place the world in the service of human persons, at their turn created out of nothing, for a loving communion amongst themselves, and they loving God. The creation out of nothing it shows also the God's almightiness, but, by this too, it is explained also the possibility of the human creatures to manifest themselves against God, and to be in enmity amongst themselves, but without being the people and the world abolished by God because he would have feared them." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 10-11)

Luminous Light

“The matter itself of the bodies and of the things in its present form, it is actually material light. Their material light will be penetrated and overwhelmed at that moment, by the immaterial, uncreated light, making the individual separations to be overwhelmed and to lose their sharpness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 264)

(At the transfiguration of the world, E. l. t.’s n.) “The whole that light which will fill up the world and which will overwhelm the world, it will irradiate out of the Christ’s body. The ocean of that light as godlike light, it will overwhelm the entire creation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 264)

“Saint Simeon the New Theologian reckons that even the sun and the stars will be overwhelmed together with all the forms of the world - but not abolished – by Christ, the Son of the Righteousness, by the light irradiating out of His body. This is for that light won’t transform only the world in a luminous reality, but it will be the world’s permanent content. The light of the face of Christ, especially, as the light of That Person Who, as consummate God, he has shown Himself as consummate man, that light will overwhelm all the lights from outside. Right from the human person it comes out the whole light that illuminates the things from around with a meaning, and it gives the existence of the close persons an increase meaning. Out of the Christ’s human face, which is the environment the understanding and the endless kindness of the divine Person irradiates through, it will be spread upon all things and upon everybody who have opened their heart to see and to feel, the light that will overwhelm all things, or it will unveil the full meanings of the existence.” (Stăniloae 1997: 264)

“The day that Sun will appear on, it will be the “Lord’s Day” by excellence, the day of the undying light. Himself will be that day, for He is its Light. All the things will walk Christ’s light (Apoc. 21: 24). The material sun itself will be covered by the brightness of the Master (Mt. 24: 29), like the seen things are fading in front of the sun and they can no longer be seen. The stars themselves will be covered too (Isa. 24: 4); they will be winded up like a scroll book, namely they will give room to the Maker’s brightness. And only Him will be day and God concomitantly, Him Who is now invisible to everybody’s eyes. He Who dwells in the unapproachable light (1 Tim. 6: 16), He will reveal Himself on that moment, to everybody, as He is, and He will overwhelm all things with His own light and He will become for His saints “the day of the eternal, undying, and endless joy”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 265-266)

“The resurrected bodies will be of light, but not without an internal structure, and not as some inconsistent manifestations. If the resurrected body had been a simple luminous inconsistent manifestation, to must have been the renewed world. But this isn’t the Christian teaching. The world will be luminous, but it will have a pneumatized structural richness of the present world. The present world is a light at its turn, as its name (lumen) it shows it too. But what complex is this light like, and of what various and multiple forms doesn't the present world burst out as a unity like! Likewise, in the future age, the complex luminous structure of this world won't be dissolved, but it will be increased at maximum through the Ghost's light." (Stăniloae 1997: 279)

"There must be harmonized the apparent contradiction between the insistent recommendation of the Holy Fathers not to consider as godlike any apparition of light, with the other affirmation that the grace of God fills our soul up with light (Diadochus, The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 355). The apparitions which we must look at with mistrust are the defined "forms", the defined images, be it even luminous; as such can be considered even the light bearing the features of the physical world, or closed between some margins. But the light that fills the mind up and which overflows from the mind over all things, light which we realize about that it has a spiritual character, or evidence, of joy, of universal holyday, it no longer is a defined shape, an idol, but it is rather a "feeling" and an "understanding" spread within the whole our being (a mental "felling" as it was called by: Diadochus, Isaac the Syrian, Simeon the New Theologian, Gregory Palamas), produced not by a subjective state but by the presence or by the experience of the godlike presence." (Stăniloae 1992: 295)

"The Holy Scriptures sees God in Himself, as the Self-standing light, namely without beginning and without end, but also as the source of the light. But, especially in the Old Testament, God is seen in some texts as the One Who creates the light in the world. The physical light irradiates especially from the sun, as from the burning star, or as a thinned matter spread on the earth's side directed towards the sun, and in the people's sight, who are souls dressed up in bodies. But this light makes possible that the man's rationality, as conscious light, to notice the rational organization of the physical nature's components, the harmony amongst them, so, as spiritual light. Thus, the physical light too, it is made for the use of the man's spiritual sight, as the second level of the light. And both of them are created." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 5)

"The man sees in the light of the physical universe, that each thing has a rationality according to its measure and fitted to him. The man sees the air and the water in their physical componse, given for the benefit of the man's life, he sees the herbs provided by the soil and the trees with their fruits, and he sees any kind of animal, fish, and bird, again being diversely beneficial to him. But the man can as well bring his own contribution, in order to make beneficial, to himself, the rationalities of certain parts of the nature." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 6)

“If the nature’s noticed light and the man’s noticeable light hadn’t been coming from the superior source of light, they would have been submitted to a law, which, it should have been seen as the supreme light. But Who has created that light? Because of not having that light a freedom in itself, it should be submitted to a free superior existence. And, in the last analysis, there must be a free and supreme existence, out of which comes any dependent light and which is the supreme target of all things. The light which the world’s noticeable light comes from, the world’s light being created for the man’s noticeable light, it must have another motif for producing these two lights than that of a necessity. For, if that had been the case, that light too, it would have ought to be submitted to a superior existence. This motif cannot be except the love of that superior light for the man brought to existence by it. That superior light showed - by the fact that it created the man not only as rationality but also as rationality dressed un in a body and, as such, needing also a material nature – that wanted not only to give birth to a spiritual world but a material world too, but a material world capable of being filled up with the light of the human spirit and, through man, even to be filled up with a superior light. The Psalmist directly affirmed that the world’s light comes directly from God: “Yours is the day and Yours is the night. You created the light and the sun” (Ps. 73: 17185). This shows that the supreme light has in it also the love. This is for that supreme light wouldn’t have created human persons who to know through their rationality the rational light of the world, if hadn’t had the love which it wants to elevate the people through, through the world’s physical light, to knowing Him as Light. It wouldn’t have done that without His love for them and without instilling them, in the same time, through the light He shared them, their love for Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 6-7)

“God, by giving the man the will of disposing himself of the mode of his relation with God, He made the man’s happiness dependent on how the man uses his nature, and his will in accordance with the God’s will. The man cannot be happy except by opening himself, by his own will, to the God’s will, for God doesn’t want anything else but to communicate His life, through love, to the man, and He want this for the man’s good. This is for the good cannot be anything else except the Self-giving of the One Who has and gives by nature, to the one who needs Him as source of the life. That’s why, in all the Orthodox ascetic literature, as a condition of the eternal happiness of the man through the communion with God as source of the life, the man is asked for “cutting off his will”, and for fulfilling the will of God, and that means putting the man’s will in accordance to the will of God Who doesn’t want else but to give the man increasingly more life, out of His life. In order to help the man to conform himself to His will, the Son has made Himself man in Christ, in order to give the man - through the communion with Him according to the assumed nature and through the model of His life as man - power to accomplish this conformity. This fact had been accomplished into Christ. Christ has shown the man's way to the eternal happiness, and He has given the man power to advance in his life on earth on the way to that eternal life. Christ is, thus, the full light of the man, a light showing not only the target which the man has been created for, but giving the man also the power to advance towards that target." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 12-13)

185 In KJB we have: Psalm 74: 16. (E. l. t.’s n.)

"The full Light cannot be except a Light without beginning; the full Light cannot be except the existence of a being without a beginning, of a love communicated amongst Three Persons." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 185)

"The Perfect Light, explaining and giving, creator and completing light, to all the existence degrees, it cannot be except the supreme or godlike existence in Three Persons or in Three Shines." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 185-186)

"The human person is, thus, a spreader of light and a searcher for light and a receiver of light. The human person spreads the light and he aspires for increasingly more luminous light. The light the human person receives it consciously, from other persons and from diverse things, he spreads it, at his turn, to other persons." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 189)

"The continuous searching for and receiving and communicating of the light, it shows that the person too, he is in the same time an endless mystery wanting to be known by himself and wanting to make known his mystery, as much as he can. The light comes to him from all quarters and, so, he searches for the light in all directions, but he also spreads the light in all directions, consciously, as an own light, adapted to his person. This means that the human person is, by himself, luminous light and searcher for light endlessly, and that's why the human person is a mystery too. He wants to enlighten on itself and to enlighten all the things through himself, as luminous light." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 189-190)

"All the things are destined to be luminous light for the human person, in order that, by gathering their light into his own light, to spread his light and their light, as light for everybody, without ever ceasing this work." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 190)

"The godlike light which the ones who believed in Christ will be dressed up in, fully in the future life, it is the love, the meaning, the happiness of the full communion of everybody with the Holy Trinity and amongst themselves. But the light which they will be dressed up with it will increase not only the communion amongst them but also their mystery, since they will have within them the Holy Trinity, the infinite light and mystery. We must specify here that between the light and the mystery of the persons who have become dwelling places of the Holy Trinity, there is no opposition and there is no opposition too, between the light and the mystery of the divine Persons. The light itself is within Them a mystery, through its endless depth and the mystery itself is within them an endless light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 200)

“The effect of His love upon us, it has been shown by Christ in His resurrection, which He will make us partakers to resurrection through. That’s why, even by death, we cross not into the darkness of the nothingness but into the full light of the eternal life. This is expressed by Christians when they ignite the candle when a man dies. This is expressed by all the churchly religious services done in the ambience of the lit candles. All of us are luminous light through the resurrection of Christ, and all of us live with the hope for being endless lights in union with the resurrected Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 200)

“From God comes to us the light of the understanding of God as the source of the life, says Saint Simeon. God isn’t a passive object of our understanding. He is the origin of the light, for he is the conscious and free Creator of our existence and of the world. And the existence itself is a light, made for the man in order him to know the light and in order the man to know God. God is the supreme light for He isn’t lightened up by anybody else.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 217)

Mercy

“Christ liberates the souls from hell, for His soul irradiates the power of the Holy Ghost consequently to sacrificing His body, or to the total surrender to God. The power Christ manifested in hell is not totally untied from His sacrifice, neither from His body, though Christ didn’t descend to hell without suffering the hopeless torments of the souls from there, because otherwise He would have been unable to save them. And in His sufferance on the cross it was involved also a compassion for the people – this compassion remaining to the end of the world – Christ was able to have a compassionate sufferance for those souls even in hell. But this compassionate sufferance is, in the same time, a savior power. Christ is everywhere and at any time accompanied by His mercy. Let’s ask for His mercy, therefore, all the time. But because of having His mercy also as man, His mercy cannot lack a tint of sufferance too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 71)

“After Adam’s sin, all the people were hiding themselves from God. That’s why came the Son of God, into body, at them, out of mercy. But He showed His mercy on everybody, for otherwise He wouldn’t have come, into body, at them. But, even now, not all the people open themselves to Him. But in the frame of His mercy, that means coming into body at the people and offering them the godlike grace, it is exercised His justice too, and that’s why the ones who do not accept His mercy they won’t be saved. In this consists His justice. And amongst the ones who open themselves to his mercy, not all of them do that on a due time, but some of them do that late. But the last ones they are often helped by a greater repentance. That’s why Christ helps them too, with His godlike grace. Thus, upon all of the ones who are saved are exercised both Christ’s justice and mercy.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 117)

Mind / Rationality

“The divine Rationality has a hypostatic, personal character, and it is always directed towards other hypostases, like the human rationality is directed too. But this doesn’t exclude the rationality to have a meaning of usia (being) common to several persons. It is life and it is meaning and it is inter-hypostatical relating in the same time. The “Word” of the Saint Evangelist John was “life and light”. As life and power. And the meaning isn’t separated from life, neither the life from the meaning. Any real unity is a unity of life or of power, having in it a meaning and a relationing to another unity of life and meaning. The rationality as usia it always subsists in the form of some persons in reciprocal relationship. The Holy Fathers maintain, through this meaning, of Word, of the Rationality, the character of Person of the presence of the Logos into creation, by following the way of the Saint Paul and of Saint John. Through this, the rationalities of the Logos are totally different from the “Platonic-Philo-nic” ideas.” (Stăniloae 2006, 15)

“The reality necessarily attracts the mind towards itself and, through mind, it attracts the being himself of the one who contemplates its image or who hears its word, or its description.” (Stăniloae 1997: 235)

“The connection between rationality and word we know it from a long time from the Greek philosophers and from the Eastern Church Fathers, to whom logos means both rationality and word. As the Holy Fathers, at Ebner, the connection between rationality and Word it is all-comprising: the word is the rationality’s expression and by its purpose o maintaining the communication the word is the expression of the relation of me with you. But through this it has been highlighted a new meaning of the rationality, corresponding to this aspect of the word: the rationality isn’t only a organ searching for meanings, but it is also searching for communion which, actually, it comprises in it the true meaning itself of the existence. The rationality corresponds, in both senses, to the word; the rationality is the entire word. And of course, between the two meanings there is a close connection. The rational creature searches for meanings in order to communicate those meanings; in communication the creature’s existence it finds its supreme meaning. The meanings interpret the communion, and the communion is done out of the meanings’ ambience. The Eighth Day will be the day of the undying light, for it will be the day of the light of the endless meanings maintained by the endless communion; the hell, a contrary, it will be the place of the eternal darkness of the lack of any meaning, because of being the place of the lack of any communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 307-308)

“The godlike work that sows within us the need for word as answer to His appeal, the supreme Rationality Who endowed us with rationality in order us to be able to speak meaningfully, in order Him to restore in man the word and the rationality, he has made Himself man Who meaningfully answer all the God's and people's appeals, in order Him to be a role-model to His brothers into humanity, in order they help one another too, through their meaningful word and deeds, and to become full and true human beings. But the Word and the Rationality by being Person, he is also a source of deeds, and therefore He makes the man source of righteous deeds, through which the man develops himself as it is due and he sensitizes other people's humanity, through the love he shows them. Only thus their subject becomes a true man, and also the one whom they address to. The Son of God, by making Himself man, he has also made Himself direct source of loving deeds and of transmuting of knowledge words on our level, by proving Himself as the true man and forever sensitizing the other people humanity." (Stăniloae 1997: 308-309)

"The Church Fathers, when speaking about the "mind's feeling", they affirm a mind's direct contact with the spiritual reality of God, and not a simply knowing Him from distance. This is analogue to "understanding" a person whom you are in contact with (see Saint Simeon the New Theologian, The Romanian Philokalia, vol. VI, p. 185). Even the word shows us as being, since the beginning, in a connection with God, ontologically, through a power of His and through the nature which he has been given with. The spirituality makes us aware of this connection." (Stăniloae 1992: 21)

"The Holy Fathers discern between mind (νοῦς) and rationality (λόγος). The rationality is the faculty cogitating at the things and comprising them in diverse concepts, at their turn called as rationalities (λόγοι) for the fact that they can be the cogitation's object. The mind is the faculty cogitating at contents without delimitating them in concepts. The rationality emanates out of the mind, like the divine Logos is always being born out of the Father, Who is the prime Mind (νοῦς). Therefore, like the divine mind is the principle of all things, likewise the mind from within man it is the ultimate principle of all things from within him, and therefore of the rationality too. The mind is therefore the basis of the human subject, who is beyond all the delimited contents, beyond the rationality catching them in concepts. The mind is the undefined basis of the subject who uses his rationality too. The mind cannot be noticed by the rationality through any concept, because of being beyond rationality and beyond any concept. We must leave all concepts and we must ascend above the rationality that forms concepts, in order to notice the indefinable basis of our subject. Only the mind can cogitates at itself, but the mind must remove the things and the concepts, which, through the mind's determinative (rational) cogitation have been placed between mind and the mind's cogitation at itself. While the mind sees itself as in a mirror (in order not to be doubled), the images and the concepts, on the opposite, they will cover this mirror like with a wall that must be crossed through with much toil, in order to penetrate within heart, or within the own being." (Stăniloae 1992: 239)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor called at his turn the mind as subject, and he called the acts starting from the mind as accidents (G.P. 90, 332). And N. Lossky says: “By being the most personal part of the man, the constitutive principle of the human nature and of the freedom, the mind (vous) it corresponds the most in the human nature to the person. One can say that the mind is the headquarters of the person, of the human hypostasis, containing in it the nature’s ensemble: ghost, soul, and body” (quoted work, p. 198).” (Stăniloae 1992: 239)

“Both out of the human mind’s character, as image of the divine Mind, and out of the object’s definition as realities cogitated by the mind, it comes that God too is Subject, namely Subject in the highest meaning of the word. This is for by ascertaining us the things, though they are objects to us they still aren’t totally such – in the sense that we neither fully know all of them nor we created them by knowing them, and they cannot exist by themselves since they do not exist for themselves – we deduce that there must be a supreme Subject Who the things depend absolutely on, and He know the thing and He creates the things, and the things are by no means take out from under His power. This Subject Who has all the God’s attributes, He is the only one existing absolutely by Himself, and He is the sole basis (substance) in the full meaning of the word, while all the others are created and are phenomena and accidents in report with Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 239-240)

“The human rationality cannot be understood except as rationality searching for the meaning or for the light of the existence, especially of the human being and of the history. But the human being cannot see the meaning and the light except in its satisfaction. And the satisfaction cannot come to the human being except into the endless love of other persons. But the human persons cannot be eternal except into the union with the divine Person Who has made Himself man, namely in union with Christ. That’s why was natural that that Person to defeat the death through His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 147)

“The human rationality waits for Christ and it considers Him, once He has arrived, as fulfiller of the human being, by the fact that the man feels, on one hand, the need for loving another man and to be loved by another man in an unlimited manner, but, on the other hand, he sees that no man has in himself the limitlessness which to correspond to his need for limitless love. So, it was necessary to appear a man Who to be, in the same time, Son of God too, in order to love the man in an unlimited degree, but still as a man and as a fellow human. Thus, our love for Christ, and His love for us as our fellow human, but also as God, it can be accomplished also by the people Who Christ unites with, and whom Christ dresses them up with His value and with His power, according to Matthew (25: 32-40).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 150-151)

“The things’ rationalities are discovered by the human being through their common rationality, a knower rationality. The things are created in order to be perceived by the people’s rationality, that has the capacity of understanding the things’ rationalities. This shows that the things’ rationalities are made for the human being’s rationality, and for being possible to unite the people in their knowledge, the people being spiritually enriched by that, and also by the what each human being brings to their understanding. The human being wouldn’t have been able to discover and to express the things’ rationalities in their great variety, if he hadn’t used the things in an increasingly complex and creative mode, and if he had used the things without the collaboration with other human beings and without communicating to one another, on the other hand, by using constantly enriched words, the way they understood the things.” (Stăniloae 1995: 126)

“The human being can use the rationalities from universe also in another mode. And in this case too, he may reckon that he uses them according to his rationality, as they have been given him by God. Or, in his striving to discover the real rationalities of the things, through his rationality, he can use those rationality on diverse levels, and their good use can find diverse modes. In this is shown the human being’s capacity of own contribution. God, by creating the things with His rationalities and by creating the man with his rationality in order to know the things’ rationalities and to discover Him through them, He endowed the man with the freedom of using the things in diverse modes. But in this can be manifested also a discrepancy between the rationalities of God referring to things and the shapes taken by these rationalities which are incorporate into things, in their use by the human being, or in the human being’s rationality as thought by God, and the shape taken by its image, within the human being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 128)

“God has given the man this freedom or this decision position in using His rationalities. Saint Maximos the Confessor said that the “rationalities” are thought by God from ever, but the “modes” which the rationalities are used in, they depend on the human beings. But these modes, even when they differ from the modes which are according to their rationalities, they still do not exit the frame of their rationalities. The human being remains a human being, even when he doesn’t develop as the human being wanted by God, through the rationality given to him. In the last case, the human being no longer transcends, really and positively, towards being developed according to the positive virtuality of his rationality, and of the things’ rationalities, as God wanted him from ever and ever, to be actualized. But the human being still remains in a dependence on the divine transcendence. This is a crooked actualization of the human being, which he doesn't develop the things' rationalities through, according to the virtuality included in the things." (Stăniloae 1995: 128)

"The Creation has been brought to existence as a harmonious whole, upheld thus by a unitary rationality, a rationality that unites within itself rationalities belonging to all the Creation's parts." (Stăniloae 1995: 47)

"The accomplishments of the human rationality within the universe's purely material frame, they were often impressive, for they came out of a rationality having its origin in the Supreme Rationality. But the human rationality, because of closing down its relation's horizon with its origin in the divine Persons, it has locked-up the horizons which can give the human spirit the relation with the living and infinite God, as Source of the love, horizons which would have allowed the human spirit to see the mysterious depth of the universe into God. By wanting to remain to the rationality comprised by the narrow limits of their own understanding, the people haven't seen the endless dynamism of the rationality. By breaking up the relation with God, the people have been no longer seeing except the immanent universe. That's why the people weren't able to open themselves to the all-comprising hypostatical Wisdom Whom all the things have been created through, and Who is being revealed in the rich and harmonious harmony of all things, but Who also exceeds all the things. Only seen like this, the rationality isn't unilaterally manipulated by the human being, ending to reach all sorts of division and fight amongst people. Only seen thus, the rationality is the power that unifies all the things, and that is undetached from the love amongst everybody." (Stăniloae 1995: 64)

Monasticism

“There is another way which eases the ascension towards God. This is the way of a more radical detaching from things and from marriage, for the greater love for God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 151)

“Often, some Christians, aware of not being able to fulfill the Christian’s general duties, they take for themselves the task of accomplishing other things, in order to gain the mercy from God for the things they know they won’t be able to accomplish. To their conscience, accepting these advices which they feel they can more easily accomplish than the ones of general Christian order, it becomes an obligation. The monasticism is, thus, a vocation. And the one who discovers himself as having this vocation, he must take it seriously and, by fulfilling it, not to take pride of it like for he would do more than the other Christians owe to do.” (Stăniloae 2006: 151)

“Maybe the fact that the monks, through a charisma that overcomes their nature, they succeed in maintaining themselves outside the relation of marriage and of the complex necessary relations and of the problems the marriage impose, by maintaining themselves in a direct and somehow personal relationship with Christ, it explains why the Church doesn’t consecrate through a Mystery the entering in monasticism, but only through a special religious service.” (Stăniloae 1997: 120)

“The monk, though unmarried, he stays though in relation with God as person, though in a relation of acute responsibility. That’s why the patristic literature calls the monasticism as “the true philosophy”. (Stăniloae 1997: 120)

“The monks take the surer, the more radical, and the shorter road. They know that the passions get installed within human being and therefore the human being must fight against himself through restraint. They also know that the human being’s will is weakened by these passions and it is better to be eased your fight against passions by taking away from passions the occasion of being born and stirred up, namely by taking away the substance that allows the passions to be formed and to be light up. That’s why the monks chose to get out of the world. By doing this, they cut off to the passions, from the beginning, any possibility for the passions to be born and stirred up. The whole problem to them is from now on to persevere in this withdrawal, for the lust by lacking for a long time the substance that satisfies it, or by being deprived for a long time of being prolonged by deed, it withers and it no longer leads to passion, or it weakens the passion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 118)

“The monks breaking with the world is strengthened through three votes: the vote for poverty, the vote for chastity, and the vote for obedience. Through these, they compel themselves to persist the whole their life in this renunciation to the addiction to the world, namely to persist in restraint. In these three votes it is concentrated their promise to restrain themselves, not only from the eight passions, but also from everything that can cause the passions: through the vote for poverty they compel themselves not only to renounce to love the riches, but even from any possession that can them an occasion towards manifesting the lust for wealth. In the same time, through this vote the monks keep themselves sheltered against the external possibility of manifesting the belly's covetousness, for they lack the means. Through the chastity vote they compel themselves not only to restraint from fornication, but also from the conjugal bond that can urge them towards fornication. And through the vote for obedience, they compel themselves not only to restraint from pride, but also from the right of expressing their opinion when they reckon that they see the things more justly, for this too can be an occasion for stirring up the pride. By cutting off the covetousness of the belly, the passion of fornication, of the love for money, of the pride, they implicitly cut off from them the passions of the pride and of the sadness too, which are upheld by the first ones." (Stăniloae 1992: 119)

"By giving his votes and by observing them strictly, the monk must restrain himself radically from each passion in part. Namely, from seven passions: the love for money, the fornication, the anger, the sadness, the laziness, the vain-glory, the pride, and even from what can cause each of these passions. In what regard the foods, the monk isn't asked for a radical renunciation, not even for an exaggerate diminishing, but they are asked only for a temperance. The monk must run away only from eating too much, from what is beyond measure, and even from getting fed up, by leaving from the table a little before that. But in what concerns the quantities and the types of foods there isn't given a uniform rule, and this is for the weak ones must nourish themselves better, and the ones who are full of vitality they must eat less. The principle is that the food to uphold the body, that is regarded as tool for spiritual work, and therefore the body not to become an impediment either by weakness or by having too much stum in it." (Stăniloae 1992: 120)

"By and large, all the Holy Fathers recommend the monks to eat fasting food, and from time to time to eat only on evening or to totally abstain from food. The fasting foods have at their turn the purpose of weakening the unrestrained power of the lust, which enslaves the man, and it deprives the man of the possibility to see in what he eats something else than the consumable substance. By weakening the lust, the eating becomes an act which is present both the thinking at God in. The rationality is no longer a servant at the lust's will, but it regains its role of leader. Around the act of eating it descends a spiritual light; the eating it is no longer an irrational act closed up in darkness. But the fasting means also an act of extolling God, for it is an act of restraining our own egotism that has grown up through spiritual and bodily lusts, in such a measure than nobody has room around us, not even God, this giving us the illusion and making us living so that only our person exists and all the things are for our person. The man suffers a monstrous inflating of his ego, because this egotistic extending isn't a real growth, but it is a sickly inflating wanting to stretch itself over everybody and over everything. This is caused by the convergence of all passions, and it is the manifestation of the works of all the spiritual microbes dwelling in our self. The fasting is an antidote against this pathological extending of the lusts and of the egotism. The fasting is the humble gathering in the self, but through his transparency he sees God, and he is filled up with the consistent life of God. This is the growing up of the ghost from within man, out of the godlike Ghost. Only in God and out of the infinite God the spiritual man can grow up in harmony with everybody and with everything. But the egotistic, by wanting to grow up outside God and outside the loving relations with the people, he only apparently grows up and only for a short while." (Stăniloae 1992: 120)

"The decisive moment in the passion's manifestation it is the assent given by rationality to the passion, and therefore the battle starts here, and not later, when the passionate thought is about to become deed. At the beginning of our spiritual life, we do not obtain the success in this stage, at once. But even if we lose the fight there, we will still be able to stop the sin to become deed, by diverse means, amongst which a main one is to take measures in order to lack the occasion to commit the sin, namely to lack the substance that tempts us. And the monk has taken such measures radically, by getting out of the world. Even if he persists only in this state, he has reached the first target. But he is for now only an external monk. In order he to become an internal, spiritual monk, he must reach at least the cleaning up of passionate thoughts, namely to be able to stop his mind from assenting to the passion stirred up in his conscience. Once he has reached here, the dispassion of the first level it will be maintain by itself, no longer needing external means or artificially. We must notice that the struggle for this second level of dispassion it isn't totally separated from the struggle for the first level, though having a phase of its own, and this is for the ones who maintains himself perseveringly in not committing sins with the deed he weakens in the same time the sinful thought. Wanting or not, he also build up arguments for the state of impeccability with the deed, and these arguments weaken the arguments which uphold the thought of temptations in conscience. Likewise, it happened with the third dispassion, by being partially obtained by persevering in the first dispassion and in the second dispassion. This is for by avoiding the sin for a long time and by weakening the sinful thought, the tendency of the lust for passion it gradually is withered." (Stăniloae 1992: 122)

“Withdrawing from the world it doesn’t spare the monk of continuing his effort to restrain himself from sinning with the deed. This is for despite he has exited the world he still hasn’t exited the world totally. Partially, the world still goes with him; he still remains in his withdrawal an In-der-Wlt-sein, as Heidegger would say. For instance, the monk takes with him the need for food, and this imposes him a continuous restraint in order him not to become greedy. But besides this, he can be proud, namely haughty for his successes which he has achieved through his cleaning efforts, or he can be lazy even in the most complete withdrawal. In addition to this he must live in a monastic congregation, if not all the time, at least for a long time after his withdrawal from the world, in order to learn some restraints from others and in order to habituate himself in obedience and in humbleness. But there he is exposed not only to the mentioned passions but also to the danger of getting angry, of gossiping, of much-speaking, and of laziness; and the lie, when isn’t the other’s gossip, it is an excuse for the own laziness, or for self-praising, as on the other hand the much-speaking can be too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 122-123)

“As all the restraints, e them even only from the external sinful manifestations, they aren’t only negative actions, but they have positive and inward effects too, likewise the restraint from gossip makes the soul to focus upon himself and thinking at his own tendencies and shortcomings.” (Stăniloae 1992: 123-124)

“The monks must restrain themselves from sleeping too much, by forcing themselves to take vigil. The sleeping makes the spirit lazy, and it weakens the spirit’s powers of self-disciplining, of focusing, and of dominating the body. And the taking of vigil is a sign of a victory; it keeps the mind’s attention strained at the thoughts from within mind and it makes ever higher understandings to arise within heart.” (Stăniloae 1992: 124)

“In all their writing the Holy Fathers ask the monks for, in addition to their many ways of restraining from the sin with the deed, a string of toils. Thus, in addition to taking of vigil and to holy readings, they recommend the sleeping on the floor and diverse bodily works. Through these the lust is being withered. All these, together with the range of restraint ways, they constitute the toils of the willing torments, assumed out of own initiative.” (Stăniloae 1992: 124-125)

Motion / Movement

“The movement used by the rational beings in order to reach from existence, through good existence, to the eternal and happy existence into God, it is a movement through will, and this movement is called in the rational beings as work. Through work, these rational beings advance towards God, for they purify themselves of passions, they achieve the virtues – amongst which the highest one is the love – and thus, being liberated from passions, these rational beings know the godlike rationalities of the things, or they know God in all the things. This is a road towards ethical consummation, of enrichment in knowledge. At the end of this road God appears to them, or He enters the loving communion with them.”

“Saint Maximos the Confessor understands through movement, which he reckons it as road towards God, the movement of the man’s spiritualization, a movement through which the man increases through the strengthening of the power of the Ghost upon man’s inferior impulses. The stages of the movement are: the purification of passions, the dispassionate noticing of the meanings or of the divine rationalities from within things, and the understanding of God in a simple act, an understanding which is in the same time a full union with Him. The human spirit’s in growing up in power it is an ethical growing up, given the fact that somebody won’t be able to come close to God as Source of the power if that man doesn’t love Him as being the Good.”

“If God is always in the absolute consummation, or in the endless love due to the non-changeability of His nature, our created nature can move, due to its changeability, either from good to evil or from evil to God, or to even more evil, or from good to better too. We cannot be immovable, except in the sense that we move ourselves only within good and towards the highest levels of the good. Thus, we can be imparted with this immovability of the movement all the more into good, and in this sense, we are partakers too, to infinity. And properly-said, our nature tends towards this, and through this our nature is authentically accomplished. This is the movement conform to our nature, for it unites us all the more with the model of our nature, with the Logos become man, the most fully accomplished man in the fullest conformity with godlike Logos, with its Logos. And within our nature’s aspiration of endlessly advancing into good, or in love, it hides the mystery of our connection with God the One Who calls us to advance in the infinity of His love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 143)

“The human nature is always in movement and it is always the same human nature in its essence. The substance-energy bipolarity it is valid here as well. The human nature is in movement through itself, but it doesn’t cease to be always the same in essence and to not become exhausted in any of its movements. What comes to our human nature from Christ it is the power of moving according to that rational will conform to the Christ’s will, namely not to move ourselves without Christ’s will, in an unfree mode. And the power is greater in the movement conform to Christ’s will. Through the movement that was thus strengthened and brought back to its normal, we do not extol only Christ, but we grow up ourselves too, or we accomplish what we must be, and by our know though and by our manifested deeds, we become, in the same time, an image of Christ Who is within us in an unseen manner; or we become transparent for Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 148)

“The detractors affirm that the Orthodox spirituality would urge to an indifferentism regarding the life, to a withdrawal from the life’s unfolding, to a premature eschatological attitude. This opinion is totally wrong. Saint Maximos the Confessor, especially, he highlighted the movement of the creation build up by God and the necessity that each man to participate to this movement, if he wants to reach the consummation represented by the mysterious union with God. This is for the movement, by and large, it is meant to elevate the man on a level of greater kindness and consummation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 24)

“Palamas gave the definition of the work as movement, according to Damascene, whom he quoted: “To be known that something else is the work and something else is the worker, like, again, something else is the accomplished thing: the work is the active movement, and existential, of the nature; the worker is the nature which the work comes from; and the accomplished thing is the result”.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 133)

“The movement which the created conscious beings are summoned to, it isn’t only a movement towards God, but it is destined for Him to have all the things increasingly united with Him and alike Him. To the extent that all things are increasingly dwelling in God and in one another, they increasingly more find their “resting”, or their steadfast settlement in God, and in one another, getting rid of fears, of restlessness, and of insufficiencies, which justify or which are caused by the struggle amongst them. That “resting” means that nothing attracts, any longer, the created conscious beings to exit from the happy union with God and amongst themselves, for they have within God everything that satisfies them. It is a consummate satisfaction, an endless one, in this union with God and amongst the created conscious beings, and in this satisfaction, everyone has everything. In this union everything is identical and still always new. And both of them provide the created conscious beings with a consummate and endless satisfaction.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 38)

“The Church’s Fathers know in God not only a power giving birth to movement within creatures, due to His plenitude, but also a movement in Himself, namely in His quality as Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 7)

Nothing - Nothingness

“Only the “nothing” is not defined in any way.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“God differs from nothing incomparably more and more definitively than any other existence, for He is not menaced by nothing in His existence. But through God the man is called to distinguish himself, in a total a definitive mode, from nothing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95 / footnote 46)

“In His radically differing from nothing existence, it is given the infinity of His existence. But in His report with us enters our possibility of defining His work. In His radical border to nothing it stays the infinity of His existence and our impossibility to fully understand that existence. And in the fact that we too receive a real and definitive border to nothing, we too are imparted with an infinite in development, and inexhaustible in knowledge, existence, in a characteristic human form.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95-96 / footnote 46)

“The nothing isn’t a real void, next to God as plenitude of the existence, or as a limited existence; the nothing isn’t a void which God would be limited by, by nature, or by some constraint upon God, in order God to pull out of nothing, the created universe. This would have given the nothing a positive meaning. If that had been the case, we would have ascertained a certain diminution of God, in favor of the universe He created.” (Stăniloae 1995: 34)

“The nothing means only that God didn’t pull the universe out of Himself, neither out of anything else; the nothing means that before the creation’s act there didn’t exist some substance which the universe would have been brought to existence from; and God neither have given the universe’s existence out of His own Being. According to Thomas Aquinas “the creation isn’t the production of a thing according to its total substance, because there didn’t preexisted anything (nullo praesupposito) uncreated or created”. The Eastern Holy Fathers said that the universe has been brought to existence “out of what doesn’t exist”. (Stăniloae 1995: 34)

Numerology

“The body’s limbs are anointed for seven times in the name of the cross, after the reading of the seven evangelical pericopes and from the Apostle, and after reading seven prayers, for seven are the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and for seven were the evil ghosts cast out from the sinful woman, and for the number seven symbolizes the totality of the evil’s forms, but also of the gifts from God. After the number seven there comes the number eight which symbolizes the endless resting and happiness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 140)

Obedience

“The deed of the obedience evokes only an external juridical relation. It doesn’t imply yet a union with God, for which it is necessary the total renunciation of the creature to the autonomous existence. Only the human being’s total surrender to God it is both union and obedience. This obedience is required by God from us, for He wants us to unite with Him. This is for only in the union with Him it stays the salvation of the creature. The union doesn’t come as a reward for obedience; juts in the content of the obedience, understood as surrender, it is implied the union. And the union as consented by God it is also His love for us; likewise, our surrender is love too, as the obedience without surrender it isn’t, for it may have its cause in fear. God doesn’t find any content in our obedience because of fear, but in the obedience united with the love, which is manifested in surrender. And the salvation which He makes us partaker to, it isn’t only our liberation from death, consequently to the satisfaction we give Him by obeying Him as standing before us and thus we restore His offended honor, but it is the answer to our will of union with Him, which is actually His union with us, also carried by love. Karl Rahner reckons that the death was necessary for salvation, only for in death Christ’s obedience went to the end, and we must do the same. He pretends that the Holy Scripture understands the death like this. But Saint Paul sees in death the occasion for us to fully unite with Christ (Phil. 1: 23). And so did the martyrs too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 156-157)

Orthodox Apologetics

“The theology has as object of interminable reflection the all-comprising and infinite content of the dogmatic formulas, which delimitates and strictly ensures this infinite in the unmistakable richness of its aspects of inexhaustible depths and complexity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

“But the theology, at its turn, it must remain in the frame of the general and yet precise formulas of the dogmas, just in order to maintain the dogmas as object of interminable reflection and deepening.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

“The whole theology that makes explicit the infinite content from the frame of the dogmatic formulas, it is a widened expression of these dogmas.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

“When the theological explanations are organically making explicit the dogmas and they are useful to reinvigorate the churchly life – and as such they enter in the general and permanent preaching of the Church –, they sum up the teaching of the Church in a broad sense.” (Stăniloae 2003: 99)

“Between the dogmas and the teaching of the Church there is, on one hand, a background identity, and on the other hand there is a distinction of form.” (Stăniloae 2003: 100)

“The Church adds to its teaching, but in the same time it preserves the fundamental dogmatic terms from ever. It adds to its teaching through theology, for it highlights these terms for each believer generation, corresponding to that generation understanding determined by the stage of spiritual development that generation is in.” (Stăniloae 2003: 100)

“The theology is the reflecting upon the content of the faith, inherited out of the initial witness and living of the Revelation, which we have it in the Scripture and in the Apostolic Tradition, on the purpose of making that content efficient as salvation factor for each believers generation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 100)

“(…) not all the theology becomes churchly teaching, but only that that is absorbed by the Church through its unanimous consensus in time and space. And the Church absorbs only that theology proved by the time as being organically assimilated to the previous Christian living of the content comprised in Christ; the Church absorbs only that theology that is proven over time that it interpreted the same living of the Revelation concentrated in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 100-101)

"(...) the Church's teaching is constituted of what the Church, in its quality of body of Christ, it retains as permanent value from the thinking of the individuals, even if this thinking was caused by the needs of a certain époque." (Stăniloae 2003: 100-101)

"The theology is being made within Church through the personal thinking of the Church's members, and the Church's teaching is constituted of what remains permanent out of the individuals' thinking that became common and proven as theology of the Church as unitary body." (Stăniloae 2003: 101)

"(...) all the Church's members do theology, more or less. Out of their inter-conditioning within Church it results the without mistake teaching of the Church, but which is proven only after it passes a certain period of time." (Stăniloae 2003: 102)

"The progress of the theology is made possible by the divine infinity in the human form put at peoples' disposal, but it is made necessary by the need for making this infinite accessible to the believers of each period of time, to whose level of understanding and of spiritual life contributed the spiritual efforts of the previous generations." (Stăniloae 2003: 102)

"(...) the personal theological thinking must be animated not by the desire for originality at all costs, but by the applying of that common inheritance and to serve to the salvation of the Church's believers from that époque; the individual theological thinking must stay in close intimacy with the Church's life of prayer and ministration, in order to deepen and reinvigorate this ministration. Without this, the Church can become formalist in its ministration, and the theology can become cold and individualistic." (Stăniloae 2003: 102-103)

"A theology feeding itself out of the Church's life, it is a theology presenting and deepening its spiritual thinking and living and its sanctifying and ministration work." (Stăniloae 2003: 104)

"The theology is, willy-nilly, tied in its different periods, to the concepts of those periods. That's why, the locking up in concepts which lost their validity since the period they were used in it passed, the will of maintaining those concepts as basis of the theology, make, out of the formulations of such a theology, dead and stranger pieces for the life of the Church and for the believers from the succeeding periods." (Stăniloae 2003: 105-106)

"The progress of the theology is also explained through the mankind's spiritual progress over time, and through the new problems the mankind faces, depending on which this progress is being achieved. Shortly, the real progress of the theology, and with this also the justification of the theology as living theology – because without such a progress the theology seems not to be justified, because it remains an insufficient repetition of the old formulas – it depends on three conditions: on the faithfulness towards the Revelation in Christ, presented in the Holy Scripture and in the Holy Tradition and uninterruptedly lived in the Church's life; the responsibility for the believers from the time the theology is being made; and the openness to the eschatological future, namely the obligation of guiding the believers towards their true consummation in that future. Not fulfilling even one of these three conditions it gives birth to an insufficient theology, and useless in an extended measure, or even damaging for the Church and for the believers. This theology was guilty of a threefold infidelity: towards the unlimited character of the Revelation, towards contemporaneity, and towards future.” (Stăniloae 2003: 106)

“Even more damaging is a theology that totally forsakes the Revelation in Christ, preserved in the Holy Scripture and in the Tradition of the Church, and it is led by the will of adapting to what that theology reckons to be exclusively the spirit of that time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 106)

“Equally damaging and generating disorder, it is the theology that doesn't pay attention except to the future, a theology dominated by an exclusive eschatological spirit, a theology neglecting the reality of the present life and the help the present life must be provided with.” (Stăniloae 2003: 107)

“The theology must be as the Church is: apostolic, contemporary to each époque, and prophetic-eschatological. But the theology must not break itself from the Church in its progress, but to advance together with the Church, which is led forwards to the Kingdom of Heavens. The theology must be apostolic because it must ceaselessly be a witness about Christ – the complete Revelation – as the preaching of the Apostles was also a witness about Christ – the definitive Revelation. The theology must be, in the same time, eschatological, for in Christ and in the apostolic preaching is comprised the eschatological too. But the theology must be prophetic too, not in the sense that the theology would predict a future state superior to the Revelation in Christ, but in the sense that it hints towards future steps in discovering the treasures hidden in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 108-109)

“The Christian theology (...) promotes the progress and as such, it makes easier the efficiency of the revelation in uninterrupted continuation. In this sense, such a theology is a theology of the faith, of the love, and of the hope. Through faith, the theology manifests the certitude of the real revealing of God in Christ; through hope, the theology opens to the believers the perspective towards the complete assimilation of the good things of the revealed Christ and it leads to advancing towards Him; and through love it upholds the participation to the good things of Christ in an always increasing communion with Christ and with the fellow humans. Through these three characteristics, the theology is traditional and, in the same time, it is contemporary and prophetic-eschatological. The theology is faithful to the past, but it is no longer locked in the past; the theology is instead faithful to the mankind of today but it has its sight open beyond its present phase.” (Stăniloae 2003: 109-110)

“The theology is part of the human spirit’s progress towards the full union with God, having an especially efficient role in this movement, by its role of explanatory of this movement.” (Stăniloae 2003: 111)

“The theology (...) is called to help, generally, the whole movement of the creation towards God. But the theology succeeds in doing this by opening the sight towards God, today, and a fuller sight towards God, tomorrow, by taking power out of God who has given the man this impulse through creation, and He has given the Church and the theology this impulse through the Embodiment of His Son, through his Crucifixion and Resurrection.” (Stăniloae 2003: 112)

“The theology will be efficient if it will always be before God, by helping the believers to be at their turn, the same in the whole their work: to see God through the formulas of the past, to explain God through the explanations of the present, and to hope and to urge to advancing towards the full union with God in the future life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 112)

“A big part of the newer theology puts on the first place the idea of the hope. Any idea of God Who cements the existent social order is now left behind. Today it makes sense to speak about God only if he opens a future and has a function of transforming the world, only if Him, by leading the human being towards Himself and towards salvation, He leads the human being towards ever higher stages.” (2003: 513-514)

“This ascension towards God and towards our fully accomplished consummate state, it wouldn’t be possible without a foretasting, still from here, of the living of God and of our authentic consummate life in God. A part of the Catholic theology, that was in the past totally trusting the scholastic abstract definitions and doubting any affirmations about experiencing God still from the earthly life, today it affirms, at its turn, that such anticipated experiencing of God, it is real. But some of their representatives see this experiencing possible only in the loving relation between me and you. Likewise think also some of the representatives of the Protestant theology, who want to replace the name God for the term ‘co-humanity’ (Mitmenschlichkeit). In both theologies one can ascertain a strong influence of the existentialist philosophy.” (2003: 516)

“In Catholicism, this weakening of the union with Christ through Mysteries has led to raising the pope as vicar, or as deputy of Christ. Obedience to the pope has become thus the means of maintaining a unity, a rather formal and institutional one, of the Church. The Protestantism, being discontent with such a non-spiritual and rather exterior to the Church unity, it has reduced the connection with Christ to a simple connection the believer has with Christ through faith. But this faith, no longer having as source the presence of Christ with His body within Church, it has become mostly emptied of power and content, becoming rather a subjective voluntary act, with a very reduced content, decided by each individual, by himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

“The Orthodox theologians, Karmiris and Meyendorff, of the Occidental theologian H. Schultz, they are right when saying that the foundation of the Church’s unity in Orthodoxy isn’t from beneath, from the believers’ agreement, but it is from above, from Christ. But from here one cannot draw the conclusion, as those ones did, that the separations of the Christians in diverse Churches are only superficial and not touching the Church’s actual unity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

“The question is: What are the other Christian confessions which do not confess such an intimate and working union with the integral Christ within them? We reckon they are not-full churches, some of them closer to the fullness, some of them farther away.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“Contrary to the Metropolitan Plato, who reckons that all the confessions are equal divisions of the same unique Church, the spirit of the Orthodox teaching and tradition imposes us to reckon that the unorthodox confessions are divisions which have been formed in some connection with the full Church and there is some connection with the Church, but they are not imparted with the full light and power of the Son Christ. In a way, the Church comprises all the confessions separated from the Church, for they haven’t been able to totally separate themselves from the Tradition present within Church. Besides, Church in the full meaning of the word it is only the Orthodox Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“A certain church subsists outside Christendom even today, for there still are certain ontological connections of the human forces with one another and with the godlike Logos. All the more this church exists in the other Christian formations, given their connection through faith, with Christ, the embodied Logos, and given the fact that they partially have a common belief with the Orthodox Church, the full Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“Given the situation of churchly non-fullness of the diverse Christian confessions, the question is: how will their members be saved? Or: is there salvation outside the Church which is only one, in the full meaning of the word?” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“In the diverse Christian confessions there are Christians whose life hasn’t been reduced to the official doctrinal formulas of their confessions. The old Christian tradition has been more powerful than the innovations brought by those confessions’ founders and officially affirmed by those Christian formations and by their theologians. For instance, in Catholicism, there have been practiced until nowadays the Mysteries with the believers’ conviction that, by doing so, they are intimately and unmediated united with Christ, and that Christ is working in the Church’s bosom, though the theological theory has given a deputy to Christ, and it conceive the salvation brought by Christ as done through the simple satisfaction Christ gave to God on Golgotha, or it declares that the grace received in Mysteries it is a created grace and not a work springing out of the uncreated godhead of Christ and as prolongation of it within the believers’ being.” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“One must take in account also the second factor: the believers of the diverse Christian confession found themselves, without their will, in the frame of these denominations which have a belief about a Christ Who is not present with the whole His savior efficiency within those denominations’ bosom. They not-fully participation to Christ – and this is mostly not their guilt – might have as consequence a not-fully participation to Christ in the future life too, according to the Savior’s word: “In My Father’s house, there are many dwelling places...” (Jn. 14: 2).” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“Without any doubt, are guilty the heresiarchs, who, without studying too deep the faith they inherited, and by guiding themselves rather according to the passion of their haughtiness, they proceeded to tearing apart the Christianity, and they caused so much damage to it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

“The Church’s holiness, as its unity too, has its source in the Holy Christ Who is present within Church. Where there is the unmediated and intimate relation with Christ and in Him with the other believers, there is the holiness too. In Protestantism, where the faith in the intimate and working presence of Christ within Church, it has weakened, in the same time with the Church’s unity until its disappearing, the Church’s holiness has equally weakened too. The preoccupation for sanctifying the body through restraint it has weakened very much in Catholicism too (the lack of the fasting, eating before the Holy Impartation etc.), due to the same fact of non-highlighting the impartation with the sanctified body of Christ within Church and, by and large, due to the same reduced accent put on the important of the Christ's body and of its holiness and of our body in the salvation work." (Stăniloae 2006: 112-113)

"The Church's holiness, as its unity too, coming from the tight union with Christ, they are features which the savior power of Christ through Church is manifested through. If the salvation is the participation, through the transparency of the body, to the godlike infinity into the Holy Ghost, Who spiritualizes our bodies, one can understand why some of the western Christian confessions, evading the efforts necessary for spiritualizing the body, they conceive the salvation as a juridical solving of the conflict between God and people, a purely forma solving, which will bring forth it fruits, in the believers' being, only in the life to come." (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

"Christ is saint, in the first place, for He is God. His holiness is a characteristic of His, as God. The creature doesn't have holiness except through participation. That's why, where the participation to God isn't affirmed, there neither is affirmed the holiness of the creature (Protestantism). Anywhere God manifests Himself, there His holiness is lived, as something totally different from the world, and that communicated the energy of the grace for purification, with a shiver of shyness, of veneration, or of fear the man experiences before God, due to the man's own sinfulness which impedes the full participation to the holiness of God (Isa. 6: 5-57; Exodus 3: 5). In the Old Testament it is continuously mentioned the holiness of God, but also the communication of the holiness of God. This holiness fills up the place where God appears, it shines through persons who are close to God, and it leaves behind a trace within these persons after God has come close to them." (Stăniloae 2006: 113)

"This teaching about the grace it has the quality of placing the man in unmediated connection with God Who work within the man, unlike the Roman-Catholic teaching which, through the doctrine about the created grace it leaves the man alone with an impersonal power added to his natural powers, or put at his disposal." (Stăniloae 2006: 126)

"In Occident, out of conceiving the grace as an impersonal force, there have been born the disputes concerning who is stronger in the relation between grace and freedom. In this case, the impersonal force of the grace cannot be but either weaker or stronger than the man's force. But between God as Person and the believer as person, there cannot be a competition in manifesting their power." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"The theological disputes from Occident have started from a very equivocal notion of the freedom: from the so-called free will or from the freedom that would be absolutely neutral to good or bad. They raised the question: in the encountering of the divine grace with this freedom, can there be victorious the grace or the freedom?: in case the liberty wins, it would decide, somehow by itself, for doing good deeds; in case the grace wins, this freedom is brought to do good deeds good, somehow forcedly (predestination). In both cases there isn't accomplished a real collaboration, or it is not achieved the real liberty - which would mean both by grace and by our own will." (Stăniloae 2006: 132)

"As we can see, in "gift" is implied not only the work of the Holy Ghost, but there is also an act of impropriation of the Holy Ghost from the man's part, and sometimes there is even a predisposition of the man for that gift, which implies a man's effort too, in order to develop, with the help of the Holy Ghost, that predisposition or capacity of his. This determines that in the gift, as effect of the work of the Holy Ghost, to be inserted something characteristic to the human nature too. The uncreated godlike work it doesn't remain alone. When speaking about the uncreated work, we mean that the gift the Christian rejoices of, it cannot be explained without the causality of a uncreated godlike work; and we do not understand that this causality is not a supra-natural one, but a created one, as the Roman-Catholic theology affirms. The Holy Ghost Himself moves the believer towards collaboration and he strengthen the believer in order to receive and to use a gift, or to develop that gift through a natural disposition." (Stăniloae 2006: 137)

"Amongst the numerous terms expressing the salvation state there is a full solidarity, or a complementarity. The meaning of each term implies the meanings expressed by the others. In the Occidental Christendom, it has been highlighted, out of all the terms, that one of "justice". But in East, the meaning of the "justice" is seen in solidarity with the other terms." (Stăniloae 2006: 138)

"The Western Christendom conceived the justice state as a relation of external peace the man has with God, in which God exempted the man of His anger, due to the satisfaction Christ has given to the honor of God previously offended by the man's disobedience. The man's state of righteousness into Christ it has become thus, in scholastics, a man's "justified" state, acquitted of the punishment from God and accepted in a relation of peace with God, consequently to the juridical act of satisfaction accomplished by Christ through His willing death for the offence the man brought to God. The Protestantism brought this conception to its last consequences. Whether in Catholicism the received man, after justification, in relation with God, he enjoys on the basis of this relation of the gift of the created grace, which helps the man to live a less sinner life, to the Protestantism the justification has no consequence in the man's life. The man only knows that he is justified, namely forgiven for the expiation endured by Christ on his behalf, but the man further remains with his being as he has been, namely a sinner, totally untransformed.” (Stăniloae 2006: 138-139)

“Willing to imprint to the salvation this reduces and exterior meaning, the juridical spirit of the Western Christendom has chosen from the richness of terms which Saint Apostles Paul, John, and Peter used for describing the new state of the man into Christ, the only term of the justice, used for a few times by Saint Apostle Peter, and this term has been understood in a main (the Catholicism) or exclusive (the Protestantism) sense. The salvation reduced to this juridical meaning it was possible to be obtained by the man could obtain it from God by himself. That’s why it has been reckoned that the Church as body of Christ is no longer necessary (the Protestantism); or the Church has been lowered to the role of a distributor institution, distributing the created grace, through which the individual are distributed the quality as justified for the satisfaction brought by Christ, Whose merit in the form of created grace the Church has been entrusted with in order to distribute it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 139)

“The teaching about “justification” it has become thus a main chapter of the western dogmatic doctrine regarding the subjective feature of the salvation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 139)

“In Catholicism, the created grace being in a deposit, at the disposal of the Church – but not intimately connected to the Church’s being as mysterious body of Christ, full of the body of Christ and of the Holy Ghost Who irradiated out of Him and within and around the Church -, it was possible to be treated as a self-standing reality.” (Stăniloae 2006: 139)

“The juridical spirit of the Western Christian thinking disregarded the fact that Saint Apostle Paul expressed the teaching about salvation in Christ as attributing the justice of Christ, to the man, only in the polemic he had with the Judaizers who – by maintaining the Judaic tradition of the Pharisees – they reckoned that they were saved through the justice they earn by themselves through their deeds. Even Christ opposed the justice the Pharisees reckoned they were earning to themselves to “the justice of God” (Mt. 6: 33). Following to this example, Saint Paul opposed to the “righteousness from the law” (Philip. 3: 6), of the Judaizers, the “righteousness from God” (Philip. 3: 9).” (Stăniloae 2006: 139)

“The Protestantism wanted to highlight the fact that the Christian is saved depending on Christ as Person, and not depending on a law fulfilled by the man by its own efforts, individually. But by reckoning that the salvation a simple man’s judicial declaration as a right, for the payment paid by Christ on the cross, the Protestantism too has weakened the connection of the man who is being saved with the eternally living and loving Christ. The man’s salvation has been no longer conceived as being done through the man's continuous relation with Christ, but as the cost paid through a past act for the continuous sins of the people." (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

"The whole salvation refers to that past act, valuable in itself, and not to the Person of Christ in permanent communion with us. This lowering of the salvation from the meaning of man's transformation, transformation accomplished in the man's relation, as person, with Christ, it has taken place also in Catholicism, where the Church valorized the Christ's "merit" as an impersonal thesaurus of grace, gained by Christ through the satisfaction Christ gave to God, on cross." (Stăniloae 2006: 140)

"The followers of diverse Christian sects, they thing this preparation as being everything and they no longer received the Baptism or they reduce the Baptism to a simple ceremony, through which they make know their internal and external "conversion"."

"Concerning the Baptism, the Orthodox teaching – as inheritor of the teaching of the early Christendom – it differs fundamentally from the protestant teaching; according to the last one, the ancestral sin isn't abolished, because neither Christ dwells within man, but there takes place only a declarative forgiveness of the man of this sin and of all the man's persons sins, a justification of an external acquittal of the man's guilt for sins, but the sins remain still remain within man, with the whole power of the egotism implied by them." (Stăniloae 2006: 145)

"The climbing into consummation is endless, and no one can tell that somebody has passed beyond his consummation, so that what he does is no longer assimilated to his person, but it is a surplus that he can put it at the disposal of the ones who haven't accomplished as many as they should. This is not egotism at the ones who ascend on very high levels of consummation. But the benefit others have it from them, it is due to the direct irradiation of power from the higher one to the lower ones, not needing an official intermediary which to take this surplus in its own administration, in order to later distribute it as merits detached from the persons who have earned those merits. Besides, all the Christian can gain from one another, each of them having something to be communicated to the others and to be received from the others." (Stăniloae 2006: 151)

"The Protestants contest the need for good deeds, on the basis of a few places from the Apostles of Saint Apostle Paul, about the salvation by faith without the deeds of the law (Rom. 3: 20, 28, 30; 2: 4, 6; Gal. 2: 16; Ephes. 2: 8). This contestation of the deeds is solidary with their teaching about justification, as juridical acquitting of the ones who believe, for the guilt for sins, without abolishing the sins and without seeding within them a new life in Christ. But we have seen that Saint Apostle Paul understands the “righteousness” the man in whom Christ is dwelling is imparted with, as a new life, manifested in good deeds which can lead the man to the spiritual stature of Jesus Christ, the consummate man. This can be seen in all the places from the Epistles of Saint Apostle Paul, where he speaks about the new life in Christ, in continuous growth, in which is implied the appreciation for the good deeds. But Saint Apostle Paul speaks also in numerous places about the need for good deeds.” (Stăniloae 2006: 152)

“It is clear that the good deeds whose importance is contested by Protestantism, are the deeds the man reckon the as justifying him without the union with the sacrificed and resurrected Christ. Regarding this mentality, Saint Apostle Paul placed at the foundation of the salvation the faith in Christ, but not the faith in the juridical importance of Christ’s death, as equivalent for our sins, but the faith as relation, as persons, with Christ, through which irradiates within man the power of Christ; it is a faith which equals to a gradual union with Christ, out of Whose sacrifice and Resurrection, we receive, at our turn, power to die to the sins, namely to die to our egotism and isolation, and to resurrect to a new life which stays in intimate communication with Christ and which will bring us to resurrection, out of His power. Not the deeds committed outside Christ are the ones which save us – namely not our deeds committed on the basis of a normative impersonal law, but the deeds springing out of the power of Christ, Who dwells within us, are the deeds necessary for achieving the personal salvation, for these deeds increase within us the union with Christ and the likeness to Him. In those deeds it is shown the fact that we have achieved the salvation in Christ. Not only in Protestantism it is avoided the pride for deeds, but in Orthodoxy too; but, while in Protestantism they renounce to any kind of deeds, even to the deeds of the communion with Christ - because they do not believe in this communion -, in Orthodoxy these deeds can be seen as fruition within us, of the Christ’s presence and of His power.” (Stăniloae 2006: 152)

“Some of the Protestant theologians argue that after death and before the general resurrection there is no life of the soul, and that the soul is destroyed together with the body, or it sinks into nothingness, out of which the soul will be called, together with his body, to the general resurrection, if he believed in Christ. This is an opinion that has left the teaching about the dualist composition of the human being.

This theory is the last Luther’s conclusion about the sleep which the souls fall in after their death, except few of them, waiting for the final judgment. From Luther have these sects and these theologians taken the idea that the man no longer can have a life only through soul and without body.” (Stăniloae 1997: 158-159)

“By and large, both the Lutheranism and the Calvinism, they kept the general conviction that the death is only a separation of the soul from the body, and the soul continues to exist after death too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 159)

“Though Althaus, one of the Protestant representatives of the theory of the human being’s total destruction through death, until the universal judgment, he argues that the death must be understood according to all its three aspects: as relation of creation, as anger, and as reconciliation with God, this theory (as also the theory about the souls’ sleep until the final judgment) it retains from death only its aspect as punishment, and not that one too of ontological crossing of the creature to God, and that one of granting forgiveness, namely of escaping the consequences of the sin. In this theory it is extended the Protestant doctrine about the complete ruining of the man through falling and that one about justification or juridical salvation. If the man remains wholly a moral ruin during the whole his life on earth, there cannot be chosen out of him a personal-spiritual core which to be preserved, but the whole human being must be destroyed, because of being equally affected by sin.” (Stăniloae 1997: 159-160)

“The conclusion of some Protestant theologians on the destruction of the soul through death, it come out from the Protestant doctrine about the not-dwelling of Christ within believers during their life on earth. Althaus argues that the belief in the soul’s immortality it takes from death its character of judgment from God. But it doesn’t totally take this character, for the spirit of the righteous stands the judgment as well; only if it is ascertained his illumination done by God, he goes to happiness. And besides this, the earthly human being still is punished through death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 160)

“Althaus argues the theory on the destruction of the whole human being through death, with the today’s frequent theory that the human being hasn’t an indestructible soul, differing from his body, and that the man has a monad constitution and affirming that the man must realize that the future life is due not to the indestructible nature of his soul but to an act of godlike almightiness and mercy; therefore the human being must be totally destroyed, in order to see how God alone gives him again life. He also thinks that only this theory makes of death a serious event, as actually it appears to the human being’s conscience, an event which doesn’t decrease its importance through the continuation of the life with the soul.” (Stăniloae 1997: 160-161)

“The teaching on the judgment of the soul after death is opposed by a theory about an endless evolution of the souls after the human being’s death. This theory has two forms:

a) A form consists of the affirmation of the indefinite variability of the human will and fate. According to this, the man can change his direction during his future life. The will doesn't definitively ossify itself in a direction or another, and therefore neither during this life, in order a judgment upon the man to possibly be uttered immediately after his death. The eternity will be an indefinite succession of happy or unhappy existences of the people, they being free to live a good or a bad life. A concrete form of this doctrine is the theory of the reincarnation or of the metempsychosis, upheld by anthroposophist adherents and by spiritism adherents.

b) A second form, called universalism, it argues that, at the end, all the souls will reach some kind of happiness, for a free being can repent whenever, and in the end all the souls will repent. The end will once come to an end, because of any evil is medicinal, and therefore it is temporal.

In its generality this theory opposes, in principle, to any judgment from God, either particular or universal, which would divide the people for eternity, on the ground of the decision made during the short life on earth. Amongst the upholders of this theory, we mention especially Lessing, who, on behalf of the idealist pantheistic philosophy he replaces the double finish of the mankind for a ceaseless evolution. In the frame of the theology, this evolutionist theory has been upheld by: Schleiermacher, O. Pfleiderer, E. Troelsch, R. Seeberg, H. Ludemann, and Hellpach."

In order to uphold this theory, there are brought three mainly arguments: a) the indecisive character of the present life for determining the eternal fate of the people; b) the eternal freedom of the human being; c) the impossibility of reconciling the divine judgment with the divine kindness." (Stăniloae 1997: 165-166)

"Only the theory of reincarnations seems to take into account the need for body in order to man's consummation. But it actually deprives of decisive character any life which a soul crosses through, in his successive incarnations. This is because of this theory sees the world eternally going up and down, without any final target, and therefore meaninglessly. There is no absolute state of the existence the world would tend to, and which will stop the incarnations forever. If there had been such an absolute stage, it would have been touched by the eternity out of which the ascension of the stages is being done towards it. Then, these reincarnations do not keep the same person in a real continuity. I am not interested in the consummation of some future selves. Properly said, all the persons are lost, if they can be called persons. What joy could I have of my superior future incarnations, if I won't record in my conscience my progress from the present reincarnation to the future ones?" (Stăniloae 1997: 167)

"Actually, the anthroposophy argues that the chain of the reincarnations brings the beings to their confounding, one by one, into a supreme essence, and then to be detached out of these, again, as material individualizations, which gradually are again spiritualized. This theory combines the Origen's doctrine – related to the theory of forming some successive worlds, by falling into those worlds and by ascending out of those worlds – with the successive incarnations of this world. So that it is matched, besides the critique of the Origenistic relativism, the critique of the reincarnations too, which make the human person even more ephemeral.” (Stăniloae 1997: 167)

“The indefinite evolution of incarnations in the same form of the world, or without those incarnations, manifested in the fallings and in the raisings of other worlds, or in the same world, it implies a world without eternal persons, a world in pantheistic sense.” (Stăniloae 1997: 169)

“The idea about a new falling for a new repair, namely for a new ascension, it implies an irreducible equivocal: the evil of the falling and the good purpose of the falling. And then, whom will the repair be done to, if there is no God as person? And how can be called a repair that one done not in freedom, but on the basis of a universal law? Then, it could be called as personal repair something done for mistakes from a previous existence, which somebody no longer feels himself responsible of, for he do not know those mistakes as being his? We have to mention here that, most of times, even they say that you must be crossed from eternity through infinite incarnations, we do not live a good life, so that we do not show that we have learnt something from the previous infinite incarnations.” (Stăniloae 1997: 169)

“All the reincarnations will seem to be inutile for person, if they are for fulfilling a meaningless law of the universal substance. Only a unique temporal existence, destined to bring us in eternity, it makes a full sense for this life, during which we have enough time to decide ourselves. For we learn during it, not only out of our experience, but also out of the experience of the whole history that preceded us, out of the experience of all the previous generations and of so many people who we encounter with. Out of these we learn endlessly more than out of previous lives which we do not remember about, or out of this chaining of lives that breaks us from all solidarities of unique and absolute importance. We are learning out of the good teaching made available to us by the Revelation of God, as supreme good Person. The whole eternity is concentrated, through God, around me and it determines me to decide myself, during the present existence, in favor of good. We learn, in the atmosphere that surrounds us from above and from around us, and which obliges us through so many love deeds towards us, of God and of other people, an atmosphere making out of this life a life of ceaseless and unique responsibility. That one who doesn’t allow himself to be penetrated by so many reasons of responsibility during this life, that one wouldn’t allow this in no matter how many other lives he would have, all of them lacking a unique responsibility for achieving the eternity. If the eternal existence of my fellow human it depends exclusively on this life, how much won’t this increase my responsibility towards them? (Stăniloae 1997: 170)

“We learn, finally, in the supreme degree, from the Son of God Who has made Himself man Who was crucified, and Who has resurrected for us, and Who dwells within us with His love, by giving us the godlike power to die to the sin and to live in Him, or in God Himself, and to follow His words in the good we are going to do to others. Therefore, the human life is directly open to the godlike life, so that we can be directly elevated in the godlike life, without the ladder of the endless incarnations, which still doesn’t take us in the absolute life of God. Then, nobody can save himself by himself, no matter how many lives he would live, and no matter how many evolutions he would cross through, if the salvation means participating to the godlike life, and not ascending on relative stages which never reach the absolute and which never gives us the whole. The salvation isn’t the result of observing some law; nobody gains his salvation by himself. The salvation is a gift which we do not receive it except from God Who comes to us by making Himself man, by this coming in maximum closeness to us. The life on earth receives by this a decisive importance for the direct communication with God, Who, through His embodied and resurrected Son, He establishes Himself in our life on earth, opening thus our temporality directly to the eternity in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 170-171)

“We have suddenly entered the intimate relation with the godlike Person, Who is an infinite source of love, Who is beyond any movement in the relativity of a monist reality; we have entered the relation with the divine Person Who is above any relative infinity composed of stages, considered in itself, by being the source of the absolute infinity. If the communion in love with a human person it brings us on a plan of life totally different from that one with the objects, or from that one of increasingly thoroughly fulfilling some life norms in our individual isolation, all the more entering the communion with Christ-God, Who is an absolute Person, Himself in communion with other two absolute Persons, it takes us by grace on the plan of life which is infinitely deeper than the one of the relation with all the objects and with all the human persons, than that of any individualistic experiences. The compensation law, or the repair law, or of an evolution by itself, it can mean a process of gradual improvement (though this is very problematic too), prolonged in countless existences, or on an endless ladder. But in the communion with a person who is powerful in his love, it suddenly is poured within me, on a totally reviving degree, the life which I do not have out of that evolution, or out of those efforts made by myself, as a new beginning that has no continuity with the previous existences. I live it like a breaking, in the same time with the helpless monotony of the former man, as a rebirth. But infinitely more and totally consummately I live such an event in the communion with the Person of endless love and power, of God, that come into Christ on the plan accessible to me.” (Stăniloae 1997: 171-172)

“Against the divine judgment and in favor of the final universalism of the salvation, or of the indefinite variability of the souls, it has been brought also the argument of the essential freedom of the spirit. Even Origen argued this theory by using this argument. But a freedom that brings all the souls to salvation or that gives the souls the possibility of a eternal crossing from good to evil and vice versa, it actually is no longer a liberty. If everybody reaches the salvation either by the will of God or by a law intrinsic to the evolution, where the liberty will be? Likewise, if the souls are drawn without their will, in others and others incarnations, or in others and in others fallings, where the liberty will be? And if never and nobody reaches a consummation in the infinity of the divine life, and if everyone remains in a movement on the plan of the eternal relativity, what the liberty will be good for? (Stăniloae 1997: 172)

“But not taking in account the necessity of the human being’s openness to the communion with God, the adherents of the salvation’s universalism, or the ones who believe at least in an eternal variability, they reckon that an eternal hell, founded on a judgment of God it is incompatible with His kindness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 173)

“The adherents of the salvation’s universalism they do not take seriously the existence God as Person. This is because of that eternal evolution towards a universal and increasingly higher good, or the eternal variability, it takes place on the ground of a universal law, which God cannot intervene in. They do not take in account, somehow, that this salvation or universal variability without God, it actually isn’t a salvation, but it is some sort of hell, or some sort of death in the boredom of the eternal relativity, which, on the measure that it is prolonged and it is proven as an eternal condition, it becomes unbearable tormenting.” (Stăniloae 1997: 173)

“Paradoxically, the ones who reckon that God institutes the hell through an act of external justice (Thomas Aquino and Dante) and the ones denying the hell, they prove to have the same misunderstanding of the happiness as communion with God; and by this, the ones who deny the judgment of God they affirm like the ones who recognize the judgment of God as an act of external justice, the same universal inferno. This is for a happiness given as an external state (the created supra-natural), and not as a communion, it is at its turn some sort of hell of the eternal relativity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 173)

“The ones who deny the inferno by founding themselves on the idea of divine justice, they fall into affirming the hell instituted through the lack of any efficient presence of God. This mistake is made by Berdyaev too, who considers that both the affirmation and the denial of the hell’s eternity they represent a forbidden rationalization of the mystery. But neither him escapes this rationalization, by denying the hell. This is because of him getting closer to the position of the ones who affirm the certain exit of the ones from hell, through an unavoidable logic of the soul's movements, which cross from sufferance to regret." (Stăniloae 1997: 173-174)

"In Catholicism it has been developed a different conception about the state of the soul after death, a conception that appears to be fully crystallized in the scholastics period. It has been developed the conception about a state of the souls which is for the saints consummate happiness immediately after their death, which is for the ones guilty of deadly sins a full torment immediately after their death, and for the ones who repented for their sins but they hadn't the chance to give, during their life, the satisfaction for the temporal punishments, it is a purgatory fire which, after it cleans them up, it elevates them to the full happiness before the universal judgment, by enduring some punishments without their will." (Stăniloae 1997: 205)

The fact that after the universal judgment the happiness or the torments will be endured not only by the souls but also by the resurrected body, namely by the person as a whole, it is not taken into account by Catholicism, a fact that diminishes the person's importance as a concrete whole. In an odd way, in the Catholic teaching there which doesn't discern between the state from after the individual judgment and the state from after the universal judgment, on one hand there is felt a tendency towards individualism and, on the other hand, a tendency towards the abstract spiritualism, a supra-personal one, a fact that means a certain contradiction." (Stăniloae 1997: 205)

"The abstract note of the Catholic theology in this point it is shown also by the fact that in Occident, starting with the scholastics, the righteous' happiness it has been seen in the contemplation of the divine essence. In this contemplation, the persons itself is erased in a certain degree, a fact that means also a certain disinterest in communion. This disinterest in communion is no longer a derivation of the individualism, but it belongs to the person's exiting on a plan of the existence, or to the abstracting, because of the essence not existing concretely except as hypostasis also in the case of the spiritual essence as person. And as the essence cannot be contemplated in real time except in hypostasis, contemplating it in itself is much an abstract thinking at it. But it is possible this fact to take place in the life on earth too and therefore after the individual judgment, not being necessary for this the universal communion from after the universal judgment. On the other hand, the essence cannot be contemplated either in hypostasis. This is because of contemplating means comprising it. But the divine essence cannot be comprised, because of being an abyssal reality. The introducing of this teaching at the Synod from Florence compelled the delegates of the Orthodox Church to specify that, according to the teaching of the Holy Fathers, no creature can see the divine essence, but only the glory of God. "This is for what it is known according to the essence – said Mark the Ephesian – for it is known, it is comprised by the one who knows it. But God isn't comprised by anybody, by His nature, for he is infinite". One can have with God a communion as Person, but He cannot be comprised by an exhaustive knowledge." (Stăniloae 1997: 205-206)

"The Roman-Catholic Church manifests, through the teaching regarding the contemplation of the divine essence, rather a confidence in the full recognizability of God's essence, namely a cataphatic affirmation nigh to the natural rationalism and to treating God as an object submitted to the natural rationality; secondly, it manifests by this a static idea about the knowledge of God; thirdly, the idea that the knowledge of God, by being a matter of correction reasoning and not a matter of communion, it no longer depends on accomplishing the communion amongst all the ones who believe, after the final judgment. Therefore, the full happiness of the perfect knowing it can be achieved by the soul immediately after death, in an isolation of the rationality, or in some sort of crossing of the spirit from the category as person on an impersonal plan." (Stăniloae 1997: 206)

"Through the teaching regarding the contemplation of the divine essence, the Roman Catholic Church tried to uphold the Catholic teaching that the souls' fate is definitely and fully established at the individual judgment: the saints receive the whole happiness, the unrepentant sinners receive the whole punishment, and the sinners who repented for their sins and who confessed their sins, but they still have unpaid temporal punishments, they go to purgatory where, after being automatically cleaned up by a material fire, or quasi-material, endure by them like they would be some objects, they will surely surpass their sufferance; this is for during this cleaning up they are in the state of grace and they are sure that they will reach at the contemplation of the divine essence. Fixing the definitive fate of the souls through the individual judgment no longer grants any role to the idea of communion in definitely determining the souls' faith" (Stăniloae 1997: 206-207)

"The reason why in the Eastern teaching the happiness and the torments from after death, they cannot be full before resurrection, because of the absence of the body, it loses at its turn the importance for the Catholic theology, by the fact that the souls who suffer in hell, in addition to the spiritual torments they also suffer physical torment, and the soul's from purgatory can suffer the external torment of the cleaning fire concomitantly to a state of grace. This means considering the soul as a physical element, an objectual one." (Stăniloae 1997: 207)

“Thus, besides individualism and abstractionism, the third implication related to the Catholic teaching about not discerning between the happiness and the torments receives by the souls without body, and those received after resurrection, teaching based on considering the happiness as a rather philosophical-rational contemplation of the divine essence as object, it is some sort of general materialization of the soul.” (Stăniloae 1997: 207)

“In the teaching of the Roman-Catholic Church, the relation between man and God ceases to be a relation of communion or of non-communion, namely a relation characteristic to the person. Some souls contemplate God as essence, through an impersonal, transcendent rationality, in which the spiritualization culminating in love it has no role. It might be that in connection with this teaching it has been developed the apparition of the transcendental impersonal rationality of the occidental philosophy. The happiness of this contemplation is on an impersonal order, while the eternal material punishments suffered by other souls, or the cleaning up through a quasi-material fire, proportional as time and intensity with their stains, makes those too as some objects. This mentality sees everything in an objectual spirit. The cleaning fire of the purgatory ceases automatically when the stain has been erased, but it cannot be made by God to operate the cleaning more quickly or more slowly, accordingly to some modifications occurred in the conscience of the souls submitted to that fire. This makes out of God too, a less personal reality, nigh to the pantheistic essence submitted to some laws. The man’s character as subject and the God’s character as Subject, it is, by and large, gravely disregarded. The sin is reckoned rather as an external stain than an attitude of conscience namely as a relation between the human subject with the divine Subject. It is curious that this fire which action God cannot intervene in, it can be made to act more quickly through the papal indulgences. But it might be here too, on the measure that not the prayer, but the decree from distance eases the fate of these souls without entering a personal communion with each of them, it appears the force of a supra-personal institution which works through the intervention of its representative.

Summarizing, we can say that in this case the man contemplates God as object and God lets the man to be treated like an object, and therefore they make one another as object, meaning that they are conceived in essence as objects.” (Stăniloae 1997: 207-208)

“Out of the Catholic conception it turns out that the souls’ fate is established through the individual judgment of God – done at its turn according to the strictly juridical criterion – as a state not giving, after that, the possibility either for a manifestation of freedom both from God and from the souls. The ones condemned to hell they remain in hell in the same full condemnation, while the ones sent in paradise they eternally remain in the same state of perfect happiness, granted them through a judgment of judicial character. The ones who die after confessing their heavy sins, which eternal punishments have been forgiven of, but who hadn't enough time for paying for the temporal punishments, required by their light or heavy sins, they go to purgatory, where they come out from automatically after they will have paid in the purgatory's fire for these sins. Being established in a juridical manner, immovably, in hell, subjected to an automatic juridical-objectual purification in purgatory, philosophically-impersonally lost in the contemplation of the divine essence in paradise, any connection between those souls and the believers from on earth, any influence of the people from on earth through their prayer it is excluded, as it is excluded also any help of these ones through the prayers of the saints, and consequently any relieving of the fate of the ones from hell or from purgatory through the prayer of the saints and of the believers from on earth." (Stăniloae 1997: 208)

"Unlike this Catholic fixity of the hell and automatic processing represented by purgatory, in the report between God the souls, after the individual judgment, the Orthodox teaching is characterized by a certain fluidity, in which the freedom which the freedom keeps a role in, for the love keeps a role too. The souls from paradise can help the souls on earth and from hell through their prayers many souls from hell being possible liberated through the prayers of the saints and of the ones on earth, and the purifying machine of the purgatory doesn't exist." (Stăniloae 1997: 208)

"To the juridical-objectual fixity and lacking of movement state of the soul, the Eastern teaching opposes with a personal report, a spiritual one, a dynamic-communitarian report between God and man, and amongst all the ones who passed away, and the people on earth, a fact that has as consequence a state not-fully established in a full happiness or unhappiness of the souls after the individual judgment and, that's why, a difference between this state and the state from after the universal judgment, which will be a definitization in the full happiness or unhappiness. The communication between the living one and the departed ones, between the believers from on earth and the saints, it is reflected in the Liturgy too." (Stăniloae 1997: 209)

"Because of the saints do not like to be honored and praised, it doesn't mean we mustn't do this. We honor the saints in order to praise Christ, Whose work has proven its efficacy through its fructification in the saints; we honor the saints by honoring the criterion according to which we must work ourselves too. The Protestant world by refusing to honor the saints, it manifests a total mistrust in the man's capacity of making through the human nature fruitful and shown the work of Christ and the obligation of everybody to co-work with Christ in order His work to fructify within them. It is manifested through this a skepticism not only referring to man, but also to the efficacy of Christ. The people's salvation isn't done without the active encounter between God and man, through an act of God's power upon man, as upon a log, either in this life, or in the future life. The total depreciation of the man, as creature of God, it cannot be accepted by God." (Stăniloae 1997: 213)

"Berdiaeff, (...) influenced by the existentialist philosophy, he separated too much the order of the relation of the human subjects and the order of the objects. He doesn't see the possibility that the human subjects to communicate with one another in a full mode through the reality of the objects, within their frame; he doesn't see the possibility to transfigure this frame through spirit and to contribute in order this frame to become transparent to God. We are mentioning here that a mode of making the objects transparent to communion it coincides to considering them as gifts and words of God's love for us and with using them commonly, as such. Beside this, Berdiaeff reckons that the human subjects are being accomplished especially in the creation acts as that of literature, philosophy etc. But we must recognize that each believer can transfigure the objective order through all his deeds having as source his faith and his love; and through all of them, he can die to a life submitted to the objects. It is what Saint Apostle Paul says: "Together with Christ I has crucified myself, and since now not I, but Christ lives within me" (Gal. 2: 20); or: "For always we the living ones are given to death for Jesus, in order to the life of Christ also to be shown within our body" (2 Col. 4: 2). This death and this resurrection one cannot be accomplished only through the power of the own spirit which is within man, as the mentioned thinker tells us, by the fact that he exclusively values the artistic creations, the literature and the philosophy, but by the power of the Ghost of Christ. And this is shown in any deeds of love towards God and towards our fellow humans. "Always we bear the death of Lord Jesus within our body, for the life of Jesus to be shown within our body" (2 Cor. 4: 10). Without appropriating the Lord's death by dying for God towards everything is evil and egotistical within us, we cannot achieve the new life with Christ; the less we can prepare ourselves for the resurrection with Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 245-246)

"It is curious that Berdiaeff, by denying the value of the objective order from history, he grants so much value to the artistic and philosophical achievements which at their turn take place in history. Actually, these ones are, at least partially, a common work of transfiguration of the objective creation, making the creation transparent to God and to our fellow humans. That's why the history will be judged as whole, on the measure which it contributed to this transfiguration of the world in. And each individual will be judged according to the measure which he contributed to this transfiguration in, transfiguration consisting in making the structures of the love and of the divine spiritual beauty transparent in the inter-human relations in the cosmic frame. These beauties discovered in this sense by individuals and by peoples within world, they will become eternal as consummate in the future life: the paintings of Voroneț¹⁸⁶, the Occident's domes, the Beethoven's symphonies, or the relations of profound humanity and righteousness performed by people as expressions of the divine-human spirituality, taking place in history. "And the gentiles will walk in the light of the Lamb's torch and they will bring in the stronghold of the Lamb their jewels and their treasures" (Apoc. 21: 24, 26). Thus, the waiting for the universal judgment is an important stimulation factor of the creation within world, of each one's participation to the common work given to the world by God, in order to make the relations amongst people and the creation transparent to God." (Stăniloae 1997: 246)

"P. Florensky says that like the future life is a life unveiled in the Holy Ghost, likewise its anticipations in the existence on earth are also elevations into the Holy Ghost, but elevations which cannot have either duration or fullness as long as the life on earth lasts. It cannot be otherwise." (Stăniloae 1997: 246)

"Afanasieff has the same dualistic vision upon history as Berdiaeff does. In his vision, in history's bosom permanently coexist two eons. Neither according to him history advances towards an end. But he identifies in a more accentuated manner one of the history's components to the life in Christ. Properly-said, this component isn't a part of the history, but it is beyond history, though it is concomitant to it. He affirms the existence of two "eons": one "new" and one "old, or of the world, which do not influence on one another." (Stăniloae 1997: 247)

"Today, the Protestant theology discovers at its turn through some of its representatives, a positive dynamic aspect in the history's movement, as for instance Jurgen Moltmann does. Though the fundamental Protestant teaching is that during this life we have nothing out of the Christ life of grace, but we only have a promise (promissio), the Protestant theologian Moltmann no longer draws out of this teaching the conclusion of a resignation in the conditions of a life obeying the evil, but that of a struggle with the evil's structures from this world." (Stăniloae 1997: 247)

"The conception upon history as reality advancing towards the Kingdom of God through increasingly righteous social orders, it is upheld by some Catholic theologians, but not in such clear terms as some of the Protestants theologians do, as for instance Moltmann. It seems that these theologians leave the irreducible dualistic vision upon history, inherited from the Blessed Augustine." (Stăniloae 1997: 247-248)

¹⁸⁶ A holy Romanian monastery painted on the external walls with exquisite paintings.

“This new Protestant and Catholic understanding of the history isn’t too far either from the Orthodox understanding. It comprises some worthy to be mentioned elements: 1) The history is led by Christ, as a whole, towards the Kingdom of God, through the social progresses and through the reforms of the history’s institutions. That’s why the Christians are compelled to contribute to these progresses and reforms. These progresses and reforms aren’t indifferent for the history’s coming closer to the Kingdom of God; 2) The history still won’t reach the eschatological perfection through itself. This is for in the earthly duration of the history there lasts the death with many of its worries and sadness; therefore, one cannot reach within history’s frame either to the consummate communion with everybody. That’s why the creation needs an end. 3) That’s why the Christians owe to participate to all the actions of improving the relations amongst people, not only in a particular frame, but also on the social general plan. The Christians must develop a sense of their historical responsibility in addition to their sense of responsibility for their individual fellow human, for through this they help the entire mankind to advance towards the eschatological perfection. But because of this perfection won’t be obtained except at the end of the history, into God, and the history’s advancing towards that perfection is upheld by God Himself, the Christians must accomplish in the frame of all the social relations and structures, even of the most advanced ones, the connection with God, by overcoming the pure human aspect of these relations. They must place just in these relations and structure the sentiment of being responsible in front of God, for their fellow humans, in order these relations not to remain with a character of external, formal equality, or, simply, a human-sentimental equality. This is for this one doesn’t fill their life with fullness and it doesn’t escape the people from death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 248-249)

“Unlike the general Christian teaching and its mentioned interpretations, which in principle see the on compatibility between eschatology and history, there are conceptions seeing the eschatology as an even taking place within history, namely in the final part of the history. These visions reconcile in an impossible manner the history’s relativity with the absolute appeared within history. These conceptions reckon the Christ parousia as an event from the end of the world, but not beyond the present world (die entgeschlichtliche Parusie, P. Althaus). The representatives of these conceptions affirm that as the world was the place of battle for Christ and for His Kingdom, so the world must be His place of victory too; as that he has shown Himself humiliate within world, so he must show Himself triumphant too; that the history would receive its full sense only thus, and it would reject its enigmatic character, by being lightened at the end by the apparition of the Lord in glory. These conceptions affirm that if the work of God within world it means a continuous affirmation of the world, he will have to appear at the world's end too, bringing a final yes for it and showing that God can appear within world, in the whole His brightness, that the world is able to show God, His kenosis not depending on the time's structure, but on the will of God to abstain Himself from His full manifestation in order to let the man the possibility to decide himself, in full freedom, for Him." (Stăniloae 1997: 250-251)

"Saying that the sense of the creation's history it will be unveiled only through the divine revelation of Jesus on His second coming, and only through the judgment He will utter upon history and that only that judgment will fully show the importance of the history, it is right. But on what ground they deduce that this full unveiling of the history's meaning, and so this clarification of the God's position towards everything that has been done within it, it must be at its turn an event in this history, while any event in this history must borrow the history's relative character?" (Stăniloae 1997: 251)

"The theories reckoning the Parousia as an event in the final part of the history, which seen the eschatological, the consummation as a phase of the history, they conceive the Kingdom of Heavens as a developed mode of the present world, or they conceive this world as an undeveloped mode of the Kingdom of Heavens. They do not see the transcendent character of the Kingdom of Heavens, or the irreducible dualism between this world and the Kingdom of Heavens." (Stăniloae 1997: 251)

"More accentuated is the mistake of the so-called Chiliasts who are waiting for a kingdom of Christ of a thousand of years on earth, before the final judgment. In their conception, only the righteous will enjoy this Kingdom, both the dead ones who will resurrect when this Kingdom will begin, and the living ones, who will be added to those ones. The sinners who won't be died they will spend one thousand of years, lock up in a dungeon – though, according to another opinion, the righteous ones will spend that time with Christ in heavens, while satan and with its angels and the living sinners will spend that time on the deserted land. At the end of the millennium satan will be released and the sinners will resurrect. Satan with its angels and with the sinner will rebel against Christ and against the righteous ones but they will be utterly destroyed. According to another opinion, the dead sinners will resurrect for the final judgment only after the last rebellion of satan and of the sinners from earth it will be defeated." (Stăniloae 1997: 251-252)

"In all the millenary variants, the Kingdom of Heavens has a historical character according to the mode of the present life. The sinners will start against the citizens of this Kingdom a physical or spiritual fight, on earth, so that on a given moment they can clash, because of taking place, at least then, some sort of coexistence between the righteous and the sinners. The sects arguing this, they aren't content only with the spiritual happiness of the spiritual life, but they want at least a thousand years period before that, while there will be a happiness as close as possible to the worldly one." (Stăniloae 1997: 252)

"The Chiliasts' teaching means a reiteration of the hopes of the people of Israel who were waiting for Messiah in order to reestablish His earthly kingdom destroyed by the Babylon's Kingdom. This teaching wrongly interprets the prophecies from the Old Testament which speak about a future reestablishing of the glory of Israel through Messiah. One can say that after the return from Babylon that kingdom hasn't been really established again, as predicted Isaiah (49: 23; 61: 5-6), Daniel (chapters 2 and 7), and Ezekiel (chapters 40-48). Therefore, these prophecies must be fulfilled. This teaching hasn't been adopted only by some sects, but also by some Protestant theologians, as for instance: Coccejus, Bengel, Öttingen, Merken, I. Th. Beck, Auberlen, R. Rothe, Martensen, Hoffmann, Delitzsch, Frank etc." (Stăniloae 1997: 252)

"The Chiliasm means, by and large, the waiting for a future provisory consummation of the Kingdom of God on earth through an unmediated intervention of the Ascended Christ. Its multiple variants can be reduced to two general forms: the moderate Chiliasm and the strict Chiliasm. The first one is waiting for the coming of Christ at the end of the history's consummation period, while the last one is waiting for this to take place at the beginning. The moderate Chiliasm is represented by Spener, with his hope "in better future times"; by Bengel, with his waiting for a time of Church's victory and flourishing; and by Delitzsch and Martensen, who speak about a "spiritual" coming of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 252)

"According to the moderate Chiliasm the people of Israel will convert themselves to Christendom, and there will come a great time for mission, the Christendom will gain power to dominate the world, and the Christian ideas will cross through the human life and institutions. All of these will be the effect of the Ascended Christ and of His reign, which He will exercise in an unseen manner from heavens, through His spiritual parousia. But His personal visible coming hasn't taken place yet, and neither the resurrection nor the transfiguration of the Christian community." (Stăniloae 1997: 252-253)

"According The strict Chiliasm of Hoffmann, Frank, and Auberlen, the millennium starts with the coming of Christ, with the resurrection and with the transformation of the believers, and with the transfiguration of the community on earth. The returned Christ will exercise an imperial mastery on earth. This Christ's mastery on earth it will coincide to the kingdom promised to Israel. "The Chiliasm and the waiting for Israel they belong together" (Auberlen). Israel will return from diaspora, in Canaan, and through Christ who is now returned, the kingdom will be reestablished. Israel will exercise the reign "under a messianic king, promised to Israel" (P. Althaus). Israel will be the center of the kingdom of a thousand years. Israel will walk again in front of the entire mankind. Like the priest relates to the believers, so Israel will relate to the world: by mediating the mankind's reports with God. Thus, the Jews are our teachers in the godlike things. For they are too in the New Testament." (Stăniloae 1997: 253)

"Some theologians, especially the Catholic ones, they believe that the sinners' resurrected bodies won't be elevated in the sky, but they will remain on earth like for being submitted to some sort of despise. But Saint John Damascene says that "the eternal fire won't be material, as the one we know". It is hard to us to believe that God uses His creation as means of eternal tormenting. We have shown that the "world" which the sinner will live in it is a hallucinating weakening of the world, a covering of the world in the total individualistic darkness which the sinners sunk themselves in. Of course, this hallucinating disfiguration of the world must have some connection with its material reality, since the sinners' bodies themselves, as resurrected bodies and having a material consistency it cannot be lacking any external material basis." (Stăniloae 1997: 287)

"The Orthodox Church consider the salvation isn't ended in Christ's death on the cross, as juridical equivalent for the offence which the mankind brought to God, but it consists in the union with the crucified and resurrected Christ, of the people who believe in Him, in order they to be able to die to the sin and to resurrect. Consequent to this, the Orthodoxy grants the Holy Mysteries a place of great importance in the salvation's oikonomia, as means this union of the people with Christ is done through. In this the Orthodox differs from Protestantism, in which the word about Christ it is almost sufficient for the man to be able to decide to believe that Christ exonerated by His death our salvation, for through this faith the man to personally benefit this salvation. The mistrust in the possibility of the man's union with Christ, namely in the importance of the Holy Mysteries, the Protestantism has inherited it from Catholicism, because this one no longer saw in the Holy Mysteries but the means through which it is granted an equivalent of the merit achieved by Christ through His death, in the form of a created grace, stored and administrated by the Church." (Stăniloae 1997: 4)

"Some representatives of the Occidental Christendom feel the need to turn back to the understanding the early Christendom had for nature, as means which Christ works upon the man through. But in order to do that, there is necessary an understanding of Christ as Logos of the things, and of Subject of the sanctifying action of the things, through the Holy Ghost. The nature as it is after the sin it cannot be an environment for Christ's working upon the man, but there must be a nature sanctified through the Holy Ghost, a transfigured nature, which in its energetic essence – as the modern physics have discovered – to be filled up with the energy of the Holy Ghost, liberated from the energy of the evil ghosts.” (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

“The Holy Ghost works the sanctification especially in the man's favor, by conveying him the purity of the spiritualized body of Christ, necessary to be appropriated by the man. Can the Occidental man to come back to this holiness live that implied an asceticism? The power of Christ irradiates out of His sanctified body upon our body and therefore upon our soul as well, through a nature which He sanctifies right through His body, either at the moment of committing the Mystery, or before, as in the case of the Baptism of the Anointment, when the water of the Holy Chrism are have been sanctified through previous prayers.” (Stăniloae 1997: 13)

“If the matter which the Ghost of Christ works through, in Mysteries, it is a matter He sanctifies it, then one won't see any separation between the Mystery's matter and the grace or the power of Christ which is being imparted through it. This dualistic conception has been introduced in the Occidental theology after it separated itself through scholastics from the thinking of the Church Fathers and of the New Testament, by no longer seeing the intimate connection of the Logos, or of the embodied Word and of His work, with the nature. The matter isn't only a symbol separated from grace, which occasions and intuitively interprets the unseen work of the grace, but it is itself full of the godlike power. Only out of this understanding of the ontological connection with the divine Logos and with the human body of Christ and of ours, the Protestantism ended to totally separate the work of God within the soul, from the material means, and therefore they ended up removing the Mysteries.” (Stăniloae 1997: 13)

“The scholastic division of the Mysteries in their external par and internal part it is only the product of an abstracting process and it must be regarded like that, and it mustn't be understood in the sense that the external part can be thought as separated from the grace of from the work of Christ. What one can see it isn't only how much one can see, but it is also the unseen grace working through the seen matter and gesture.” (Stăniloae 1997: 13)

“Base on the fact that through Mysteries, the Church it is extended, it is being maintained, and it is growing up, in the Catholic theology it is highlighted lately the fact that the main role of the Mysteries is their function of unifying all the believers within Church. This role is sometimes even so much accentuated so that the union with Christ passes on the second plan – despite the fact that the union with Christ, according to the Church Fathers, being a union of the human subject with the Christ's body, it produces within the believer a common feeling with the Christ's one, Christ becoming the content of the believer's feeling." (Stăniloae 1997: 14)

"The theologian Karl Rahner goes all the way to reckon that not Christ was the one Who has instituted the Mystery, but the Church has done it. According to him, Christ has founded a sole sacrament: the Church, with its power of activating its sacramental nature in diverse sacraments. The Church is the continuation, the persistence of the real eschatological presence of the grace's victorious will which has been once for all introduced within world through Christ... As such persistence of Christ within world, the Church is actually the original sacrament (Das Ursakrament), the origin point, of the sacraments in the proper meaning of the word." (Stăniloae 1997: 14-15)

"The actualization of the victorious eschatological salvation which the world is given to, by the Church, and which all the people are offered with, it is effected for a man taken individually, in an act of the Church, on behalf of that man, which the Church heralds through, the character of grace of this salvation; and this act of the Church bears, necessarily, in itself, the essence of the Church's structure. This act is sacramental for it corresponds to the Church as original sacrament of the creation. Starting from Church – as original sacrament – one could see that the existence of the real sacraments in the most strict and traditional meaning, it is not necessary to be daily founded on a specific word the historical Jesus spoke to us with, explicitly, about a specific sacrament... Instituting a sacrament comes also from the fact that Christ has founded the Church with its character of original Sacrament. Rahner just draws the logical conclusion out of the apostolic teaching about the grace as grace's created effect, of Christ's death, put at the disposition of the Church, and therefore being detachable from Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 14-15)

"It is true that the children cannot offer to Christ the confession of their faith as openness of their being for Christ to dwell within them. But they belong to a Christian family which lives within Church. Between their soul's life and that one of the family and of the Church, it hasn't been raised yet the barrier of an individualistic conscience. This spiritual life penetrate unimpeded increasingly more within their being. This life penetrates as well the children of Neo-Protestant denominations, who do not receive the children's Baptism, for being preoccupied with Christ Who exists in those denominations. If the children of those denominations decide for the faith belonging to those ones, they will do it on the basis of the faith which has penetrated them starting at their youngest age." (Stăniloae 1997: 41)

“The Christian Occident, by letting itself to be led by the same exact rational divisions of the stages of the human life, which led in some denominations to the postponing of the Baptism until an individual conscious age – better said an individualistic one –, so that they postpone the confirmation, as they call this Mystery, until the beginning of the adolescence, when the man can actually start - as they say – to militate for Christ; they do not notice that a child before this age he can irradiate around himself Christ, through his spiritual beauty according to Christ. Actually, who can indicate the precise moment when starts the co-working of the human being with God in order to walk the road of the man’s consummation and, by this, in order to make Christ knows, according to his power, to the people whom he lives amongst? It doesn’t start this dialogue of the man with Christ in a phase still hidden to the mature ones, only because the child doesn’t have the possibilities of expressing the experience he lives, by using too rich words, namely since the earliest phase of his childhood? Doesn’t the child pray to God often cleaner than the adult does, isn’t the child lit up by a holy impetus and of a wonderful cleanness against the evil, and doesn’t the child become enthusiastic for the good things more than the majority of the adults? Mustn’t be the child helped from his early childhood to become habituated to the good things? What if we would refrain ourselves from any advise we feel necessary to give it to the child in order to accustom him to the good things? If we reckon as necessary and useful such advises, it means the child will be able to follow them. Considering as too much to postpone the Impartation until after Confirmation, namely until the child is fourteen years old. Considering that it is too much to wait until the child is fourteen years old, the Roman-Catholics impart the children starting with seven years old, namely before Confirmation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 48-49)

“In Occident they use to officiate this Mystery through the bishop’s laying of hands, according to the example from Acts 8: 15-17, where the Apostle Peter and John by laying their hands, they impart the Holy Ghost in Samaria, to the newly baptized ones by deacon Philip. In East it has been inherited still from the time of the Apostles, on the basis of the places mentioned before, the practice of officiating this Mystery through the anointing with the Holy Chrism. The last one has the advantage that makes possible the officiating of the Mystery immediately after Baptism, because today the bishops can be found at great distances – as actually it has been committed after Baptism either by the Apostles Peter and John in Samaria. But the last one lets the bishop too, a place in committing this Mystery, for the Chrism the priests anoints the baptized ones with, it is sanctified by the episcopate of a autocephalous Church, as a manifestation of the unity or of the catholicity of the Church into the Ghost of Christ, as it was shown at the Descent of the Holy Ghost on the Day of Pentecost, upon the apostles who were there together. Besides that, through anointing it is more adequately imagines the imprinting of the Holy Ghost in man's bodily limb and organ, and the persistence of this imprinting." (Stăniloae 1997: 53)

"Christ is present, in a real manner, in Eucharist, with His sacrificed and resurrected body and blood, for only by this we can die and resurrect together with Him; and only through this death and resurrection together with Christ we become partakers to the eternal life. If this dependence of our salvation on the together-dying and resurrecting with Christ hadn't existed, the Lord's presence within us with His sacrificed and resurrected body wouldn't have been necessary, so that the Eucharist wouldn't have been necessary too. That's why, through the theory about our salvation through the juridical expiation of Christ, for us, the Protestantism has removed the teaching about the presence of Christ in Eucharist and, anyway, the Protestantism doesn't recognize the presence of Christ, in state of sacrifice, in the Eucharist; and the Catholicism doesn't succeed in giving a complete and clear explanation to the necessity of the Eucharist." (Stăniloae 1997: 65)

"Some Catholic theologians spoke about three bodies of Christ after the Eucharistic transformation: His body as Person, His mysterious body or the Eucharistic community, and the Eucharistic body. But other Catholic theologians noticed, rightly, that in reality it is about only one body, for the mysterious body is only a prolongation of the personal body, and the Eucharistic body is the body itself of the Word, Who offers Himself in the continuity of the churchly community, as a prolongation of His mysterious body, which annuls the distinction between the churchly community and the body of Christ as Person, out of which His mysterious body is being continuously formed." (Stăniloae 1997: 69)

"The Protestantism, by reckoning that the problem of our salvation has been solved in a juridical manner, by the fact that Christ endured death on our behalf, it is natural to them not only to no longer admitting the Eucharist as sacrifice, but also to take away the foundation of all the Mysteries, of which interior content it is the power of the actual state of sacrifice of Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"The Catholicism, by considering the problem of the salvation as solved in a juridical manner, it has still maintained the Eucharist as Sacrifice and all the other Mysteries, on the basis of the old Church's tradition, but it no longer places the Eucharistic Sacrifice in connection with the actual state of Sacrifice which Christ is in, but it employs all sorts of unconvincing explanations of the character of Sacrifice of the Eucharist and it no longer sees the tight connection between the impartation of the believers with Christ and His state of Sacrifice; but it sees it only like union, out of love, with Christ, as source of power, of joy, and of resurrection. Thus, the Catholicism separates the Eucharist's character of Mystery from its character of sacrifice and, in accord to that, the Catholicism no longer sees either in the other Mysteries the aspect of sacrifice. And this is related to the elimination of the ascetic efforts from the believers' life, being affirmed only the importance of the signs of power, by not noticing that a power lacking the ascetic feature it becomes a power of worldly, non-spiritual character." (Stăniloae 1997: 71)

"Not knowing about this state of sacrifice, because the juridical theory of the satisfaction it doesn't comprise this aspect, the Catholic theologians searched for artificial solutions and not-engaging for our life, for answering the question about the essence and the moment of the act of sacrifice in Eucharist; namely placing it at proskomidy or at impartation, of reducing the sacrifice act to the countenance of the body and blood separated on the way of the bread and of the wine, of the intentional destruction through transformation, of the transposition of Christ in the state of food etc." (Stăniloae 1997: 77)

"The priest gives firmness to his feeling and to the believer's feeling that through him works Christ, through the importance had in his religious service by the Church's prayer for community. The importance is implied in his humbleness, manifested in the prayer authorized by Christ and by the Church. In this is felt the presence of Christ. Through the Church's prayer the priest obeys Christ, by expecting everything from Him, but the priest unites himself with Christ too. And the priest doesn't obey and doesn't unite himself as private person, but as representative of the community, for he prays for community and the community prays in him. He widens his heart in prayer so that he feels that he comprises the community which prays in his prayer. That's why, in the calling of the Holy Ghost upon gifts, there is also the community in the priest, a community which offers itself, through prayer and through Eucharistic gifts, to God. Therefore, it is necessary the community's unity in the right faith and in the prayer resulting from the right faith, and therefore it is also necessary the community's unity with Christ into the Holy Ghost, unity expressed and upheld by the priest's prayer and by his belief that the Holy Ghost performs the transformation of the gifts in the same time with the sanctification of the community. That's why the Orthodox Church cannot admit the religious service of the Eucharistic transformation and the impartation with the people belonging to other faiths." (Stăniloae 1997: 79)

"Eliminating the epiclesis from the Catholic liturgy it is related to the diminution of the importance of the priest's and of the community's prayer, in the Eucharistic transformation. And together with this, it came the diminution of the role of the Holy Ghost too. This is for the Ghost works through prayer. The transformation has become the automatic consequence of uttering the Christ's words of instituting the Mystery at the Last Supper, so of some words uttered in the past. Through epiclesis it highlights the importance of the priest's or the bishop's prayer, as expression of the feeling in humbleness of the work of the Ghost of Christ Who works through them, and as means of vibrant living of the community's prayer, united in them and with them, in prayer. The Church's unity is lost where the individuals pray separately, or where they search for a unity of their prayer in the vague momentary feeling, and where the transformation isn't tied to the community's prayer united in Christ, the community that lives this unity in a representative person and who is seen as objective center of the community's convergence. This is the case in Protestantism. The unity weakens also there where the members of the hierarchy use foreign means of prayer in order to maintain the Church's unity in Christ, because in such a case the unity is conceived rather as an impersonal and anti-personal unity, untied from Christ, as in the case of the Catholicism, where also the transformation isn't tied to this unity of the Church, through prayer, with Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 79-80)

"In the Orthodox Church all the Mysteries are committed through the Holy Ghost, invoked through the priest's prayer as prayer of the Church, and as expression of the humble conscience that everything comes from God through the Church's prayer, and therefore his prayer is the Church's prayer and the prayer of each believer, done with the power of the Holy Ghost present within Church, and coming within Church. In the conscience of this humbleness, the priest or the bishop ascertains the fact that the Mystery is being committed consequently to this prayer, by the Ghost of Christ, and they do not declare themselves as the committers. They say: "It is being baptized", and not: "I am baptizing" etc. Although, this humbleness doesn't mean that their persons are annulled, because without person there is no prayer and without person in whom everybody's prayer is being concentrated there isn't concretely accomplished the community's union." (Stăniloae 1997: 80)

"In Catholicism they pass from affirming the individual role of the priest - who rather works through declarations than through prayers - to reckoning that his role in Mysteries isn't indispensable, the Church's unity being seen in a far away person. Related to this, they do not accentuate either the relation of the Mystery's receiver as person with the priest who commits that Mystery as seen organ of Christ. Thus, the Baptism can be committed without priest, outside the Church, even if there is no case of necessity. The Confirmation is committed by the bishop. The Mystery of the Wedding it is done by the ones who marry, the priest being only a witness to it. The ordination is done by the bishop. In Confession the penitent lives a relation with the abstract divine and churchly laws, and not with the face of the priest representing the loving face of Christ. The Holy Unction, as extreme unction of the moribund, it no longer has in the moribund a conscious partner or the relation with the priest. There remains only the Eucharist, in which the priest's role preserves its necessity, but without epiclesis as prayer which accentuates the priest's quality as person who is the center of the community's prayer, the transubstantiation taking place somehow by itself, through the repetition of the Savior's words for instituting the Mystery." (Stăniloae 1997: 80)

"Being the priest's role diminished as person, it decreases also the importance of the receiver's relation and personal engagement with the priest; the receiver is no longer called by his name. The priest only declares: "I am baptizing you", "I am forgiving you", and "the body of Christ". These words can refer to any individual from a uniform and indistinct mass. Exercising a power upon a Church which unity is conceived like that of a mass of people, and not as a unity of the persons who meet each other in prayer, it is related to this way of administrating the Mysteries to some individuals not indicated by their names. The jurisdictional power of the pope, not having it origin and not being instituted by a special Mystery for being exercised, even when it wants to consider itself as a primate in serving, it isn't a primate in prayer, for if this was the case it couldn't be a primate in jurisdiction. And, there cannot be any other sort of primate. This is for the priests and the bishops who are ministrants in prayer they do not reduce the people they are praying for, to a unity of a mass of people. Even more, they pray themselves for one another." (Stăniloae 1997: 80-81)

"The Protestants deny the special ministering priesthood, because they do not consider the presentation in continuation of Christ as sacrifice before the Father, for the believers, and the believers' need for bringing their sacrifice which to be received by Christ Who to unite their sacrifice with His sacrifice. They contest the necessity of continuing the sacrifice of Christ and the necessity of the believer's sacrifice, because of reckoning that the salvation has been obtained through the sacrifice brought on Golgotha, which is the juridical substitutive equivalent of the mankind's sins, once and forever. To them, such an actualization of the sacrifice it isn't necessary for the ones who want to be saved to unite themselves with Christ, the One Who continues to be in state of sacrifice, by no longer living as man to Himself, but to God." (Stăniloae 1997: 81)

"Denying the ministering priesthood, it has at its basis the conception about a salvation accomplished in an exterior mode, in a past moment of the history, the faith being accepted as purely subjective act of the one who want to impropriate this salvation, without any engagement in the stream of the savior work of Christ, as objective work in continuation." (Stăniloae 1997: 81)

“Only the acceptance of the salvation as depending on the objective savior work of Christ, in continuation, it renders the priest necessary as seen organ through whom Christ commits this work in continuation, a work the believer too is involved in with the whole his - seen and unseen - being, or Whom the believers must open themselves, to subjectively as well. And only this acceptance leads to a primacy of jurisdiction. Our salvation depends on the continuation of the work from above, of God, and not on our simple subjective decision of accepting that Christ has saved us on Golgotha, neither on an attribution of Christ’s merits on behalf of us, without prayer. This fact must be concretized in the visible objective work of the priest, through which the Christ’s work attracts in it us too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 81)

“Far from weakening the conscience of the believer that he is in front of God, the priest’s presence within Church with his objective work give firmness to this conscience, by the fact that he makes God felt as real objective instance in front of the man, an instance that is not shaken by the instability of the subjective feelings, about which the one who has them he doesn’t know whether they have or not a corresponding objective content, and therefore an objective reason. But this unmediated presence of Christ with His sacrifice before the believers, and within them, it is, on the other hand, weakened by a primacy of jurisdiction within Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 82)

“The Mystery of forgiving the sins by the Church’s bishops and priests, it has been practiced since the beginning of the Church. The case of Ananias and of Sapphira proved, by deviation, the rule of confessing the mistakes in front of the apostles (Acts 5: 3). It is true that the Epistles of James advise: “Confessing to one another your sins and pray for one another, in order to be healed, for much is able the prayer of the righteous in its work” (Jas. 5: 16). But in this text, as one can notice, it is not said that through this reciprocal confession the believers are liberated from sins. For this, it is necessary forgiveness from God, and this can be granted only by the bishop or by the priest as being chosen and sent by God. The believers only heal to each other, through the reciprocal confession and through the prayer they do for one another, the weaknesses which lead them to the sins they show to each other. Beside this, within Church there is practiced also a forgiveness of the believers amongst themselves, for their spiritual growth. But this is only a condition, for God to give the last forgiveness (The Lord’s Prayer, The Parable of the Two Debtors, Mt. 3: 23-25). The untying the sins it was shown by Saint James in the previous verse as being produced through the priests’ prayer.” (Stăniloae 1997: 84)

“The Church condemned the Montanans, who contested the Church’s right to forgive the killing, the fornication, and the idolatry: the Church also condemned the Novatians, who considered as unforgivable not only the sins mentioned before, but also all the grave sins, and, according to some historians, even the light sins. The Church also condemned the Donatists who affirmed that the traitors (traditores) from the time of the persecutions mustn't be received back in the Church." (Stăniloae 1997: 91)

"In the light of this fact it is understandable what the Orthodox Church cannot accept the intercommunion for. The Eucharist isn't only the Impartation with the Christ's body but, especially, it is the bringing of the sacrifice in common by the ones who are imparted. But this means also their bringing, as sacrifice, in Christ. For this, they must totally identify themselves to Christ and to one another in faith. That's why, before bringing the sacrifice, the community confesses its common faith, and on this basis the community manifests its love in union. After the Creed, the priest says: "May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God-the Father, and the Impartation of the Holy Ghost, to be with you all". The ones who bring themselves as sacrifice, they already are in the communion of faith, and therefore they are in the communion of the Holy Ghost, on the basis of the communion of faith. The penitent must be at his turn reestablished in this communion in order to be able to take part to the bringing of the sacrifice to Christ and to be imparted with the sacrifice." (Stăniloae 1997: 92)

"By any means the presbyters mentioned at the beginning didn't have the meaning of elders, namely of aged persons, or of elected by the community without having a special grace, as the Protestant worlds understands the term, for they had the ministration of shepherding the other believers and they were receiving the Holy Ghost from the apostles, and not from the community (Acts 14: 23; Tim. 1: 6; Tit 1: 5). (The Greek word for "old man" – referring to the age – is: γέρονς)

"It is right that in the New Testament the believers ordained by the apostles, and later by the bishops, they are called "sacrificers" or "sacerdotes" (ιερείς), as there were called the ones from the Old Testament. They are given later the name of priests. The Protestants draw from here the conclusion that they weren't properly-said "priests" (ιερείς), because any sacrifice on which the ministration of "priest" was related to, it has ceased in Christ. In order to justify their refusal of the priesthood, the Protestants were forced to contest the character of sacrifice of the Eucharist. But Saint Apostle Paul declares that the Christians too were having an "altar" on which they were bringing sacrifice (I Cor. 9: 13: θυσιαστήριον). He considered as sacrifice the body and the blood of the Lord, which he opposed to the animal sacrifices, and also to foods and drinks brought to the idols. "The things the pagans are sacrificing, they sacrifice those to the demons, and not to God. And I do not want you to be partakers to the demons. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of the demons; you cannot be imparted at the Lord's table and at the demons' table." (I Cor. 10: 20-21)." (Stăniloae 1997: 106)

“The early Christians called the ministrants as “presbyters” and not as “sacrificers” (ιερείς), because the second was name too tied to the idea of bringers of animal sacrifices with blood. The Christian wanted to distinguish themselves through this new name of the servants of Christ, from the Judaic cult.” (Stăniloae 1997: 106)

“Unlike the Jewish and pagan animal sacrifices, the sacrifice of Christ was actually a spiritual sacrifice (willing self-sacrifice). For it was a permanent spiritual bringing of the Person of the resurrected Christ, and the ones through who it was visibly brought this sacrifice, they must bring themselves spiritually as sacrifices too. That’s why Christ brings Himself as sacrifice in continuation, in order these ones to be added to his sacrifice like Him. And not only them, but all the believers as well. This bringing consisted in a dedication of theirs, to God, in a spiritual mode, towards praising God through words and deeds. But this praise sacrifice of theirs, through words and deeds, it cannot take place without the sacrifice of the Lord’s body and blood in continuation, and without us being imparted with it. Both these things are said in the Epistle towards Hebrews: “We have an altar out of which the ones who minister the tent aren’t allowed to eat... Therefore, through Him, through Christ, let’s bring to the Lord praising sacrifice, namely the fruit of the lips, which extol His name. And let’s not count the benefaction and the generosity” (Hebr. 12: 10-15, 16).” (Stăniloae 1997: 106-107)

“For they have in common with the believers their spiritual bringing forth out of the power of the sacrifice of Christ, the Christian ministrants are no longer separated like in the mode the priests from the old law were, or like the pagan ones were. This is another reason for it was avoided at the beginning of the Church to call them with the name of sacerdotes, used in the Old Testament and in paganism.” (Stăniloae 1997: 107)

“Preserving and preaching the integral teaching of Christ it depends on the ministration of the Ordination stages, so that the Orthodox Church cannot recognize as valid the ordinations of other Churches which have altered this teaching.” (Stăniloae 1997: 112)

“There cannot take place either a succession of the grace, to the ordained ones, from the bishops who have fallen from this teaching. Otherwise, we would fall in a magical understanding of the grace; the grace would not be a spiritual force united with the true knowledge about God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 112)

“If the Orthodox Church recognizes as ordained the members of the Catholic and Old-Oriental hierarchy (the problem of the old Catholic hierarchy would deserve a special analyze after our church would make sure that that Christian formation hasn't deviated from the integral teaching), it does this on the basis of the oikonomia, namely in the case of those ones entering the Orthodox Church and completing their faith somehow chipped, from the moment of their ordination." (Stăniloae 1997: 112-113)

"More difficult is to recognize the Anglican ordinations, given the great variety and fluidity in the Anglican Communion, not only in what concerns the teaching, but also in what regards the Mysteries. This is for to some of them the teaching about Mysteries has got diluted, so that the Priesthood isn't reckoned as necessary by all of them. For now, the Orthodox Church waits for the Anglican Community to advance towards more unity and firmness in teaching, in a spirit of closeness to the Orthodox teaching." (Stăniloae 1997: 113)

"The fact that the Ordination makes the ones who have it capable of conveying to other Church's believers the grace of the Mysteries not out of a personal worthiness, but due to their quality as representatives of the Church and as confessors of the faith, it is one of the explanations of the Church's teaching about the non-repetition of the Mystery of the Ordination and about the coming back of the priests and of the bishops who fell in heresies and who were defrocked, and who now enter back the Church's bosom. The capacity of validly committing the Mysteries which they have been invested with, through their getting out from the Church's ambience of grace, that capacity has become non-working, but it hasn't been totally abolished within them." (Stăniloae 1997: 113)

"What deserves to be memorized from Karl Rahner, it is the finding out of a positive purpose of the death upon the human nature itself, a fact that was absent to the Catholic and Protestant theologies from before, which were understanding the death as simple payment or juridical expiation granted to God. The Anglican theologian E. L. Mascall says regarding to this new understanding of the death, done by Catholicism: "what often it was absent it is the recognition that the death is an act that fulfills the person who dies, an act that includes everything and it engages us personally". (Stăniloae 1997: 151)

"One must notice that this power of restoring the whole cosmos through death, it is due to the fact that through it, one reaches not to a material foundation of the cosmos, but beyond cosmos, through the spirit penetrated by God, which still remains in a connection with the material foundation of the cosmos. Although, this understanding of the death presented by Rahner and especially by Boros, it doesn't seem to us as totally corresponding to the Christian understanding of death, especially to the Orthodox understanding, it still comprises elements worthy to be noticed." (Stăniloae 1997: 151)

“From Orthodox point of view there can be formulated some objections to the Rahner’s and Boros’s vision upon death. Firstly, understanding the death as accomplishment of the earthly life it needs some completions and nuances, keeping in mind that the trajectory of the earthly life and the end of the earthly life, they present a large variety. Not all the people reach to take themselves in their own mastery, as persons, in an actual manner. Very numerous people do not have the possibility to do this, not even on a lightning moment of supreme conscience when facing their death, because of being caught by death unexpectedly, or after they have entered a helplessness of their conscience, they no longer being able to think at what is happening to them; or they have reached the total disregarding of it through faithlessness. That’s why the spiritual writings recommend us to always be prepared, namely accomplished as person, masters on ourselves on each moment of our earthly life, even if we can always deepen this state. But not all the people do this.” (Stăniloae 1997: 151-152)

“Karl Rahner reaches somewhat this interpretation of the death with Christ, as the force that consummates the man, prepared by a death with Christ during the whole life on earth. He does this, by declaring that the scholastic theory of the sacrifice of Christ as satisfaction brought to God for the ancestral sin it is insufficient. Because of, in this case, our salvation wouldn’t be understood as our achievement. But Rahner doesn’t go in understanding the death as total surrender to God, surrender prepared through a gradual death to the sin, during the life on earth. He sees the death’s value only in obedience. In this sense, Christ dies during the whole His life on earth, or He prepares His final death through a death in development. But through this Rahner remains at the half of the road, between the juridical theory of the satisfaction and the one that sees in death a means for union with God, of the ones who die with Him. The understanding of the death, as proposed by him, it leaves unanswered that question considered by him as unanswered either by the theory of the satisfaction: why it was necessary that Christ’s obedience to the Father to be manifested specifically in the acceptance of the death?” (Stăniloae 1997: 156)

“In the newer Protestant theology, we encounter various judgments on history, but all of them have a unilateral character.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Fr. Gogarten¹⁸⁷ argues that only into the me-you report stays the living reality of the history and the creation in the same time. Responding to the appeal of the fellow human, experienced in the second person, we continue the history and, in the same time, the creation. The history, in its living core, it is an unaltered continuation of the creation. In other's pretension, in my limitation through him, in his presence, I'm experiencing that the world is not an own product, but it is a creation of God, and in this encounter and in the working under its commandment it stays the history too. When I raise myself from the me-you report and I am working under the impulse of a principle produced by my mind, I'm no longer into the history, neither into the unaltered reality of the creation, but I'm into an illusory world, which is built by me. The Revelation propagates therefore only through the intimate report between me and you, because this represents the history and the creation untouched by sin, like it emerged from the hand of God. E. Grisebach argues the same idea on philosophical plan. After him, we do not have the reality but only into me and you meeting, named by Grisebach as present. All the constructions of the thinking, of the studying, and of the deed, into the situation of not-meeting, are individualistic and from dream's world; they are getting out the human being from the present and from his needs, locking him up into a meditation on what it was, namely upon the past.

¹⁸⁷ Ich glaube an den dreieinigen Gott, Jena, 1926.

Emil Brunner¹⁸⁸ thinks that into the content of the human life there exist reports and rules which, being absolutely necessary to this life, they are not products of the sin, but they essentially depend on creation: are "creational rules" (Schöpfungsordnungen). Like all the Reformed, also Brunner inclines towards a pessimistic judgment of human life in history, but however he thinks the historical system of rules - in frame of which the human deeds took place - it has some neutral parts under moral report. This character it had, for instance, by the reports: young-old, child-parent, leader-led, and some of fundamental economical laws of life. The state is also a creational order, but it is affected in some measure by sin. What all "creational rules" have in common is that through them is being expresses the bond with the fellow human, and your obligation towards him. Into the depths of our historical life there are certain clean "creational rules", but, more at the surface, the action of the sin raises up less pure constructions, like it is the State, for example.

Brunner is close to Gogarten and Grisebach by the fact that he sees the life free of sin and the reality of the creational order and of the real history into the man-to-man communion, in the reciprocal spirit of love and in reciprocal serving. But he differs from those ones, because he thinks that in communion reports we do not meet like realities stripped away by all epithets, or by any social determination, like me and you per se. A father remains in his report with his child forever determined by his conscience of being father and, at his turn, the son cannot get out in his encounter with the father, no matter how intimate would it be, from the epithet of being the sun. Unlike the pessimistic judgment which Gogarten and Griesenbach said, Brunner argues that, by being determined by creation, these epithets and these social reports are not sinner per se, though almost never the man updates them in a sinless manner, because neither of the two accomplishes in his pure form the father or the son. However, not only in the sphere of eventual meetings between me and you - like realities which stand beyond any social epithet - there is absent the sin, but also in the region of meetings between me and you like realities qualified and structured through creation. A totally opposed opinion both to Gogarten and to Brunner, it showed H. Thielicke. He expressed in the most rigorous manner the Reformed conception, brought back to life by Karl Barth, according to which there cannot be distinguished anything good in history, not even a remaining rest from the creation's order, from the structure of world like it emerged from God's hand. The whole history is carried on by the wish of selfish affirmation (Selbstseinwollen). No you can ask me within the history's frame, for something that contradicts my will of affirmation; likewise, no one can ask me - in the frame of the history - for something while still remaining disinterested and undisturbed by his selfish will. Me and you cannot meet together directly, but only through the environment of the history, organized in "organizational rules", which are not pretending and are not permitting an unconditioned oblivion of the self in front of the fellow human, but they require only a conditioned can ask me - in the frame of the history - for something while still remaining disinterested and undisturbed by his selfish will. Me and you cannot meet together directly, but only through the environment of the history, organized in "organizational rules", which are not pretending and are not permitting an unconditioned oblivion of the self in front of the fellow human, but they require only a conditioned consideration, having only a role of restraining and regulating our selfish will, which otherwise will conduct to chaos¹⁸⁹. But Thielicke knows about a vertical history too - unlike of this history fallen on all the line called by him as horizontal. This consists in the man's hearing of God's pretensions of unconditioned love for the fellow human, for totally forget about the self. But these unconditioned commandments cannot be fulfilled by the human being. These commandments have no other effect but to unveil to the man the misery of his historical condition, and his identity with the irremediable sinful of the whole historical structure, and to make the man waiting for the salvation - exclusively from God's mercy - into another realm of existence¹⁹⁰, whereas the divine pretention asks us for entering the unconditioned connection with our fellow human, with the overcoming of the historical structure based on own will to affirm ourselves, and this thing we cannot fulfill it, so that the fellow human remains to us as a continuously inaccessible reality. In fact, we cannot meet him and it only remains to us to believe in his existence like “you”. “It is not possible, in the space of the history, a sight of the neighbor. It continuously remains that space between us and in the front of the faith, like an unseen wall which stops us from seeing the fellow human in what he is characteristic... and in this respect, therefore, we are moving through faith and not through sight, within history, and not in the immediacy of the neighbor. “The neighbor” is, strictly saying, a concept and an eschatological purpose, like also the unconditioned pretention bears an eschatological character due to its non-conditionality” (p. 140).

¹⁸⁸ Das Gebot und die Ordnungen, 1932.

189 HELMUTH THIELICKE, Gesichte und Existenz, 1935, p. 124-125. „Wie kann man also davon sprechen dass es in der realen, d.h. unmittelbaren Begegnung mit dem Du und seinen unbedingten Anspruch die Erkenntnis der Schöpfungsordnungen“ möglich sei, wo jene Begegnung selber schon getrübt und in ihrer Unmittelbarkeit gehemmt ist durch die „Schöpfungsordnung“, in deren Rahmen jene Begegnung sich doch bereits vollzog?“. „Die „Schöpfungsordnungen“ immer Strukturelemente unserer gefallenen Geschichtswirklichkeit sind“.

The history is sinful in its entirety and, as there is no possible escape from it, likewise there is no possible raising to that deed which to be clean of sin. Through faith, we know about another realities plan, but the faith, instead of helping us to get closer to that plan, it rather shows us that we are nailed on the wall of moral helplessness, and that we are merged into the structure of history: namely of the sin.

In what it regards both Gogarten and Brunner, we have no doubt that they considered the history like a frame which the Revelation can propagate within. But, either the thesis of Thielicke, as pessimistic as it would seem to us, does not take away from the history this character of it. It is true that he noticed the divine signals descending into the souls like vertical history, but these bright certainties get ignited into the people who live into the history, and they accompany the people in their historical life, even if they have no efficiency on their deed in history. Even if it isn't influenced by the permanent descending or the perpetuation of the Revelation in it, the history it is, however, the necessary environment in which, in the present conditions, the Revelations it is made known to the people. Not any man who participates to the horizontal history is imparts with the Revelation, but, besides this participation, it is impossible to somebody to reach the Revelation.

¹⁹⁰ “Das Du des Anderen – wie es mir im profanen Soil gezielt ist – also immer nur das Du, das im Rahmen der Eigengesetzlichkeiten erscheint und durch sie bedingt ist... Ich bin ihm nur so Welt verpflichtet, als es die Gesetzmäßigkeit des geschichtlichen Lebens zulässt. Das bedingte Maß aber, in dem ich ihm verpflichtet bin, ist nun zugleich das Maß dafür, inwieweit es für mich „Du“ ist.“ p. 136 – 7. „Sein überdüngrter Anspruch, den er im Namen des geoffenbarten Gottes, des Schöpfers, stellt, fordert von mir das Heraustreten aus meiner Geschichtlichkeit zur unbedingten Liebe und Hingabe. Gleichzeitig aber zwingt et mich – um der Unerfüllbarkeit dieser Forderung willen – mich mit der Geschichte zu identifizieren, die zu mir jene unbedingte Hingabe verwehrt und minder mich immer bei sich, d. H. Bei meiner Geschichtlichkeit, festhält.“ P. 139.

But the opinion of Thielicke, according to whom, all the reports into the history are, under the moral-religious aspect, equal and in all of them is manifested, organized, and restricted, the selfish impulse, it cannot be sustained by the Christian point of view. It would be enough to challenge ourselves to Jesus Christ, who is the Son of God living the eternal life. If the historicity had meant sinfulness, the Son of God would have had also Him a sinful earthly existence.

The weakness of the thesis it can be unveiled through more concrete illustrations too. Into the different rules which regulate the human life, like are the family, the state, the school, and the economic reports, just in the edges established by laws and by public opinion there exists a big elasticity in the way the people fulfill and can fulfill their duties. If the single factor which moves in the frame permitted by them, it was the selfish will to affirm the self, we would not encounter the great variety of moral order into the way of human deed within these rules and systems. And this variety results from the scrupulosity more or less accentuated, which the members of these rules understand with - under the pressure of the faith in God, most of the time - to behave within its frame, a scrupulosity which is not often deprived by the minimum requested by the law. From where it comes this scrupulosity, if the single thing which the historical man had been structurally preoccupied with, it would have been the selfish will to affirm itself? The commercial agents know that they are justified through laws to compete with others and their competition can destroy those ones. But among them there are some who refrain themselves from use all the competition that the law allows. Beyond their interests and beyond the law, they see the soul of the another, and they search for communion. A judge or a state's clerk can watch impassibly how a citizen is struck by the law that they apply. But they can show also understanding, can they can share some tears from him, and they can lighten into this official frame the light of the self which search for and wake up into another person the soul which he enters the communion with. Thus, it can be set like a conclusion, the question: why some people compel themselves and succeed to correctly fulfill these duties, and they even exceed the correctness, if the correctness equals incorrectness in history, and if the law which it regulates the selfishness - the only factor of the history - it can be cheated sometimes? How it is applied the possibility of the deed to be variable, under the pressure of the conscience?

From where comes then the tendency of the human being to exceed the minimum requested by the social rules and by laws, and to search for the soul of the fellow human? One cannot say that this search and encounter it stays on the same level, under the moral aspect, with the legal fulfillment of the duties towards them. The evidences are too powerful. The man's striving on this direction it may seem absurd. But one cannot say, also, that through such raisings over what the law imposes into a social rule, it would that rule be abolished, so that such raisings would be dangerous. Not all the people can raise and not permanently. And if all of them can raise above the level required by these rules, these raisings would not be necessities for the historical life.

The history is not a uniform entity, under moral aspect, to be equally sinful in all its sectors and manifestations. Its permanent and fundamental rules are a minimum frame to maintain the people in reciprocal reports and conditionings and, therefore, the rules are superior to chaos. But they are not only brakes for the selfishness, or forms of the selfish transactional reports, but they can be and they are, in the majority of the cases, more or less ladders on which the human being climbs from selfishness to searching for the soul of the fellow human. It exists in the deep of the human being, dormant, a longing for the soul of the neighbor, a longing for the communion with him. But this longing cannot be wakened up and it cannot be satisfied except by the passing of the human being through the frame of the fundamental reports established in "creational rules". The human being cannot reach the report with his fellow human except by following frames of the "creational rules", in order to raise towards the highest steps or even to get out of them. These are not only for keeping us on the spot, or to retain us from the chaos of the selfish impulses, but they are also for educating us and for leading us towards the goal of the true communion. By the fact that somebody is a father, he is not retained only from the selfishness to the fellow humans who are his children, but he is also educated how to really become the most loving soul towards them. But he who does not reach there, that one remains sustained by these rules, in order him not to fall in chaos. Because there is no human being who can live, permanently, in pure communion with each of its fellow humans.

Are these sinful rules, or are they produced by the concern of God after the man's falling into sin, in order to retain him from chaos? If they are sinful and produced by the falling into sin, the history, which is constituted by them, it is also opposed to the creation and, so, it is structurally sinful.

If the pure communion between me and you, it is the perfection, out of the fact that Adam and Eva didn't stay into a communion stripped by all social epithets, we deduce that they weren't put at the edge of the perfection, but on the way towards it. Adam was a man, Eva was a woman, and the report between them was one of husband and wife. They were not sinful. They were kind, but not consolidated into God. This rule is truly creational, and in it is implicitly given all other permanent rules of the human life prolonged into history. They are not occasioned by sin and we do not have, so, any motif to radically separate between the order of the creation and the order of the history.

They weren't given, from the beginning, like barriers against the sin, but like helps towards perfection. Only after that they received this function. Of course that within history it happens in some places and times that these rules cannot be considered like ascents towards the meeting between me and you, towards the raising up of the human being to the forgetfulness of the self, to the selfless serving of the fellow human; it may happen that some people and some social groups reduce the whole history to the more or less correct fulfillment of the legal duties or of these rules, because of not seeing beyond history nothing as depending on the being of the history and on their purpose.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We saw that the newer philosophy represents a turning back towards the objective reality. The second feature of it is the searching for an ultimate transcendence, and not for being known but because in its face and in live report with it the man accomplish himself in his fullness.

Century after century, the philosophy has been trying to answer the questions of the rationality, believing that on their resolving it hangs the clarification of world’s mysteries and problems, and after some time in which exulted against reason, the vital impulse, the irrational, it lately wants to listen not only one part or another from the human being, but the man in his integral unity, like existence. Heidegger, Jaspers, Grisebach, the coryphaei of this philosophy, the want to decipher the human being in its fundamentals; the philosophy is a reflection upon the fundamental ontological categories of human being.

They are saying that the man like a whole, he will wake himself up at what is his own, intimate (zu seiner Eigentlichkeit), namely to the state of existence, which is also one of knowledge of what he is, only if he realizes about the boundary like a whole, by what it is beyond him, by his transcendence¹⁹¹. Only when the man reports himself in his entirety to that transcendence, then he comes to his existence, at his own and ultimate living. When he reports himself to that transcendence only with his rationality, he remains into a numbed being, a hardened one, and without any interior resonance¹⁹².

A border reality, a true transcendence for man it is only that which cannot be absorbed in his content or dominated by him, but it truly remains outside him, like a distress factor, like an opposition towards his own being¹⁹³.

191 EWALD BURGER, Der lebendige Christus, Stuttgart 1933, p. 219 : „Die Frage nach der Existenz einhalt die Frage nach der Transzendenz. Das ist das gemeinsame Kennzeichen aller Existenzphilosophie”.

192 KARL JASPERS, Philosophie, I. Bd.: Philosophische Weltorientierung, Berlin, 1932, p. 23: „Das eigentliche Sein, in einen Weißwaren Sinn nicht zu finden, ist in seiner Transzendenz zu suchen zu der kein Bewusstsein überhaupt, sondern nur jeweils Existenz in Bezug tritt“.

Such a reality it is for Heidegger, the nothingness in which passes us the death. When our being realizes that in his entirety it is destined to death, comes to the understanding of what really it is¹⁹⁴.

Grisebach argues the death is not a true transcendence, because it cannot be produced between our being and death a meeting like between two opposed realities. The man only thinks at death with anticipation. The death is the last point of our evolution, and the thought about it is a meditation from inside us on this natural end¹⁹⁵. Therefore, the death does not raise us to the state of a true existence; it does not get us out from the closed circle of the self, it does not make us living into reality and like we actually are.

The experience of the transcendence it takes place, according Grisebach, only through the meeting face to face with another, with an you; only in this experience the self it is truly urged by a transcendence, it is obliged to decide itself and get out from the illusory and endless contents of his constructions.

Jaspers sees the encounter with the transcendence in every discontent of the self with his experiences` objectifications. The transcendence is experienced in communion with the another, it is accomplished when the self exceeds the fellow human objectification. But it is met in every 193 On the importance of the border, of the transcendence, for the human life order, insist more also Hermann Herrigel in "Zwischen Frage und Antwort, Gedanken zur Kulturkrise", Berlin, 1930: "Die Grenze bezeichnet also nicht die wandelbare, sondern die unwandelbare Form, das letzte, Sicherste, selbstverständlichste". A real community without a commune border between those who are part of it isn't possible: "Gemeinschaft ist da, wo Menschen in einer gemeinsamen Wirklichkeit und einen gemeinsamen Horizont haben". But this border isn't put there by people, from inside the community, but from outside, from a transcendental. "Die selbst Gesetze Grenze, die von innen gesetzte Grenze ist streng genommen ein Widerspruch in sich selber... Wo das gemeinsame nur gesetzt ist, wo es auf Übereinkunft, auf einen Sozialkontrakt beruht, ist auch nur fiktive Gemeinschaft, Interessengemeinschaft... Die Grenze ist hier von innen her bestimmt, aus dem Willen der Einzelnen... Sie gehört also der Gruppe selber an und begrenzt sie nach außen. Wirkliche Gemeinschaft ist dagegen vorzustellen als eine Gruppe, die von außen her, aus dem Jenseits der Grenze, aus dem Absoluten her bestimmt ist und ihre Gestalt erhält. Die Grenze gehört nicht der Gruppe selber an, sondern wird von ihr verstanden als Offenbarung, als Verweichlichung des Absoluten", p. 27 - 31.

194 EWALD BURGER (Der lebendige Christus, p. 219) interprets Heidegger's thought like this: „Die Ganzheit und die Eigentlichkeit des Daseins wird erst offenbar an seinen «Sein zum Tode»“.

195 Gegenwart, 1928, p. 556-8: „Die Begegnung mit dem Tode ist daher keine Begegnung in Wirklichkeit, sondern eine ständig voreilende, bedachte Begegnung... Dieser Tod ist in der Gesamtentwicklung der Wesen ein gleichgültiger, verschwundener Punkt, denn er gilt ja für alle als Gesetz. Der Tod gehört zum Wesen, er ist eine Bestimmung des Wesen, aber er ist niemals ein Transzendenz, ein Anderes, das dem Wesen des Menschen von außen eine wirkliche Grenze setzt... Niemals kann man den eigenen Tod in Wirklichkeit erfahren. Er gibt uns keine Existenz.“

contemplation and work, when the self feels the wreck of all objectified resultants of what succeeded to notice from reality¹⁹⁶. Jasper's philosophy has a religious breath, though the fear of objectification and of determination of what he considered as transcendence, it determined him to avoid any fixation of his experience into a religious doctrine¹⁹⁷.

The closeness of the existential philosophy to the Christendom, it shows in the general fact that also the Christendom claims the totality of the man. It is not addressing only to the mind or to the sentiment, but to entire human being. Repentance, faith, the new life, these are total states and attitudes of the man.

Moreover, we can tell that the tension manifested by the human cogitation into the existential philosophy for a transcendence, it is satisfied only in Christendom.

Only the Christendom accomplishes the full existence, because it is the only one putting the totality of the human being in a report with the true transcendence.

This transcendence, which cannot by any means be made a part of the conscience of the self, it is the person of Jesus Christ.

Heidegger, Grisebach, and Jaspers, they attempted to find the transcendence of the man, but nothing from what they are offering, as such, it is the true transcendence. The death, if it is considered like our being's passing into nothingness, it is not transcendence; the person of the fellow human is not a steadfast transcendence since he dies or we can reduce him to an object of our will. In general, we do not experience in him an ultimate given, a border that we cannot cross over, and a true force that urges us in an absolute way. The cherishing of the fellow humans, like a frontier to be respected, like a transcendence, it stays in proportional report with our faith in God, and with the obligation in which God places us towards our fellow human. Grisebach asks us not to bring any aprioristic element in our encounter with our fellow human, or any principled attitude formulated before, in order to be able to act exclusively according to the necessity of the encounter moment. But on which authority he founds this urge? The experience of the fellow human does not present like an ultimate base, a sufficient one, for such a behavior. Only if we bring the aprioristic element of the faith in God in this encounter with the fellow human, we will experience also him like a border.

196 E. BURGER (Der lebendige Christus, p. 219 – 220) told about Jaspers: „Wie bei Heidegger das letzte Wort das «sein im Scheitern». Das Scheitern ist die entschiedenste «Chiffre der Transzendenz». Mit der verhaltenen Leidenschaft des Existierenden drängt Jaspers immer wieder die Existenz an die Grenze der Transzendenz und währt zugleich jeder Vergegenständlichung der Transzendenz durch die Metaphysik“.

197 E. BURGER, W. C.P. 221: “Jaspers Ausführungen sind, die aber bewusst zurückgehalten wird“.

This is the motif for which Jaspers searched for an actual transcendence, as an ultimate basis of everything: namely God. But the transcendence, what Jaspers searched for like, it can become easy a simple state of the inside, a certain subjective feeling.

Only the togetherness of the three realities, in which Heidegger, Grisebach, and Jaspers, they believed that they found the transcendence of existence, it truly comprises it.

The true transcendence is not experienced by man either in any of his intellectual systems or in his artistic creations. Therefore, out of any of it, it does not detach the force which to set him into a state of frightened seriousness and responsibility; out of any of these, it does not arise to him the true self knowledge, like existence. With all his creations the man behaves in a playful spirit.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The philosophy argues that this reporting to a You, as Jesus Christ, it is not a relating to the true transcendence, because it cannot be a diving into the infinity of God. One must search for God`s infinity into the depths of the self or in the direction of endless deductions of the rationality. Searching for God into a you, even in Jesus Christ, it seems to “limit the God`s infinity”. E. Burger answers that “not the infinity is deeper than the personal character, but the personal character is deeper than the infinity”. In fact, the so-called infinity to which the man arrives to, through himself, it is a product of his person. And “the man is fully human not in his inside, but in report with you”. “The person is the true depth of the being”¹⁹⁸.

The mentioned objections of the philosophy are explainable because it considers the transcendence, rightfully, also like an infinite source for the spiritual richness of the humanity and it seems to it that a person cannot accomplish such a condition. In fact, the true transcendence have only the role of making us to be penetrate by our intimacy through its quality as border which gives us a holy shiver, but it is also a source, the only source for our growth. But this positive quality can be held only by a person. The person alone, by the fact that claims us, he makes us getting out from ourselves, or exceeding ourselves, to enter the communion with it, and, through this, to try a true enrichment. From it to us it is established a communication of existence, without melting our individuality. The objects and the principles, they have not the power to make us getting out from our selfish prison. The human persons have some power¹⁹⁹, but not so much as the divine person has. And, by not getting out of ourselves, and by not entering the communication with the big wave of the reality, we cannot get richer.

¹⁹⁸ W. c.

So, the more categorical is the claiming which comes from outside, the more we find ourselves in the front of more intensive personality, and the more we can exceed us by entering a true contact with the big reality. The true transcendence is in the same time the supreme border and the endless source for us, for, as a reality it is more fully border to us, and it is also a source to us. But only the person has both the quality of being a border which resists any our will to comprise it, and to be also of a source which gives us power when we are in communion with it. Only the person gives us the experience of the reality from outside us, and also, he gets us out from subjectivism, and he occasions us the enrichment through the contact with him. While, in the front of the object, only we are the active, the person is a factor which communicates its power.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“According to the theory of Anselm of Canterbury, almighty in Catholic theology, the sin of the man, by being an offense brought to God`s honor, the sacrifice of His Son was a satisfaction brought to His honor, having as consequence the removal of the death which was hovering like a menace above all people. The sacrifice of Jesus had the meaning of reconciling the love of God Who wanted to save the people from the punishment of death, and His justice, which couldn’t leave unpunished the offense brought to Him. The Son of God made Himself man only to fulfill the juridical form of legal representation of people into the satisfaction brought in their name.

A closeness to the people, like a good in itself, it wasn’t needed, because of the man`s nature it wasn’t broken through sin, but it was only suspended the normal relation between God and people and it was proclaimed on them the doom of death.

Leaving aside the inappropriate appearance which God is described in, by this theory - like being so much preoccupied by His honor -, it is to be noticed that it is not necessary that the love and the justice of God to be considered as to be into a such accentuated opposition in order to explain the death of God for the people. The justice must not be regarded as staying in opposition with the love, as opposing to this one a stubborn veto and as letting itself reconciled only with the price of a heavy sacrifice. It is rather comprised into the love, whether this is understood not like a heavy sacrifice, but, in a wide sense, like a real will for restoring the human nature. The man cannot be really restored without being shaken through an own sufferance or, because he cannot provide it to himself, through a substitutive sufferance for him. This is the basic structure of his being, into which it mirrors the importance of the moral law emanating from the divine being and will. The simple forgiveness, without this fundamental shaking of him, it cannot be useful to him, and it cannot snatch him out from his moral helplessness.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁹⁹ Louis Lavelle, De l’Acte, p. 519 : « L’amour... nous oblige à trouver dans les autres consciences... un moyen qui nous invite nous a dépasser nous-même ».

“According to the catholic conception, the human nature, by not being weakened through sin, but only having above it the menace of death, through the juridical satisfaction brought by Jesus Christ, being removed the death from above it, there was accomplished everything that must to be done. But the experience tells us that the human nature is too much damaged by the sin and that through the juridical act done by Jesus Christ with His face towards the Father, the human nature hasn’t been yet pulled out from its misery. There is necessary a continuous work upon it, because death is not something external, but in it, like a spiritual weakness which gradually crumbles the human nature. Jesus Christ made him man in order to permanently stay with His face towards the people while communicating through love His restoration powers, and these powers are overwhelming the people with the supreme intensity only when they know about His sacrificed committed for them.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Nestorianism, which argues a godlike person and a human one into Jesus Christ, does not correspond to the will towards communion manifested from the part of God and from the part of the man. The Nestorianism stops God at the half of the road on which He has gone driven by His love. The Christendom is not representing only a message sent by God, but it represents God Himself, like He entered the world, like object of the revelation. God is a subject and also the Revelation’s object. He shows Himself, He gives Himself, He communicates Himself, He makes Himself content of the me-you relationship with the people, while remaining, in the same time, a subject of this communication and of this relationship that He established.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Neither the second side from the whole of the action salvation of can be done through the Nestorian and Monophysite thwarting of the embodiment. Carried by His eternal obligation towards the Father, the Son wants to bring also the people to this state, which is in the same time the state of the communion with the Holy Trinity. People cannot elevate to this state by themselves, since they have got out from the communion with God, and since they have become unable for this communion. So, they cannot fulfill the eternal law, which is also of their being, the law of obligation towards the Father. Through everything they don't do, they are not able to arise to communion, therefore they cannot be helped, but through His maximum closeness to them, through communion. The accomplishing of this law, of the true worship and serving in love of the Father, it cannot be fulfilled for people except by a man who hasn't got out, because of his sin, from the communion with God. And He does it, by carrying the obligation, by the renouncing to the self, by the Self-sacrifice to the ultimate limit, by dying a voluntary death in the most dreadful way. The maximum awakening of the communion subject it cannot be accomplished but through the sacrifice for him. So that, the death of Christ for people it cumulates in itself the effect of the maximum preparation of people for the communion with Him and, by this, with God, with the accomplishing of the law of the man's obligation to worship the Father." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Bulgakov was influenced in this teaching, somehow, by the great Protestant theologian G. Thomasius²⁰⁰. But while that one kept himself in between some limits, by not daring to declare the personal principle itself from within the divine man, but only a certain power from its basis, Bulgakov brought the theory to extreme, so that he fell a direct pantheism.

The problem is, without any doubt, so full of mystery, that nobody has found yet answer it and to illuminate it. It can only be circumscribed more closely; there can be achieved some progresses towards its core of unsearchable mystery, but illuminating it in itself it is impossible. The man does not know yet what person factor is in itself. Even harder it is to pronounce over the modality of substitution of this factor.

We are satisfied, for this reason, with the following general indications, remaining aside of the explanations given by Leontius from Byzantium, Maximos the Confessor, and John Damascene. The nature or the substance is the material, the content which a reality consists of. It is, for instance, the wood which a table consists of, the blood which the living body consists of, or the spirituality which the interior man consists of. For this, it also means 200 G. THOMASIUS says: "The man carries in him a ghost of life emanated from God, which it is the immanent foundation of his personality. Not the personality itself: because the personality is wholly on the created side of his life and it is possible only through that it is dwelt in that godlike πνεῦμα". "Ein Beitrag zur kirchlichen Christologie", in Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche, B. IX, 1845, p. 229. Quote from Oskar Benson, Die Lehre von der Kenose, p. 43. „The human nature characteristic stays, like it was observed, in that it has a divine reason of life (einen göttlichen Lebensgrund in sich trägt). But the same thing it is valid also for the Savior, of whom reason of life (Lebensgrund) it is the Logos", W. c. p. 238, at Benson, W. c. p. 46.

what is common to all individuals or things belonging to the same species²⁰¹.

The hypostasis is that something which a reality consists of, rounded like a whole which has its support in itself. The hypostasis is not but the way to be like a whole by itself, rounded in itself, with own support, of the substance or of the nature. It is not an admixture of content, of material, to what the nature or the substance are. A wooden matter, rounded in the whole called as table, it has become hypostasis; the material and the spiritual matter which the man consists of, rounded into an individual whole, it becomes a hypostasis too. Thus, we look at the concrete man as being both nature - skin, blood, and spirituality – and hypostasis. The last one is not something more in addition to nature, but the nature itself in an individual shape, standing by itself. The nature alone is not yet hypostasis, but even the hypostasis is not equal to the nature or to a part of it, neither is an admixture to nature, of the same kind with it, but a nature's way of existence.

Since the nature has the shape of a whole, it has not been a simple propagation environment for some movements started from other points of the vaster whole which it comprises in, but it has its own movements, and its particular destiny. Every whole it has its center in itself. The extraction of a substance from the vaster ensemble, its rounding up into an individual whole, it has like a consequence the emergence of a center into this whole. The center of the substance part rounded into a whole it is no longer into the vaster ensemble which it has been taken from, but into this new whole.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One could say: these virtues of spontaneous movements and activities are characteristic also to the human nature, through its liberty and its conscience, so not through its rounding into a hypostasis. But if we imagine that the nature from a human hypostasis is part a vaster whole, from a huge man, the spontaneity and the self-determination won't start from the restraint region as much as the nature of an ordinary man would comprise it in the frame of that huge entity, but it will start from the center of the whole. So, only as the big nature of the huge whole it would be apportioned into smaller wholes, one could ascertain what these groups form like, into their inside, their spontaneity center, by gaining subject virtues. It is true that not the hypostasis brings the liberty and the conscience into the rounded whole of a human nature. The Church saw rightly when it condemned the Monothelite, who were saying that into Jesus, being only one hypostasis, there is only one will and one work, by arguing in front of them that each nature preserves its own will and its own work. But the manifestation of the will and of the work it is directed by the hypostatical center, it is set into movement from the rounded nature like a whole. “In any work the fundamental act belongs to the nature, only the fulfillment of the act it belongs to the person”²⁰².

²⁰¹ Dr. FRANZ ERDIN, Das Wort Hypostase, Seine Bedeutungsgeschichtliche Entwicklung in der altchristlichen Literatur bis zum Abschluss trinitarischen Auseinandersetzungen, Fr. i. Br., 1939, p. 32-33.

Of course, the human nature cannot be rounded in a natural way into other wholes but into the common human individuals. It tends, in other words, towards a determined hypostatic state. In the human nature there is, like a potentiality, the human hypostasis how we know it and, so, also the spontaneity virtues, the ones of subject. The human nature reaches, on the basis of an internal law, the duplicated state of hypostasis–nature, of subject–object. In each man there is the hypostasis and the nature, the first one like subject, the second one like object and instrument, without the hypostasis being an admixture from outside, but the necessary shape which the nature reaches at, as soon as it exists in fact. Into the sentence “I warm myself”, I express both my quality as subject and also as object, both the hypostasis and my nature. The same double aspect I express into the sentence “I cogitate”, whereas I make a distinction between the cogitation subject from inside me and the act of cogitation joined together with the ideas I am cogitating at. The body parts, the states of the conscience, the sentiments, all I can express and name from me, that is nature. The subject is the agent which I cannot determine, on which I can put my finger, which lies behind the curtains that moves them, the only ones that I see. Just because we cannot determine and we give to it a name, we are using for it a word which takes place of a name, a pronoun, says S. Bulgakov (Tragödie der Philosophie, Darmstadt, 1927).

But, while S. Bulgakov considered this agent, or me, like an entity differing from nature, we consider him only a new aspect, a new way to be emerged from the virtuality of the nature²⁰³.

202 H. URS VON BALTHASAR, op. c., doing the exegesis of Saint Maxim the Confessor, Migne, P. G., 91, 292 D – 293 A; 91, 48 A – B. Saint Maxim the Confessor said: “It isn’t the same thing with the possibility to want and to want. Like the possibility to speak isn’t the same thing with the speaking. Somebody has permanently the capacity to speak. But he doesn’t speak permanently. So that, the possibility to speak permanently, it belongs to nature; but how the hypostasis speaks... The capacity to speak had it the Word embodied like man, but this capacity was moved and it received a shape by His Godlike will”. (P. G. 91, 48 A – B). “Is not the same thing to want and to want in certain way”. “Like neither is to watch and to watch in a certain way... To want and to look belongs to the nature... To want and to look in a certain way, namely, to want to walk and to not want to walk or to look to the right or to the left, or up or down, it is a way to use the will and the look, own only by who uses them, which distinguishes him by others”, P. G. 292 D – 293 B.

203 S. BULGAKOV, considering the subject like a mysterious reality apart from nature, got close to Monothelites, to whom, according to H. Urs von Balthasar, W. c. p. 254 – 255: “the person was an irrational dimension beyond all it is nature”. Besides, “the Monothelitism is, in a certain regard, a precursor of the

The human nature, therefore, it cannot concretely ever exist only like nature, like object, like instrument, but it always exists like subject-object in the same time, like a revelator agent, and like a revelation environment.

But, in a natural way, the subject aspect it also has it through its particular rounding into the common human individual²⁰⁴.

By analogy to the things ascertained in the immanent world, we can also say about the human nature received into the unity of the second Hypostasis of Godhead, by the fact that its center coincided with the center of the whole, that Jesus didn't lack anything in order to be a full man too. The unique center from within Him, it has received all the features not only of the godlike nature, but also of the human nature. The human nature had in Him all the development which it has each time when it reaches the hypostasis state. But the human nature's virtues of hypostasis they weren't validated from a different center of it, but from the common center. This was the human and godlike center in the same time.

Among people there stepped a man of whose center is no longer outside God, but into God, or that center is God Himself. The relations of the other people with this man, they no longer mean relations lived outside God, but relations with God Himself. Out of a human hypostatical center it flows all the power of elevating the humanity towards God. Whereas this hypostatical center has a power of attraction towards good, through which He overcomes personalist nominalism from Middle Age and from the modern time. If the person is something else than the center of nature rounded in itself, so that, being the factor who works, and this work no more being only a "centralization of the work", but coming from beyond nature, it won't be admitted anymore that into Jesus Christ - a single Person and two natures - there are two works, but only one. The human nature widowed of its work and will, it becomes a marionette, a phantom. The Monothelism conducts to Docetism and it is characterized, in general, through a despising of the human nature, arriving to the to consider the embodiment as useless.

²⁰⁴ In amazing similar terms described this report between nature and self, the most modern researcher of the human soul, Ludwig Klages. For him the life and the spirit from the man are the nature, and the self it is the subject, but not like an entity apart by the nature, but only like a center which emerge from the both togetherness. "Into self haven't be searched something else, he says, but the rotation center strictly indivisible of both", of life and spirit. (... "es muss davor bewahrt, im Ich etwas anderes zu suchen als den streng unteilbaren Drehpunkt beider"). „To use a palpable comparison: the self-reports towards his bearer like the rotation embodiment. "In order to use a palpable comparison: the self-related to his bearer like the axis of the Earth related to the terrestrial globe, but not like an iron rod which we would introduce through the middle of a sphere to give it an axis, a rod which can be separated from the sphere. The self it isn't neither spirit nor life, but isn't though a new essentiality besides them, but the correlation point, of their collaboration, lack of any extension". ("Mit einem handfesten Gleichnis gesagt: das Ich verhält sich zu seinem Träger wie die Drehungsachse des Erdballs zum Erdball selber, nicht aber etwa wie zu einer Kugel die abtrennbare Stange, die wir durch sie hindurch gesteckt haben, um ihr eine körperliche Achse zu geben. Es ist weder geist noch Leben, eben sowenig jedoch eine neue Wesenheit neben ihnen, sondern der aus regungslose Beziehungspunkt ihres Zusammenwirkens"). Der Geist als Widersacher der Seele, II. Band, Leipzig, 1933, p. 516.

all purely human centers, He is somehow the center of mankind. In the middle of the mankind if has been placed a godlike center. The mankind has gained, into its ontological region, a center and this center is God—the Word.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Hans Urs von Balthazar is right when he sees in the Christological formula, established by the Synod of Chalcedon, the first apparition of the person factor into the philosophical conscience of humanity, and of its report with the being, rightly solved, but rather through an intuition than through a detailed specification. The Greek philosophy did not now but the dimension of the nature, of the being. It wasn't possible to find, only into the frame of this dimension, a satisfactory explanation for the union of the two natures in Jesus Christ, and for the fact that He is in the same time both God and man. “It wasn't possible to express the union between God and world, in Jesus Christ, through a pure philosophy of the «being» (durch eine reine «Wesens» - Philosophie). It was affirmed this union like «physical», like «ontological», and the consequence was the mixing of the two poles into a new being; it was looked for an avoidance of this mixing, but they only found the solution of an accidental unity, an exterior one, one moral through a special relation between the two natures” (W. c. p. 199). The Monophysitism and the Nestorianism were wrong just through the fact that didn't saw something else except natures, except the dimension of the Greek philosophy so, they have to keep them separated or to mix them. At Chalcedon it was affirmed a special dimension, a third factor towards the two natures, in which to be accomplished their union without merging them. But this third factor, on the other hand, it wasn't seen like something coming from outside the natures, like an essential novelty which to complete the nature, but like a growth from nature, like accomplishing of it, like a new step of the developed reality from the being.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Chalcedon has anticipated the later philosophical development which has reached the conscience of the lack of identity, between the order of the being and that of the existential. “With a kind of visionary certainty, it is established a formula which will unveil only later all its senses” (H. U. von Balthazar, p. 198). Leontius from Byzantium and Maximos the Confessor, they deepened even more the right meaning of this new dimension and of its report with the dimension of the being. The later philosophy, even if couldn't avoid anymore the problem of the person like a reality different from the being, like a concrete necessary shape of the spiritual being, it struggled to look for other determinations of it. It identified the subject to the conscience or it considered it a mysterious factor descended from outside into nature. But later, in the times closer to our days, it seems that it has liquidated all these wanderings on strange roads. Ludwig Klages, the existential philosophy, the French contemporary philosophy, they return to highlighting the person like an ontological reality different from the being, but they also consider the person like a concretization and accomplishing of the being.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“So, according to Lavelle the subject does not bring a new entity, but it is only the way of acquiring and of autonomous activation of a general power, of the nature, like we are calling it, according to the dogmatic formula. Just because that the subject brings not nether the work, but this belongs to nature, respectively to natures when we are talking about Jesus Christ.

But, by making abstraction of these, out of the conception of Lavelle are arising also other conclusions of a more general order. According to him, the ultimate reality is an eternal and indivisible Act, which works not only on an absolute plan, but it stays also like availability in all individuals, in order these ones to actualize it according to their limited possibilities. It is the same divine essence, indivisible, in all the subjects.

We will rectify this pantheistical feature of his conception by adapting it to the formula of the IV and VI Ecumenical Synods. Into the whole human nature there is the same indivisible work potentiality – it became active in different ways through the concrete human subjects – that permanently is sustained by the divine will and work. From divinity`s Act to human nature`s Act there is a crossing. The divine work is not one with the human nature`s work, but it constitutes it and it sustains the later one, which is one and the same in all individuals. Each subject actualizes, in their own shapes and in a limited way, the same work potentially available in him, like in all individuals. Each one puts into the work the common fund which is at the disposal of everybody.

That`s why, there is in each individual the sentiment of responsibility not only for his own destiny, but for that of the entire world, by realizing that through his work he produces or he can produce modifications into the entire created existence²⁰⁵.” (Stăniloae 1993)

205 “On peut dire que, dans l`unité vivante de ma conscience, je fais déjà l`expérience d`un acte qui, à travers des opérations particulières susceptible de se répéter, de se modifier, de s`enrichir, témoigne de son identité toujours disponible et me montre qu`il est participable par moi comme il est donc participable par tout”, W. c. p. 89. “Notre responsabilité à l`égard de l`être total est un témoignage en faveur de son unité ; in n`y a pas d`être particulier qui ne sente comptable de l`univers entier, qui n`ait en réserve une idée auquel il entreprend de al conformer; il sent qu`il doit prendre en main la charge même de la création... tous les gestes que nous faisons modèlent tour a tour toutes les formes du réel, les multiplient, les transforment et prennent leur part de responsabilité dans l`acte même qui les a créés” (p. 90-91).

“In the Russian theology the doctrine about Sophia it has been developed much lately. Sophia, at father Bulgakov, it means the godlike life, the greatness, His glory, like an inter-Trinitarian manifestation of the godlike nature. It is the uncreated Sophia. But besides the uncreated Sophia, there exists the created Sophia, which is the created universe, a copy and an effect of the internal godlike world. The Son of God, through embodiment, He descended the uncreated Sophia, His godlike life, from the state of plenitude integrally manifested from eternity, into the stage of becoming, of developing. He reduced it, therefore, on the moment of His birth like man, to the initial moment of development, to a pure potential state, to the state of a Child also according to His godlike life, and not only according to the human one.

Into the internal life of the Holy Trinity, it hasn't been changed anything by this. The three hypostatic centers continue to exist and each one of the three persons continues to maintain His eternal personal relation with the other two, and the happiness which irradiates from these relations, it also continues to exist: Father enjoys the Son and the Holy Ghost, the Holy Ghost enjoys the Father and the Son, and the Son, by continuing to exist like a godlike person, He irradiates objectively the godlike life and happiness.

In itself, the godlike life and happiness of the Son it continues to exist, but like subject, He does no longer taste it, for Himself it ceases to exist.

“The glory and the Godhead into Sophia shine from before eternity into the heavens, for the Holy Trinity, though, the second hypostasis, He leaves this shininess. He does no longer have it for Himself, but He receives the appearance of the bondsman, into the free asceticism of the kenosis. In this meaning “the young Child-God from eternity, He ceases to have His godhead for Himself: He remains only with the godlike nature, without Her Glory” (p. 253).

The diminution, however, it refers to the hypostasis of the Word too. And this thing can be understood by itself. If the nature diminishes, the hypostasis which represents and carries the nature will remain in his full shininess. But also, for another motif, it must happen like this. The human nature cannot grow up like human nature into the frames of a hypostasis so different from it like it is the godlike one.

Therefore, the divine hypostasis or self, by substituting into Jesus Christ the human hypostasis or Self, it had diminished Himself, until the level of a human hypostasis or self, for the substitution to be done into the most completely and natural way.

The hypostasis manifests into the conscience of the self about himself. At the man the self is immersed in the current of the becoming; it appears and it grows. But in the same time, it has also a supra-temporal character. The time does not produce him, but it only develops him and it actualizes him. The self exists also before the apparition like subconscious and from this subconscious the conscience grows up always, it specifies the self. Like principle of the entelechy, which leads the human being development, it is from the beginning.

In our act of conscience, we perceive this supra- temporality of the self or, more precisely, this supra- and sub-temporality of it. We perceiving it like spirit both subject of becoming and above the becoming.

To God, however, the hypostases are not subjected to the becoming. But one of the divine hypostases make himself also a human hypostasis, namely just into the sense that He renounces to the permanent actuality of his conscience, by entering also, in this regard, the current of the becoming. The self of the Word remains the same in His being, of course, but potentiates His conscience by accepting to be developed just like a human conscience.

“The second hypostasis disrobes Himself from His godhead, leaving it, not like a source of the inter- hypostatic life, but like personal godlike form of existence: the Son ceases to be God for Himself and, therefore, He does not refer now towards the Father only like a hypostasis of equal godhead (“I and the Father, we are one”), but also like one who considers the Father like His God. The conscience of paternity of the Father it makes room; it is plugged by the reference of being sent by Father” (p. 257). Objectively, in Himself, the Son still remains Trinitarian hypostasis and in the same eternal relation of a born from the Father, but subjectively, for Himself, He relation of obeying the Father relation, the relation of human hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“These punishments are: the need for sleep, the hunger, the thirst, the tiredness, the sadness with the crying, the fear of death, the sensitivity to torments, and the mortality²⁰⁶. The imperishability and the immortality of the body of Jesus Christ were sustained by the Aftartodocets who were condemned by the Church. It is right that the intimate presence of the godlike nature, by enforcing the body, it makes it to raise up from the state of mortality and corruptibility. Therefore, Hesychios from Jerusalem says: if ²⁰⁶ S. Bulgakov says that the human nature of Jesus, being without the ancestral sin, though, it was not going in a natural way towards death, because Adam had the possibility to die even before the sin. The Lord was not entirely outside the possibility of death, but of a forced death, not of a natural one. The death becomes inevitable to Jesus only after in Gethsemane He fully assumed the human sin. Not being death in His nature, Jesus cannot die except a forced death. W. c. p. 396-7. It seems that this conception of S. Bulgakov doesn't correspond with the one of Saint Maxim the Confessor, because he seems to put also the death with together with the sin into the line of the ones taken by Jesus through the rational assumption, while after the Saint Maxim the death it is assumed together with the nature. Of course, into a wider sense also the irreproachable helplessness's of the nature are voluntarily assumed, but together with the nature, aprioristically, not a posteriori.

God endured all our things, He did it through a state of retention of godlike power from this influence²⁰⁷.” (Stăniloae 1993) “Søren Kierkegaard has spoken about a consummate incognito of God under the appearance of a man (in the writing: Einübung im Christentum) and, consequently, he considered the faith like an act of the believer’s purely heroic decision, a jump into the void, with the confidence that he will find the firm ground. Jesus appeared exclusively like a man. Neither His contemporaries could, nor can we find support in any of His manifestations for our decision to believe. This decision is fed exclusively from our boldness, from our capacity to risk.

But then we could believe to every other humble man that he is God; the faith would have been a totally subjective act, an arbitrary one.

No matter how much wanted Kierkegaard, or after him the Protestant dialectician theologians, to remove any objective support of the faith in Jesus as God, they must admit some of the subjective reasons. So, for example, not any other man on world, who has behaved with seriousness and moral noblesse, he has affirmed, ever, that he is God, except Jesus. If there wasn’t any other, at least this element is admitted by all the mentioned theologians like an objective motif for the ones who “dare” to believe just Jesus like God, and no any other man. Kierkegaard supports his “dare” of the faith also on the moral uniqueness of Jesus. He has done in the Protestant theology the biggest case of Jesus like “model” for life. But this is one of the classic objective criteria of the veracity, of the dignity of credence of a mediator of the Revelation.

So, also according to these theologians, there was something in the manifestations of Jesus which was raising Him above any man. They also admit that the listeners had experienced this. So, God was not into an absolute incognito.

The same dialectician theologians grant, on the other hand, to the word of Jesus, the virtue that it created and that has been creating until today, in people, the certitude that He is God, so they are saw and they have been seeing in this word a power differing from the one which the word of the men has it.

The human word has become, so, means of God’s revealing, of the revealing like a subject, not of showing, but though, not of a simple affirmation, but of creation of an experience, of a “seeing” into the souls of the listeners.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁰⁷ W. c. p. 140, John Damascene says: “The body of God but united after hypostasis with the God – Word Himself was not separated from the natural mortality, but has became life doer because of the union after hypostases with the Word”, w. c. p. 219.

“In the fact that not all His listeners were obliged to ascertain that Jesus was God, it consists the cause due to which the mentioned Protestant theologians would want to consider God like being present entirely incognito in Jesus and the faith being exclusively an act of subjective dare. This phenomenon can be sufficiently explained if we will take into consideration also the factor of sin, from man. The revelation presents itself, actually, with objective criteria and objectives, which distinguish the revelation from everything that is a simple human manifestation, but the experiencing by man of these objective criteria and features it depends on the will of the man to step over the egotistic and autonomist self-pride. If somebody wants to listen seriously to the word of Jesus, by defeating the easiness of his sinful prejudgments, it is impossible to him not to have the experience that here welcomes him a superhuman reality. The faith is also a question of will, because everything Jesus says and does it can be left to slip over the skin of the hearing and of the sight, or it can be misinterpreted, evaporating everything that it has different – and, so, the faith is an act of decision – but it is not less true that, just by the fact that it is necessary this easiness for the hiding of what Jesus represents differently from everything that is human, this different something exists and if the man do not force himself to slight it, but a contrary, he pays the deserved attention to it, he will have the experience which founds his faith.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Some theologians affirmed that, according to the testimony of the Holy Scripture, in the beginning, the sacrifice was not tied to the idea of the sin and it was not started out of the desire of obtaining God’s mercy, but it was a simple homage brought to the Giver of all, a symbolizing of the idea that all the fruits of the earth belong to God. But, no matter how much it would have been joined this idea together with the practice of the sacrifice, we are seeing the idea of the sin and of expiation still as accompanying the second sacrifice about which we are told in the Holy Scripture: the sacrifice of Noah. “(Gen. 8: 2) And the LORD smelled a sweet savor; and the LORD said in His heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake”. In the first sacrifice of which the Scripture tells us, the one of Cain and Abel, it is not told anything about sin, but neither is the sin excluded. From the language of the text it is found, though, like a result of the sacrifice, the mercy of God, thereby the pre-existence of an upset for the human mistake. Through the Law of Moses, it is powerfully highlighted the expiator role of the sacrifice. The man who was bringing an animal for sacrifice, he was bringing it for the cleansing of his sins, for gaining the God’s mercy. He put his hands upon it to transmit his sins to that animal. The Pascal lamb was sacrificed for the first time for God in order not to kill the first born of every household and to escape the Jews from the slavery of Egypt. The Epistle to Hebrews, which gives us the most authentic interpretation of the sacrifices of the Old Testament, it persistently repeats that they were brought “for sins” (5: 1, 3; 9: 7; 10: 4 etc.), for cleansing, for forgiveness from the part of God, for reconciliation with Him, for obtaining His mercy, and therefore, instead of a sacrificing of the man himself. The fact that the goal of the sacrifice it is the atonement of the human sins, it shows us that God wants the sacrifice of the man, and not of the animal. If it had remained permanently to the animals sacrifices for obtaining His mercy, it would have been accredited, though, the idea that God simply likes the smell of the blood, like some favorite nourishment, like the pagans believed about their idols. But they did not remain to these. Otherwise, even if it seemed more appropriate that God to pretend animal sacrifices than human sacrifice, only the human sacrifice shows the superior meaning of the institution of animal sacrifices and it accomplishes what was manifesting through that waiting. Not the animal sacrifice is appropriate to the just notion of God and to the motif which it is brought for, but the sacrifice of humans. Because the human sacrifice, though it reaches its culminant point through blood shedding, though it makes us thinking that not the blood in itself is what God pretends, but the sufferance and the complete auto-annulling of the man like a spiritual being, manifested through death. If the blood in itself had gained the benevolence of God, it wouldn't have been understandable why he would have preferred the human blood instead of the blood of the animal. If the blood in itself had described the path to God, it would have been unfounded the affirmation of the Scripture that the idea of sacrifice has found its accomplishing just into the sacrifice of a spiritual being, namely of Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We aren't thinking here at a legal requirement established exteriorly, by God, like an impersonal scale that would require as much sufferance in this side of the balance to equilibrate the sin from the other hand of the balance. But we want to say that the sufferance of which would be capable even the pure man, it is a moral force too weak to be capable of melting down the huge pile of sins which fills up, over the head and ears, the human genre in all the persons and in all their manifestations. It is, so, about a sufferance as power, like a spiritual intensity which to exercise victoriously upon the sin which overwhelms the human nature, under the form of moral inertia, pettiness, and egotism. Only because it is necessary a sufferance capable, through its intensity, to melt down in a spiritual way the bad fund of the man, it could be sustained that this report can be exteriorly expressed, also like a legal requirement. God Who asks for the sins of the people a sufferance equal to the sins – at least from somebody else on behalf of the people – He asks for it because only into such a sufferance is it a power capable to melt all the sins down, because there exists an internal and direct report between sufferance and sin.

Of course, this order of things on the spiritual ethic plan was established by God. And, because He established the mentioned internal report between sufferance and sin, He established also the equivalence between them like a legal expression. But this equivalence does not exist without that report.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In the theory of Anselm, the God’s love, which He wanted to escape us through, from death and from His justice, which opposed to a forgiveness for free, the sufferings are shown like being opposite and it is necessary a great power of inventiveness to possibly be reconciled.

But if the internal shaking of the man through his own sufferance or through the sufferance of another, it is necessary just for, by being reestablished in his eyes the prestige of the divine authority, to be possible for him to restore himself from the ground up, God asking for the removal of the sin, He does nothing else but to pursue the true restoration and salvation of the man which is desired by His love. Just the love of God Who wants the man really elevated from the state of relaxation of his moral springs, it imposes the sufferance and the sacrifice. In this way, the love and the justice no longer appear so opposite. The justice is only a modality of work of the divine love. The love, understood in a wider sense, of wanting of the real good for the others, it comprises also the justice like a method for their true restoration. In this sense, the opinion of some Eastern Holy Fathers, who deduced the embodiment and the sacrifice of the Savior only out of God’s love, without speaking about His justice, it is profoundly true²⁰⁸. Also, the idea of the other ones that the Son of God has embodied 208 L. BINSWANGNER, w. c. p. 592-3, insists on the fact that the order of love it does not remove the order of the justice, but it integrates it to itself, like a subordinated element, like the soul does not remove the body, but he raises the body into his order, by subordinating the body to himself. He gives the example of the attitude that we can adopt towards the conflict between an owner and the thief caught in his garden, whom the owner starts beating. It is here a meeting of tendencies, of forces, and of ideas, which gives the phenomenon of the punishment. We cannot adopt a negative attitude about it, because the social order could not be otherwise maintained. But, in the same time, we can approach more intimately these two fellow humans, who are in conflict, and to feel love both for one and for the other, without ceasing to justify the owner who defends his property by punishing the thief, and without ceasing to disapprove the thief for his theft. When we are looking at these two fellow humans only through the light of the justice, we are far from them, and we have in our sight not their intimacy, but the general order and their deed in report with it. When we are looking at them through the light of the love, we have got so close to their intimacy, then we feel that we are participating at everything hurts each of them. (“Dann bin ich in liebender Imagination sowohl der Bauer als der Knabe, tue, leide, über darüberstehende Subjekt, Sonden als von der betreffenden Handlung an diesem bestimmten Spiel des Daseins mit ergriffenen Glied liebender Wirrheit“, p. 577). God, in His quality of founder and preserver of the moral order, He looks at the people through the perspective of the justice. But, by coming closer to them, through the embodiment like man, He feels solidarity with their misery, arching His love over the attitude of a keeper of justice. Through the fact that He makes Himself man, becoming one of the seives in which He implements the to save the man from the power of death and of the evil, because this saving was impossible without an internal shaking of the man consequently the expiator sacrifice of Jesus Christ, it is also true.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Behold the theory of Moberly, which in its general scheme does not go astray from the classical explanation of the Lord’s death: “The general idea of an atonement of the sin it asks, in the same time, for a perfect power of penitence and a perfect power of sanctity”. He who condemns the sin in itself, He must have the quality to condemn it. “In order my repentance for the past to be perfect, it should my person to be absolute one with the Justice in the condemnation of the sin into me and in my account. But such a personal identification to the Justice, if it had been possible, it would have been in a contradiction with my past” (p. 111). In order to be able to condemn in me the sin, I must be identified to the justice in all its purity, namely free of the sin from the past. These two features cannot be found together in any man. They were found only in Jesus Christ. He was the qualified judge of the sin, but He condemned it into Himself. But the question arises: it is possible the penitence of a person who has not sinned? Moberly answers that the substitutive sufferance for foreign sins it is a daily fact amongst people. Amongst people does not exist only exclusivity, like it seems to us at surface, but there is also a unity of nature increased through love. “We cannot enjoy and suffer, we cannot gain and loose, we cannot commit sin and repent, by being totally alone” (p. 119).

“But maybe one would say that, no matter how real and strong would be the repentance by sympathy, finally, the repentance of the compassionate friend cannot be so real and so personal like the ones of the guilty himself. This is true - if it is anywhere true - only because of the limitation of our power and our will of compassion. It is true in proportion of our incapacity of unselfishness. Where the capacity of abnegation starts getting closer to its ideal, we can find, in our experience, that the penitence of the good man in favor of the condemned fellow human not only that it anticipates and it directs the possibility of that one towards repentance, but even his repentance is sharper, and deeper, and more real than anything can be made in this direction by the condemned one in person. The presence of the sin into the person of this one it melts the sharpness of the power to detest the sin. I want to hate the sin, and I hate, into a certain degree, the sin which terrorizes my will. But just because it is mine, because it has its place and its power in my own conscience about sin, I cannot hate it with the whole intensity of my heart, which the one who was never been touched by sin can hate the sin same nature (Sein), through the report of love which He enters with the people in, by making to pass from Him to them and from them to Him the flux of the existence. He voluntarily assumes their guilt and He conveys them His justice after resurrection. Like a righteous God, He is the one who punishes, but like a Loving God, the one who puts Himself in the place of people, by making Himself man and by waiting for His punishment.

with; that intensity which I would want to hate it with, if all its power which weakens me had been melted down and I personally would have been again in accord with the justice of God (p. 121).

To illustrate this, Moberly challenges himself to the case of the mother.

“The repentance of the child it can be more cruel, more violent; but comparatively, it is superficial, confuse, helplessness, and unreal. The pain of the mother it is not smaller, but bigger, because she is outside of that troubling presence of the sin. She is less despaired, but she is more profound... The heart of the son cannot be broken, at least not right now. Only later it can be, when the penitence will have done its gradual work, by penetrating, by comforting, and then he will feel the sin and he will see it like it is” (p. 122).

The mother feels responsible for the sin of his son. Her substitutive capacity of penitence it stays in report with her degree of purity. The heavier the sin is, the more her capacity of true penitence it evaporates. “The power of penitence, namely the true penitence, it depends not on the degree which her own unrighteousness is in, but it depends on the degree which the penitence is not of her own” (p. 123)

“It depends on two things: the first one is the degree of own identification not to the sin, but to the holiness. This does not mean, of course, that she must reach the absolute identity to the holiness... And the second one is the fullness of her capacity to identify her own self to the being of the child. The slightest trace of egotism it blunts the sharpness of it. Her perfection must be a true triumph of love”. Of course, no earthly mother has reached yet the degree of an absolute love. There is a unity of nature between people, which unveils them and which is being deepened through love. “One participates to the nature of the another”. “If under the power of temptation, one has felt, the other one will look at the temptation of the fall, like a spectator from outside... What has happened is not understood from outside. It is felt, with some sort of fear, inside” (p. 129). “If the love was bigger and more perfect, the unity would be bigger than it is. If her obvious limit is the limit of love, which would be somebody’s capacities of communion, of whose love would be absolutely limitless, with the living experience of the other one?... The mother illustrates this, by what she is, and not only like a preliminary way to suggest what she does not reach” (p. 126).

The perfection towards this direction it has been accomplished by God embodied like man. “He has made Himself, in a voluntarily way, one with the man, one in the nature, and one in the love: one in the absoluteness of the unity, so that the union of the most perfect mother with her child it is not, in comparison to the perfection accomplished by God, but a dark and distant shadow. He has made Himself one with the man; He has made Himself man, He has made Himself humanity. He has impropriated, namely, that conscience of the man, that conscience of the sin, but which the man cannot accomplish the saving penitence for sin without; the full conscience of the sin into the full light of the holiness, this is His personal conscience. Thereby, the condemnation of the sin – not only from outside, but also from inside – through the power of self-identification to holiness, into the act of self-presentation like a penitent, it can be perfectly accomplished in Him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The resurrection is preceded by the descent to hell. According to the doctrine of the Orthodox Church, the resurrection belongs to the royal dignity²⁰⁹. The old Protestantism considered the resurrection like belonging also to the hierarchal ministry²¹⁰. Jesus would have descended to hell in order to continue His sufferance also for the ones from there. Because the last step of the torments it is the one from hell, Jesus would have endured those torments too, on the basis of His will to identify Himself to the whole human pain²¹¹.

But the will of the Orthodox Church to relate the descent to hell to the royal dignity it has profound significations. As even some Protestants notice, Jesus couldn't go into hell to continue the sufferance because the torments of the hell are constituted from sufferance interweaved with the persistence into sin. They are the eternity of the vicious circle, and of the punishment for the sin, and of the revolt against the punishment. Only who didn't leave from here purified through the efforts of his will and who stepped like so into eternity, he entered, eo ipso, the hell. Jesus didn't die for the sin. The Protestant B. Steffen says: “Obeys himself the inferno only who obeys the sin like a sinner”²¹². And Dorner declares: “Christ could not support the torment of the hell, because they belong to their eternity and, due to the unchangeable character, the unhappiness of the despair”²¹³. The victory of Jesus over the death it is real only in the case when the death cannot hold Him even for an instant, in its possession. The descent into hell, in order to suffer the torments from there, it would mean the death took Him into its mastery like on any other sinful man. When we say the death didn't lay its mastery on Him, we understand that the detachment of the soul from the body it didn't mean to Him a continuation of the sufferance, a continuation 209 H. ANDRUTSOS, The Dogmatic, Sibiu, 1930, p. 230.

210 At the Orthodox believers this theory is sustained by Sergei Bulgakov, w. c. p. 406, though it is not explained and it is not based this affirmation except on the general observation that “the sacrifice of Christ unveils through this its power not only in life, but also through death, into grave”.

211 B. STEFFEN, w. c. p. 116: “Die (protestantische) Orthodoxie behauptet, unser Heil sei davon abhängig dass Jesus die Höllenstrafen, also das genaue Äquivalent die Sünde der Menschen, erlitten habe“.

212 W. c. p. 116.

213 At B. Steffen, c. p.

in a diminished existence, but it meant an outburst of the spirit in the whole plenitude of His powers. In the moment in which “(1 Pt. 3: 18) (...) being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit”, and so He descended into hell, like also the churchly songs tell us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We mentioned in another place that the universal judgment, from the end, it is different from the personal judgment, which is done on every man, when he dies, because the happiness and the punishment will be bigger. This is the doctrine of the Orthodox Church, unlike the one of the Catholic Church, which affirms that the universal judgment won’t bring anything new, being a simple festivity of history’s ending. The Orthodox doctrine is proven like the most conform one to the solidarity of the mankind and to the unity of the history.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The ascetic efforts are means through which the human nature each of us bears it participates to the force of Christ’s human nature; this is for in our efforts it is present the Christ’s human force too. The potential bond with Christ it becomes effective to us through the faith in Him, and His force becomes our force. That’s why our asceticism is a gradual death with Christ, as an unfolding of power, a death of the former man, a Baptism’s prolongation through will. It isn’t only an imitation of Christ, as in West, but it is a heroic mortification with Christ and into Christ. We are united with Christ even before the culminant state of union with Him, even in the prolonged act of our mortification. We do not only resurrect with Christ, but with Him we die too; or, we won’t resurrect with Christ if we do not die with him, firstly.” (Stăniloae 1992: 10)

“Some of the Protestant theologians – by understanding through the mysterious union with God exclusively this identification between man and God, and by not admitting the possibility of a direct, unmediated contact with God, a contact which not to be an identification as substance – they reject, in principle, any mysterious union, and they fall in the opposite extreme, of the irreducible separation between man and God. According to those theologians, between man and God there isn’t possible any kind of transmission, no kind of unmediated contact, and just because of that God uses exclusively the word, as they say, in order to establish though a connection between Him and us. “By the fact that God chooses the earthly form of communication of the word” says a Protestant theologian, “it is shown that it is excluded the unmediated union which we would have stayed with Him in, if we hadn’t been estranged from Him” (Karl Heim, Jesus der Herr, Furche Verlag, Berlin, 1935, p. 182.); or, as the same theologian says further: “If God comes close to us - and we are with the whole our existence in a movement contrary to Him – in the indirect form of the word, namely in a form which He remains though hidden, this is a merciful sparing of ours. This is because we couldn't have been able to endure the unmediated presence of God". (Heim 1935:183)" (Stăniloae 1992: 13-14)

"The Protestant theologians of the dialectical school, by rejecting any mysterious union with God, they have in their sight, as I said before, the Hindu conception, or the Eckhart's conception, the idealistic one, and, by and large, any sort of religious or philosophical pantheism, to which between man and God there is an "uninterrupted continuity", an evolutionary ascension unstopped by any precipice, the man being in essence and becoming in actuality, by developing one or another of his powers: god." (Stăniloae 1992: 14)

"The Protestant theology cannot see how could be understood a "union" with God otherwise than an identification, more or less total." (Stăniloae 1992: 14)

"The Protestant theologians (especially the Dialectical School: E. Brunner, in Wort und Mystik 1928) reckon the word as the sole means of the divine Revelation, and they see in the word something opposing to any real communication and to any kind of contact between man and God, Who just because of that He unveiled His will by word, in order not to show Himself, due to His separation from us. The Protestant theologians of the Dialectical School they discern, of course, the Revelation's word from the detached idea, from the self-standing idea, or from the own thought which I utter to myself inwardly or with voice, or from the word of another person who is equal to us. The Revelation's word is always the word of the divine Person addressed to the human person. In word there is unveiled the presence and the will of the supreme Person, of the divine Person, Who has something to do with me. (...) The word is a relation of a living person with me. There are given three elements through the word: the person who speaks to me, me – whom that person speaks to, and the word spoken to me. By hearing the word, I implicitly make the experience that that word is spoken to me by a person differing from me." (Stăniloae 1992: 18-19)

"The Protestant theologians accentuate upon the word as exclusive means of the divine Revelation, not only in order to exclude the possibility of an unmediated revealing of God, but also in order to exclude that revealing to be confounded to a self-revealing of substrates of our being, in the sense of the pantheistic-idealistic philosophy. The word is the sign of a person who differs from me, and therefore the word is the sign of a total alterity of the divine Person.” (Stăniloae 1992: 19)

“Due to their tendency of keeping the godhead - even when the godhead reveals himself – in an absolute transcendence, in order not to open by any means the gate to the pantheistic-idealistic philosophy by admitting a communication of God with us, in the continuation of their cogitation upon the Revelation’s word, the Protestant theologians find themselves in contradiction with what they said before. If they attributed to this word some virtues of making known the Person Who communicates it, now they disrobe this word of any special task, of the pure meaning which, usually, a word comprises it. So, for instance, they say that the word uttered by Jesus Christ it doesn’t bear anything out of His godhead, but it has a purely intellectual meaning. Thus, the Revelation in Jesus Christ is no longer a crossing of new world in time, but it is the communication of a truth addressed to the man’s knowledge, without comprising in itself any sign of being from God, neither any power showing the divine provenance of that word. The mentioned theologians not only that they exclude any psychism from the content of the Revelation’s word and from the process of receiving this word, but they exclude, too, any task of spiritual nature which to show this word as a word come from God. Connecting the man to the Revelation is being done through an exclusive act of knowledge. In this the faith consists. “The faith has nothing to do with the religious excitations or feelings; the faith belongs to the spirit’s domain” (W. Schmidt, Zeit und Ewigkeit 1927: 79) (in the sense of abstract, intellectualist knowledge).” (Stăniloae 1992: 19-20)

“This is a first contradiction in the Protestant dialectical theology: on one hand, this theology wants to discern the Revelation’s “word” from “idea”, for the reason that the first one shows its necessary provenance from the divine Person Who directs His attention towards my attention by speaking to me, and the idea is a meaning in itself which tells me nothing about its provenance from another person. But on the other hand, they confound the Revelation’s word to the idea in a pure sense.” (Stăniloae 1992: 20)

“By what knew and by what knows any believer the revealed word as belonging to a person, namely to the divine Person, as the Protestant dialectical theology argues, if the word doesn’t comprise except its intellectual meaning? Or, how could the disciples of Jesus to know that the One speaking to them wasn’t a human person, but a godlike person? What were they able to know through, that upon that Person was staying an “accent” making that Person different from any other man? Where the listeners of the prophets had the certitude from, that the prophets were speaking the words of God? To the dialectical theology is very difficult to answer these questions, since it doesn't admit that together with the word of Jesus or of the prophets there was being poured within souls also something from the godlike power, which the listeners were receiving their conviction through, regarding the divine provenance of these words." (Stăniloae 1992: 20)

"A Catholic theologian, Georg Koeppen, was the one who highlighted the best the Trinitarian basis of the Christian spirituality, and, in the same time with this, also the fact that this spirituality has been preserved the best in the Eastern Church, for this Church alone is the one who has preserved in the most unaltered mode the Biblical teaching about the Holy Trinity and the central place of it in the Christian awe. He ascertains that in the religions which it is unilaterally accentuated the monotheism in, there is no longer a place for such spirituality; and in the religions tending to pantheism, even if the divinity is manifested in a plurality of gods as expressions of the nature's forces, there takes place a false spirituality, or an illusory consummation, namely a consummation leading the man to his merging in the so-called divinity." (Stăniloae 1992: 29)

"The man's union with God for eternity, it is guaranteed and mediated only where One of the godlike Persons has embodied Himself as man for eternity, manifesting through this the eternal love of God for the man as man. Koeppen considers that the Orthodoxy has maintained the spirituality characteristic to the Christendom as revealed in Christ, but the fact that it has preserved the mystery of the Trinitarian community of the Persons in God, not-weakened by a rationalist philosophy which, rather accentuating the unity of God, it has highlighted more His essence. We could add here that just out of this rational accentuation of that unique essence of God, a philosophy trying to avoid the paradoxical joining of the unity with the Trinity of the Persons, it has come out also the "Filioque" doctrine, that of the proceeding of the Ghost out of what the Father and the Son have as common, namely out of the divine essence, and thus the essence is considered as the cause of the Person, and that actually leads to an impersonal God, namely to a pantheistic God." (Stăniloae 1992: 30)

"Out of this insufficient distinction between the living and Trinitarian-ly irreducible God, and therefore Person, of the New testament and of the Holy Eastern Fathers, and that one of the Scholastic Theology impregnated by Aristotle-ism, or out of confounding the last one to the one of the generally pantheistic philosophy, it comes also the using by the scholastic theology of the same name of "mysticism", in order to express the Christian's union with God, term used by the philosophical pantheism, leading to the reproaches the which Protestants bring to this notion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 30-31)

“Koepgen continues: “God and the divinity isn’t the same thing. When the mystic (the spiritual man, o. n.) speaks about God he doesn’t understand a metaphysical divinity (ens a se), but he thinks at the Trinitarian God Who has united Himself, in a totally incomprehensible mode with the man and He has saved the people. If the Christendom has at its basis the faith in the Holy Trinity the spirituality is part of the Christendom’s being itself: “The Mysticism (the life in connection with God, the life having God in itself, in diverse degrees, we would say), it isn’t an appendix later annexed to Christendom, that would be offered as a new possibility to a specially endowed souls; it belongs to the act itself of the faith” (which is an act of entering the connection with God, but which can be developed through purification of passions, we would say). Due to its philosophical rational concept of God, which introduces a distance between God and man, “the report of the Catholic theology with the Mysticism (with the spirituality, we would say) it is a very unclear one”.” (Stăniloae 1992: 31)

“As example of false or deceiving spirituality, or mysticism, characteristic to the pantheistic philosophy, which doesn’t promise to the human being except the merging in the impersonal divinity, Koepgen gives the following quote from Plotinus: “He (the mystic) doesn’t see two, and the seer (the contemplative) doesn’t distinguish two, neither he thinks at two, but he becomes another and he is no longer himself; and by reaching there he no longer belongs to himself but he belongs to that one who is one with him, the central point united with the central point” (The Sixth Ennead IX, 10 and the followings). And Koepgen commented this place by saying: “Plotinus shows us here the essence of the neo-platonic mysticism, which has an undeniable foundation, for the essence of God is cogitated as pure idea and it is places on the same plan with the categories of the human spirit and in relation with the human spirit”.” (Stăniloae 1992: 31-32)

“The Occidental Mystical theology, towards its loss, it has almost totally overlooked its connections with the Eastern Church’s Tradition and it saw in Eckhart or in the Spanish mysticism the culminant point of the mystical cogitation, by and large. The thought at the Holy Trinity it passes here on the last plan” (Stăniloae 1992: 32)

“Georg Koepgen doesn’t shy seeing the fully systematized beginning of this philosophical, non-biblical, essentialist, and impersonal or non-Trinitarian understanding, just at Thomas Aquinas who, according to the author’s information, “has suffered a profound collapse at the end of this life, due to the fact that everything he wrote before appeared to his as unsatisfactory.

There will maybe come a day – and we want to see it as soon as possible – when the theology will take equally seriously this event from the Aquinas' life, as anything else from it. Anyway, this would essentially contribute to bring that shaking in the scientific-theological activity, which is connected to the best traditions of Paul, of Augustine, of Pascal, and of Newman". (Stăniloae 1992: 34)

"By accentuating the will in the act of the faith, we don't want to say that the faith doesn't comprise some evidence too. The faith isn't an intellectual attitude depending exclusively on the will. A Catholic theologian says: "In the light of the faith the same divine names which the philosopher pronounces, they receive untold dimensions; they are deepened in their content and their significations become analogue to a new power" (Ch. Journet, Connaissance et inconnaissance de Dieu, Fribourg, 1943, p. 46). The concepts referring to God which the natural rationality has, they receive by faith a new brightness, one unknown to the metaphysics or to the natural man, and they resemble to some pearls brought in the light of the sun (Idem). So, the faith pours new evidence over some rational truths referring to God. But the faith brings right from the beginning a plus of evidence to some truth which the rationality had before, and this means in the same time a focusing of the rationality in certain certitudes. The Catholicism considers that the rationality has the certitude of some divine truth even before having faith. The Orthodox is less optimistic concerning this aspect; the Orthodoxy recognizes that the natural rationality can discern out of contemplating the world some truths about God, but it reckons that the rationality misses the absolute certitude in those truths. Anyway, the plus of evidence brought by faith it must mean to the Catholics too, a plus of certitude, a plus of strength in the decision of standing next to these truths." (Stăniloae 1992: 98-99)

"The lack of disturbance of the state of dispassion, it mustn't be understood, except for a few moments, as a total disinterest in the world. But it excludes the egotist interest. In this sense the dispassion is a disinterest. But it doesn't totally exclude the general interest, that of the love. A contrary, the love in all its amplitude, it appears after one has achieved the dispassion. That's why, as the dispassion isn't the ultimate purpose, but it is searched in order to achieve the contemplation, and immediately one has penetrated the dispassion area there starts showing the contemplation too, likewise the dispassion is searched in order to achieve the love. We clean ourselves up of the egotism's passions, in order to achieve the love's altruism, and the clean love appears immediately after the dispassion occurs, and then it continues growing up as we progress in dispassion. This is the great and the radical difference between the Christian love and the Buddhist apathy. In Buddhism, the one who has reached the apathy he becomes totally disinterested in people, because of his worry not to be his egotistic quietude disturbed. That's why, no matter how total the Buddhist disinterestedness would be presented, it still hasn't eliminated the gravest thing: the egotism. The Christian dispassion, a contrary, it is a generous disinterestedness: through the passions it has successfully quenched, it has understood a precise thing: the callous manifestations of the egotism, which has become almighty. Only by these the Christian doesn't want to be disturbed. The dispassion the Christian is searching for, it is right the condition for the apparition, for the activation, and for the growing up, in an unhindered manner, of the disinterested love. The endeavor for dispassion it is the endeavor for plucking off the tares impeding the love's wheat to grow up; it is a breaking through the walls of the egotism from our soul, in order the soul to can be really useful to others, and not for an even more total locking up of the soul within the walls of the total indifference." (Stăniloae 1992: 153-154)

"The question is: discerning the divine rationalities out of nature and their connection with the divine Rationality, is it done on the discursive way of forming notions and deductions from the seen things towards their ultimate cause, or is it accomplished through a quicker intuition? The scholastic Thomism doesn't admit another way of knowing the rationalities from the things and of knowing God, except the discursive-deductive one, as the only possible way of knowledge." (Stăniloae 1992: 167)

"The German theologian Karl Heim reckons that the world fatally must appear to each individual and on each moment differently and differently, according to the perspective's center (perspektivische Mitte) which one looks at the world from. But this perspective center most often is a center of the interests, a center of the passions. It is possible there to be innocent motives, which make possible the variety of the perspectives which the world is being looked at from: the little experience, the focusing of the look on a world's domain, or the previous culture. But either these innocent motives too, are mixed with individualistic-passionate elements (for instance the acquired culture can be influenced by a unilateral passionate point of view), or that through the cleaning of the passions, which is achieved through experience, these innocent motives are at their turn surpassed too, the fact is that, in the end, these perspectives too, which appear as totally innocent, they can be surpassed at least partially. Anyway, there is a unique truth that is beyond the subjective perspectives and truths. We cannot come closer to that truth except gradually, and we might never have it wholly during this life. But neither in the future life. Only God know the whole truth. This is for God Himself is the whole Truth. Even the angels are being ceaselessly purified of nescience, said Dionysus the Areopagite. And the general idea of the Saint Fathers is that each person is given the gifts, and therefore also the gifts of the knowledge (namely of the truth), according to his powers. But amongst the ones who have achieved this partial knowledge of the truth – namely knowing the truth from an individual perspective, determined by non-passionate motives (the partial knowledge) – and the ones who intentionally alter the truth, there is a huge difference. The first ones are on the way of the truth, they are pilgrims towards heavens, while the last ones are turned with their back to the truth, and they are travelers towards hell, namely towards the father of the lie.” (Stăniloae 1992: 172)

“We discern between the apophatic theology and the negative theology because of, in the Catholic theology, they know besides the affirmative theology only the negative theology in the sense of an intellectual renunciation to the affirmative terms. It is a merit of Vladimir Lossky that he lately has brought again in the Orthodox conscience the apophatism as dominant feature of the Orthodox theology. And it is his merit too, that he has specified that the apophatism of the Holy Fathers it is something else than the negative intellectual theology known in the Roman-Catholic theology.” (Stăniloae 1992: 189)

“Saint Gregory Palamas rejected the idea of Barlaam that according to the created nature there doesn’t follow anything else but the divine nature, which is totally inaccessible and non-cognoscible. Though he knows the difference between the divine Being and the divine energies, Lossky doesn’t occupy himself with the seeing of the godlike light, but he speaks only in a general manner about a somehow lived not-knowing of God, a fact admitted by the newer catholic theology too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 195)

“In the West, the one who understood this positive “darkness” of Dionysus, it was the Cardinal Nicholas Cusanus, who explained this darkness not as a lack of light or as a real mixing between light and darkness, as J. Hausherr would have wanted the Hesychasm to do it, but as an abundance of light that overwhelms the sight just because of that, and which can be called not only as darkness but also as light.” (Stăniloae 1992: 202)

“Hausherr’s affirmation, that the Hesychasm has forsaken the oriental tradition of uniting the affirmation with the negation in expressing the mysterious experiencing, by preserving only the affirmation of seeing the godlike light, it isn’t a correct affirmation. The Treaty III from the First Triad and from the following Triad, of Saint Gregory Palamas, they do not cease calling the seeing of the godlike light as “knowledge above understanding” or “nescience in sense of surpassing”. The godlike light seen in a not-understood way, it remains to the Hesychasm too, a mystery which doesn’t exclude, but it implies the apophatism, but without letting only the apophatism as standing alone. What distinguishes this apophatism of seeing above sight, of the light, it is the fact that this apophatism isn’t a void, but it is an overwhelming godlike presence; and it isn’t a feeling in darkness of the presence of God but, a contrary, it is an overwhelming experience of this presence. Besides that, the godlike light cannot be known by whomsoever in its entirety, from the beginning, but knowing the godlike light it is an eternal process, according to the theology of Gregory Palamas. The awareness about this endless reserve of light which one feels in the experienced light, but it isn't properly-said, experienced, as also the awareness about the absolute non-cognoscibility of the divine being it is a ceaseless experience within the light's seer. If he still becomes wholly a light, this won't mean that he will fully understand himself, but he becomes to himself even fuller of mysteries, as a deified being, above nature, inspiring to himself a continuous amazement about himself." (Stăniloae 1992: 201-202)

"The love which God receives us with, and the love which we receive God with, it isn't the existential love which the divine Hypostases love one another with, but this love still is an uncreated love, springing out of the God's being. Therefore, neither the opinion of Peter the Lombard won't be correct, because he said that we love God with God's love, if we will understand through the "God's love" the love which God love us with, and not simply the love from God; nor the opinion of Thomas d-Aquino is correct, according to which our love for God is created." (Stăniloae 1992: 283)

"The Catholicism cannot understand this doctrine of the man's deification, for it doesn't know the difference between the divine being and the divine energies. Consequently, in the opinion of the catholic theology the man couldn't be deified but only be being united with the divine being. Anyway, what would manifest out of man, what would be reflected out of man it would be the divine being. By not being able to admit this, the Catholicism keeps the man in an existence totally separated from everything that is godlike. In Orthodoxy though, the nature of the man who is united with the divine energies it become an environment which these energies manifest through, the human nature itself remaining undiminished, as in the case of the sunlight and the sun warmth penetrate through and manifest within so many environments without annulling them and without identifying them to the sun. So, the human nature of Jesus hasn't been "transformed" in His godlike nature, after His Resurrection and Ascent. But it is a fact that after His Resurrection and Ascent, the human nature of Jesus has received new energies and new godlike works. The question is only if all the human energies and attributes have been suspended and if this suspension it means their abolishment or only their overwhelming and what do we understand this overwhelming like." (Stăniloae 1992: 317)

"Some Protestant theologians, influenced by the theory of Rudolf Bultmann, they declare that the ideas about Christ and the acts attributed to Him, as also the ideas about the Holy Scripture by and large, are mythological objectifications of some existential references of the man to God Who is imagined as something that exceeds the man; that's why the Bible must be demythologized. They have been led to this conclusion also by the idea that the modern man no longer accepts the traditional notions of the Christendom and that's why is necessary a radical change of the Christian language. Thus, Paul Tillich proposed to be forsaken the idea and the name of a transcendent God and to be adopted the idea and the name of: "ultimate reality", or of: "foundation of the reality". This is because of God not being to the today's man something else than the creator nature, the creator foundation of all the objects. And the Anglican bishop John Robinson thinks at his turn that the it must be forsaken the idea about a transcendent being, or Person, and even the name of God, and he proposed to be replaced with the names proposed by Tillich, either cu that of "The Unconditioned". Christ isn't except the man who lived in the most accentuated manner the union with this foundation of the reality, or he was the Unconditioned amongst people." (Stăniloae 2005: 5)

"Regarding this foundation on the Holy Scripture and on the Holy Tradition, the mentioned Protestant theologians have to answers: first, that the Holy Scripture was a work determined historically, presenting ideas of the time which was written in, using expressions and literary forms of that time; second, that the Revelation can be interpreted in many ways, and the changes in notions and language proposed by them are justified, at their turn, on one of the many possible interpretations of the Revelation." (Stăniloae 2005: 6)

"The question is: isn't there a core of the Revelation that must be recognized as intact by all the possible interpretations as long as they still can be considered as Christian? Isn't this essential core of the Revelation expressed also by certain means?" (Stăniloae 2005: 6)

"In a report on the evolution of the Catholicism after the Vatican Council II, submitted in August 1967 to the Central Committee of the Ecumenical Council of the Churches, Lucas Vischer, the secretary general of the Department for studies of the Commission " Faith and Constitution", he ascertained that the theology by and large, has reached the conclusion that any expressions of the Christian faith, even those form the books of the Holy Scripture, they have been determined by the historical conditions from that time. But he thinks that just because of that, the hermeneutics has today a great role, having to establish which is the revealed fund and which is the historical coat of images, of preoccupations, of words, which the Scripture was expressed in." (Stăniloae 2005: 6)

"R. Bultmann proposes the "demythologizing" of the Christendom, for he reckons that the Christendom has been mythologized, and by this the Christendom has transformed God in a transcendent "objectified" figment, which doesn't offer the man the possibility of his authentic "existential" fulfilling. In Christendom, as he says, it isn't about else but about a man's coming back to himself. The Revelation doesn't speak to the man about anything, but it opens the man's eyes upon himself and it facilitates him to understand himself, as a claimed being, and it puts the man in the situation of deciding upon his faith, of separating himself from an automatic and common life, and of understanding himself in the diverse situations, in what he is the most authentic." (Stăniloae 2005: 9)

"R. Bultmann reckons that the man can fully fulfill himself only on the plan of an existentialist experience, free of the whole objective constraint - including the divine one - which lower the man to a common life. Rightly, the argument raised against Bultmann was that the man won't be able to authentically fulfill himself if he isn't open to the world. But this means that the world too, is open to the man. "Only in his renunciation to the world the man experiences on himself". This is for the world isn't so rigid as they say, but it is open at its turn to the man's transforming power. The freedom isn't an abstract feature, not continuously verified and non-creator, but the freedom is being strengthened and verified in the dialogue with the world, and in the affirmation of the creator acts which introduce benefic transformations within world, in society, and in the relations with the fellow humans." (Stăniloae 2005: 9-10)

"Only a God Who is not conditioned by nature as part of the nature, only a God Who represents to the man the support of man's freedom, the man's source of being strengthened in an unconditional freedom, only such a God can help the man to authentically accomplish himself. Bishop Robinson proposes to the today's man, as name for God: the "Unconditioned", reckoning Him, in the same time, as the "ultimate reality" of the world, not differing from the world by anything." (Stăniloae 2005: 10)

"Just Bultmann and his disciples by believing that they "de-objectify" God, they actually objectify Him, or, better said, they more or less let the man to totally be prey to the almighty object that is the universe." (Stăniloae 2005: 11)

"In other religions the deeds of their founders aren't constitutive deed of the respective religions, for those deeds aren't deeds which created in the founders a state of resurrection which the salvation of the followers of those religions would consist of. Those deeds are deeds of God become man - namely of God become a bridge and a means of salvation. Those religions consist only of the teaching of their founders, and of the methods they recommended, which, by being applied by followers, they would gain their salvation by themselves. Therefore, those methods can be perfected on the measure the man's conscience is getting deeper, or it is getting richer. Since in those religions the divinity and the humanity are identical in their essence, the formulation of those methods it is due, in the last analysis, to a deepening in the specific of the human being. But this deepening can progress, and it can reach to some revisions of the established rules.” (Stăniloae 2005: 19)

“We reckon that the apparition of a “theology of the images” in Occident is significant and it could lead to a diminishing of the exclusivist position of the word in the Protestant theology, and as opening of that theology to Mysteries, which the Christian life is accomplished in, as an encounter between word and image. The most acts and words of the Revelation have the form of images, but the images do not lack the logos, the content of some acts. Almost any word of the Revelation it is a word-image, a materialized meaning, and the acts of the Revelation are real acts but they take a material form and expression, for they touch the seen world and for they are acts having a certain meaning.” (Stăniloae 2005: 23)

“The words must always express the perfect image of God, and that image is the humanity of Christ, or Christ as man. This purpose is served also by the icons of Christ. The Protestants, by removing the icons of Christ, they deprived their words of a support, of a solid guide. There seems to be a contradiction between the Fathers’ affirmation that the believer must avoid forcing through imagination a form of Jesus, and the affirmation of the icons’ value. Actually, in his internal imagination the believer can introduce in the image about Christ subjective elements, subjective element deviating from His real image. That’s why the icons are painted according to the canons from ever, which do not allow anybody to add any subjective element.” (Stăniloae 2005: 30)

“The Protestantism, by ceasing to maintain the image of the humanity of Christ in its efficient work, through icons, and by mimicking its stages in Holy Mysteries, and by keeping only a word untied from practicing this image, there is no wonder that some Protestant theologians ended having the idea of replacing the fundamental image itself, because of reckoning the embodiment of the Son of God as a myth.” (Stăniloae 2005: 31)

“We must remark that all the foundations dogmas of the Christendom were established in East through the Seven Ecumenical Synods. The last one of these dogmas is that of honoring the icons, and it was formulate by the Seventh Ecumenical Synod, in the year 787. It has been said that the Ecumenical Synods from East didn’t establish except the dogmas referring to God, and not also the dogmas referring the man’s collaboration to the salvation work. With the problem of the man, with his role in the salvation work, it has been occupying more the catholic and Protestant West, the Orthodox Church not doing else but taking rectifier note on the errors done there.” (Stăniloae 2005: 49)

“Being mainly preoccupied with the man’s being and role in Christendom, the West hasn’t done except to exaggeratedly develop the teaching about man from the Eastern dogmas, but these dogmas have God as their main theme. The West rather interpreted these dogmas, and the interpretations are rather erroneous. The West manifested through these preoccupations its anthropocentric tendencies, its incapacity of exclusively vibrating for God, and its dogmatic helplessness. But the preoccupation with the man as main entity, meaning getting the man out from under the divine light, it necessarily leads to the minimization, to the naturalization, and to sinking the man in the objects’ world. Uprooted from the dogma’s divine world, the man is no longer but a conglomerate of the matter. That’s why the western anthropocentrism led to the man’s disintegration. One cannot save the man except through dogma, as overwhelming preoccupation with God. Living the man by himself, he drowns in the nature’s ocean, as Apostle Peter who forgot for an instant about the power of God and thought only at himself and at the waters surrounding him.” (Stăniloae 2005: 50)

“The Orthodoxy, therefore, it doesn’t consist only of honoring the holy icons, but it consists of the entire edifice erected by the Seven Ecumenical Synods. Anyone who deviated from one of another of the dogmas, he loses the attribute of being Orthodox, of being confessor of the right-faith, by getting down on the slope descending in the marsh of the relativism.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The Orthodoxy, which formulated and it believes in the dogma about the icon, it took in account during the whole history this function of the icon, of sanctifying the sight, but the fact that on one hand it hasn’t renounced to imagining the divine reality in a seen plan, as the Protestantism did, and on the other hand, the Orthodoxy didn’t confound the images of Christ and Virgin Mary to the face of the natural people, as the Catholicism did.” (Stăniloae 2005: 63)

“The Catholic icon doesn’t preach the reality of another world, but it preaches the reality of the nature, so that it isn’t properly said an icon, because of not unveiling God in the seen plan, but it reproduces a face of the nature. That’s why the Catholic icon doesn’t sanctify the sight either. Actually, the Catholicism is equally skeptic as the Protestantism is, regarding the possibility of exceeding the nature through sensitive images. The whole West expresses reserves concerning the icon’s dogma, as it had been during the Seventh Ecumenical Synod. The West doesn’t believe that the supra-natural reality can be suggested, preached, also by what it addresses the eye. The West believes only in word, though, actually the human word too, it is a material vehicle of a spiritual content, as the image of the human face too. The West doesn't admit the possibility of an ascension from the face's image, from the seen place, to God. That's why the West doesn't even strive to use the lines offered by the face of the natural man, in order to suggest through them contents from beyond nature. If God's reality cannot be suggested in the seen plan, the nature's elements cannot be transfigured. The art, in the West's conception, it cannot have the function of transfiguring the nature in order to surpass it.

Behold why, when the West's art, when treating religious subjects, it remains naturalistic. The West deems as inutile the effort of exceeding the nature - for making the nature a window to the divine presence. Not believing to the dogma, it means not believing in the possibility of the victory upon the natural character of the worlds visibility. Everything created in the sensitive plan out of the nature's elements, it still remains nature. The nature remains irremediably secular, submitted to the iron laws of the immanence. Nothing sanctifiers, nothing mysterious can be offered to the man's sight. To the West, there is a precipice between mystery and visibility. The mysterious doesn't exteriorize, it isn't incorporated, but it remains a thought abstraction, and the seen plan cannot comprise and suggest except atoms, mechanical laws, or realities belonging to this world." (Stăniloae 2005: 63-64)

"By refusing the image of Jesus, the Protestants got out of tradition, namely they have altered the tradition. This is because between keeping the word and refusing the icon it is an inconsequence that cannot last for long. The refusal of the icon of Christ should have made them renounce also to the words of Christ and about Christ, namely to reach to an annulation of the embodiment, of His kenosis. That's why Patriarch Nicephorus was right to say that the iconoclasts were "undermining the Gospel". "Because they despise symbols through which are indicated the passions and the wonders of Christ, in order, together with these symbols, to erase from hearts even the memory of Christ". But this cannot be done. Once the Son of God has taken a determined name, He has taken also a determined image. And as the people no longer can forget about the name of Jesus, likewise they can no longer stop the mind from making the consequent step of cogitating at His image. The name and the image of Jesus, the fact that we can represent and we can preserve in human words His deeds and in icon His image, are consequences of the kenosis of the Word, of His descent on our level, out of love, and out of His mercy on our helplessness of entering otherwise the relation with Him. (...) The words, the deeds of Jesus, His face, represented and preserved in preaching and in icons, are the expression of the kenosis of God-the Word. But this doesn't mean that they represent only His sufferings and humiliations. They also represent His great deeds: the wonders and the signs of His power. But for these too were done by Him on the seen plan, through His body, they had, at their turn, a character of kenosis.” (Stăniloae 2005: 136-137)

“The Occidental world has passed from the skepticism regarding the icon to totally erasing the borders between icon and the portrait of the natural people. The Byzantine art is the only one accomplishing the icon as differing from portrait.” (Stăniloae 2005: 139)

“The Occident, by following the Nestorian line of separating the human from God, even in paintings, it was incapable of discovering the dimensions of the infinite beauty of the human, no matter how much insisted in representing the human. This is because the human of the Occidental painting remained a human locked up inside the nature’s limits. But this human isn’t the whole human.” (Stăniloae 2005:195)

“The Ghost of the Eastern Christendom reached, as in the Christological dogma too, that equilibrium between extremes, which is characteristic to the truth. As in the Christological dogma, the Christendom avoided the Nestorian extreme, which condemned the creation to an eternal separation from God, as also the Monophysite extreme, which confounded the creation to God, so that in the icon’s problem the Eastern Christendom knew how to shun the Orient’s tendency towards pantheism and magical, as well as the extreme of a oppositional dualism between God and the world, as for instance the one of the Parsism, or against a dualism of total separation between God and the world, as for instance the Mohammedan one, which was extended through the Arabian world into Occident as well, progressively conquering the Occidental Christendom, less so, the Catholic Christendom, and more so the Protestant Christendom. The meaning of the icon - as defended by the Eastern Holy Fathers, and the icon itself differing both from the idol of the magical pantheism and from the Occidental “painting”, of Nestorian inspiration – it is solidary with the Chalcedonian norm and in all aspects that the world isn’t identical to God, but neither has an existence separated from God, but the world is a creation crossed through, by God, meant to an increasingly fuller transfiguration through God. That is, actually, what the Byzantine icon has succeeded in suggesting, by using means totally adequate to this conception.” (Stăniloae 2005: 122)

“Gregory Palamas is one of the most blasphemed Eastern theological personalities, because of the Catholic historians. The cause is that his doctrine was always rejected by Catholics, while the doctrine of his adversaries was always supported by Catholics. Almost all Palama’s adversaries were catholicizing.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 162)

“By and large, the whole Catholic theology has started to come back to the teaching of Christ and of the Holy Fathers from the first Christian centuries, preserved in Orthodoxy, and, by that, they open themselves to Orthodoxy, except some of the Uniates, who put above the faith's truth, their will of division amongst their Romanian brothers who still remained through Orthodoxy at the teaching from the beginning about Christ." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 149)

"The teaching about the man's salvation, through the union with God, or about the restoration or the man's being through union with God, it shows also the error which the Protestants and the neo-Protestants are in, because they do not even speak about the union with Christ, and the last ones they even avoid calling Jesus as Christ, namely they avoid recognizing Him as God and as born out of Virgin, without sin. By that, they reckon that Christ received the death for His sin, and not for our sins, and, therefore, He didn't defeat through his death our death too, namely he didn't either resurrect.

By and large, we do not see at neo-Protestants any teaching about Christ, they being content with bringing some praises to Jesus for His kindness, and by declaring themselves as saved through an exterior godlike decree, without a continuous effort to unite themselves with Christ. All the form of atheism are strangers to the teaching on salvation through the ceaseless spiritual growth out of the power of Christ, because they do not recognize as reality except this world with its miseries, with the definitive death of all the people who come into the world, and they are show all of them as meaningless, contrary to rationality, and mastered by a total darkness. The exercises recommended by the Oriental religions, which confound God to the world's essence submitted to some implacable and inexplicable laws, as there would be yoga, neither they can give the human person the salvation from death and the happiness of the eternal life, as person." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 149-150)

"By the other religions and philosophies from before Christ, the death was considered as a natural and unavoidable phenomenon, tied to the world's essence as unique reality manifested in perishable individuations; so, the death was not lived as an abnormal, tragical phenomenon, which should be overcome. But this attitude towards death couldn't be imposed to the human conscience, without the conscience to protest against it, and without the conscience seeing the meaningless imprinted by such a conception to the entire existence. This protest against considering the death as a blind fatality, it found its expressions in the impressive Hellenes tragedies." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 22)

"The objection brought by the Occidental theology to the Holy Fathers' teaching, that the Fathers would have understood the salvation as an act having physical effect, it doesn't stand. The Holy Fathers' teaching, by placing the accent of salvation on the liberation from death, it appears to be, a contrary, complete and fundamental in comparison to the Occidental doctrine that sees the salvation often only in a juridical justification, or in a forgiveness of the sins, by God, without no consequence upon the human being, and these days, they see the salvation rather as a impulse applied upon the human spirit to correctly behave in the social relations, but without a help from the power of God.

We believe that such an insufficient understanding of the salvation it is caused by a certain Nestorianism of the Occidental Christology, according to which, Christ is rather a “role-model for people”, a role-model of the man more closely connected to God, a role-model that remains quite passive and helpless. The Orthodoxy, by keeping the doctrine of the Holy Father, strongly accentuated by Saint Athanasius, it sees the salvation in our getting rid of death, in the first place in escaping the spiritual death, and this couldn’t have been achieved except by the Son and Word of God, by making Himself man.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 27)

“Only to the pantheistic conceptions the man’s death means a total disappearing as person, and a lasting of the people, as nature, in the great essence. If the man is created as person, in order to last as person even if only at the edge of the existence, this will due to the fact that the man is maintained through the power of the Word-Person Who created the man and Who imprinted His hypostatic image to the man. Namely, the man preserves, in a certain reduced degree, the image of the Word as Person. Otherwise, the man couldn’t have lasted as person. On the basis of this fact and of the connection preserved, by that, with the Word, the Word gets the man rid from the definitive death that menaces the man, and the Word made out of the extreme weakness an occasion which Him opened Himself on, and to give Himself as gift, to the Father, and thus He received from the Father’s power of from His power as Word, in Whose likeness the man was created, the power of bringing the man back to the life’s fullness. If the man had remained in himself, the man wouldn’t have been anything. But the man preserves, even on the edge of his existence, the image of the Word-Person and the connection with Him. That’s why the Word doesn’t let the man to totally die. The people created as unique persons by a God-Person, God-the Word no longer allows them to disappear, for the people were created in His image.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 28)

“In this fight amongst people, the enmity, the hatred, the lie, and the killing, all of these are justified, so that there cannot be seen any longer a difference between good and bad. What is reckoned as good by some people, it is reckoned as evil by others. This fight maintains a continuous disturbance and tension of the hatred. Such justification cannot have at its basis, as we’ve said, except a pantheistic conception, which sees in the essence itself the source which all these things come from. While the Christendom see in these fights: contradictions and sins, the pantheistic conception considers them as normal.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 40)

“Understanding the body’s rationality and sensitiveness as having their origin and as echoing into spirit, and being especially activate in the material matter organized by spirit into a body, it exceeds both the monistic or the pantheistic derivation or the rational and sensitive spirituality, exclusively from the material matter, or exclusively from the spirit (as claimed unique fundamental essence of the reality), and the dualism that separates too much the soul from the human being’s body, and that attributes to the soul only the theoretical thinking, and that attributes to the body only the sensitiveness. The whole human being’s spirituality has its source in the human being’s spirit, but we understand the spirit as source of the thinking and of the sensitiveness, continuously actualized, especially in the material matter of the body and by encountering the body’s material matter. This is the most satisfactory explanation of the human being’s reality, unlike the monistic and the separatist doctrines. Only thus, we take heed to the mystery of the union amongst the contrastive components of the human being. This explains in a more comprising manner, both the human being’s life and the connection experienced between the seen universe and the unseen universe, or the union between God and the created universe, a union that has been achieved, in a culminant degree, in Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 89-90)

“(…) the maximum spirituality in Christ it has in itself the power of overwhelming the nature’s automatism. Overwhelming this automatism of the repetition it doesn’t take place through an external victory upon nature, as in mythology, but it is the work of the actualization of the superior power of the spirit, which overwhelms the nature without suppressing it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 36)

“In Judaism and in Islamism God is so closed as person in himself, that there isn’t possible to the man any communion with God, but only obedience and happiness due to that obedience. Between that god and the creation there remains a precipice.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81-82)

“Actually, in the Judaic god and in the Islamic god it is accentuated only his power towards the world. This means, somehow, that that god hasn’t life in himself, but only depending on the world. His life is the world. That’s why he doesn’t have a life to give to the world. Without world he has no purpose or possibility of existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“The believers cannot remain only to repeating the schematic formula of the dogmas, but they try to enter the endless depth of the dogma’s meanings, being helped in doing this by an explaining based on the Holy scripture and on the Holy Tradition. The theology is thus a necessity imposed by the Church's need of explaining the points of the faith to the believers." (Stăniloae 2003: 94-95)

"The need of theological explaining the dogmas as definite point of the faith it comes, firstly, from the fact that the dogmas are concise formulas comprising both the report of the infinite God with the finite creature, in the endless road of the creature towards infinite, and His uninterrupted rationality for the salvation or the deification of the creature." (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

"Some theologians are trying to summarize, in a few features, the human character of Christ, a character, in the same time, so supra-human in His humanity, as an image that couldn't have been copied after other human models, neither built up by the fantasy which always goes out from real, through its tendency of mythologizing." (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

"The Western Catholic and Protestant theologies, they haven't known another modality of getting the man out of sin except enduring the punishment instead of him, of the amnesty offered on the ground of a satisfaction offered to God. The Holy Scripture and the Holy Fathers see the solution beyond this external initiative: in a movement of God towards communion, a movement that is imprinted to the man too. In both other cases, God remains exterior, punishing, or He places the man, from exterior, in a movement towards giving Him a satisfaction." (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

"For a long time, the criticism of the liberal theology has been contesting the Resurrection of Christ, by reckoning it as the product of the hallucinations of some of His disciples, or of some of the women from His inner circle. Today, almost all the Protestant theologians admit the Resurrection of Christ, though they doubt about some places speaking about it in the New Testament and even if they understand differently the report between the Resurrected Christ and the historical plan, and the importance His Resurrection has it for salvation." (Stăniloae 2006: 65)

"The fundamental error from the contradictions between the "liberal" and the "fundamentalist" Protestants, it was the fact that they argued on the material, scientific aspects of the resurrection. Through this they reached the banal opposition between objective and subjective, whilst the body of the Resurrected Christ is a real body without being objectified, for it is the matter penetrated by the Ghost. Only the faith, far from being subjective, it is the faculty awakened in us by the Ghost, which makes us penetrating this "spiritualized" order. This is for in Orthodoxy, the faith has virtues of "knowledge" too, as it hasn't at Protestants." (Stăniloae 2006: 67)

“The Protestantism has reduced very much the content of the Resurrected Christ upon history. The contemporary Protestant theologians speak about Resurrection only as about a proof that God has accepted the enduring of the expiation by Christ on our behalf, and the ones who are going more further they consider the Resurrection as the applying of the forgiveness Christ has obtained on the cross, in the sense that God gives the faith to the people, and by the faith, God gives them the surety they are forgiven.” (Stăniloae 2006: 69)

“The Catholic theology isn’t too far from the Protestant conception, because, at its turn, it considers that we are given the salvation for the sacrifice of Christ, and not through the sacrificed, resurrected, and deified body of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 69)

“The Occidental theology’s conception is that the resurrection of Christ isn’t also an act of power of Christ Himself, but it is only of the Father upon the dead Christ. It is known that in the Eastern conception the Cross of Christ is itself victorious, for Christ, by dying, His soul went, full of godhead in hell, where His soul couldn’t be held, but His soul overcame the hell, and then His soul elevated His body too, for His body wasn’t deprived of godhead and neither it was left to enter the decay. The whole hymnology of the Easter Church, from the holidays of the Cross to Easter, it affirms this. According to the Occidental theology, on the opposite, Christ endured in death the man’s weakness to the extreme limit, and then the Resurrection came to Him as a gift from outside, from God-the Father. The Catholic theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar speaks, as Karl Barth too, only about a “rising” of Christ from death, as an act of the Father.

This is a natural conclusion of understanding the salvation as being done through the satisfaction Christ brought to the Father, or as expiation Christ endured, in a juridical manner, as equivalent for the offense of the divine honor. Christ experiences the death as a total exhaustion of His human existence, somehow separated from the divine Hypostasis, and not having any power to resurrect. It was necessary the Father to elevate Christ out of this abyss of nonentity, once the Father was satisfied by accepting from Christ this annihilation, opposed to the offence the people brought to God, through their disobedience and through their vanity of existing by themselves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 69)

“Actually, there are a number of such places (mentioning about satisfying the offended honor of the Father, t. n.) (Acts 3, 15; 2, 24, 32; 5, 30; 13, 37; 17, 31; I Thess. 1, 10; I Cor. 6, 14; 15, 45; Rom. 4, 24; 8, 11; 10, 9; II Cor. 4, 14; Gal. 1, 1; Col. 2, 12). But the New Testament doesn’t present Christ only as an object of the resurrection in the mentioned places, but in the same places, or in even more places, the New Testament presents Christ as subject of the resurrection (Mt. 16, 21; 17, 23; 20, 19; Mc. 9, 34; Lk. 18, 33; I Cor. 15, 4; Lk. 24, 34; In. 2, 22; 17, 3; 6, 9; 7, 4; 8, 34; I Cor. 15, 12, 16, 17; II Cor. 5, 15; I Thess. 4, 14; II Tim. 2, 8). From Easter to Ascent, the Orthodox Christians still salute each other with the formula: "Christ has resurrected!", and the Orthodox Church sings and extols Christ as Subject of the Resurrection and of the act of overcoming the death: "Christ has resurrected from dead, with the death trampling on the death, and to the ones from tomb, giving them life."

Alternatively attributing the Resurrection now to the Father and then to the Son, it shows a together-working of Theirs, which includes also an intense together-working of the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 2006: 70)

"Diverse Catholic and Protestant theologians affirm that the Resurrection and the Ascent coincide to one another, because the apparitions might be of the ascended Christ after resurrection. According to these theologians, only Luke set a distance between Resurrection and Ascent. But we must ask: why the apparitions ceased after 40 days? Why the apparitions didn't continue at least during the Apostles' lives? We do not see another answer but in the fact that, during the apparitions, Christ was with the body in a lesser spiritualized mode. Some of the mentioned theologians reckon that one must not speak at all about an ascent to heavens, as one must not speak about a descent to hell, in order to abolish the possibility of blaming the Christendom of a world in three stages, as Bultman does. But this world, the hell and the heavens aren't three spatial floors, but three different existence modes.

We reckon that the more profound for motif the mentioned theologians identify the Resurrection to the Ascent, it is that to them Christ saves us through the satisfaction He brought to God, or through the expiation He endured from God through His death on the cross, and not through a series of acts Christ did, through which He works in diverse modes and on diverse levels directly for our sanctification and deification." (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

"The Christian Occident has moved away from this understanding of the Lord's Ascent with the body to the supreme power and glory, as to His supreme efficacy, through His concomitant dwelling within us. To them, Christ has become, by Ascent, a Master, an exterior Lord Who forgives on the basis of the power of forgiveness He has obtained through His sacrifice, ensuring us a happiness in the future life. The Catholicism was able thus to give Christ a deputy in the Church, and the Protestantism left each individual the "freedom" outside the Christ's work within people, which is a false freedom, once it is a freedom which is not liberated from haughtiness and from passions. Only a freedom into Christ and in the image of Christ's freedom, as liberation from passions and from haughtiness, meaning in the same time the union with the Same Christ and having the image of Christ imprinted in all the ones who believe in Him, it is reconciled with everybody's unity in faith and in understanding, all of them being in the ambience of the same love of God, which nourishes also their love for Him and amongst themselves. To the Christendom from the beginning, as it has been maintained in Orthodoxy, the Lord's Ascent with the body to heavens it is our ascent itself, but having to be continued until its consummation." (Stăniloae 2006: 78-79)

"According to the theory of the Western Christendom – which affirms that the salvation consists in the external juridical solving of the dispute between God and people – the Church no longer has an absolutely necessary role. The Protestants have weakened the visible character of the Church. The Catholicism, not totally breaking up with the Christian life from before the scholastics, it has kept the Church, but it has given it rather an institutional role than a sanctifier and deifier role, having a purpose similar to the purpose of any other human institution." (Stăniloae 2006: 82)

"It is usual to speak about the sending of the Holy Ghost as about an act the Holy Ghost takes the place of Christ's work. Thus speaking, the Church is considered as the work of the Holy Ghost, Who overtook the Christ's work. Actually, The Holy Ghost must be always considered as the Ghost of Christ, so that one mustn't consider Him, by any means, as separated from Christ. It is false the image of a Christ in heavens and of a Holy Ghost within Church, because of disregarding the unity of the Trinitarian Persons. This leads to rationalism or to sentimentalism, or to both of them as parallel attitudes, leading either to instituting a deputy of Christ, as in Catholicism, or to affirming an individualism inspired by the sentimental caprices, considered as impulses from the Holy Ghost and not kept under control by the presence of Christ Who presented us a well contoured model humanity, and Who offers us through the Holy Ghost the power to develop, on ourselves, in the image of Christ's humanity." (Stăniloae 2006: 83)

"By rejecting the serving priesthood of the Church, the Protestant conception has rejected the necessity of being us imparted with the Christ's sacrifice – namely the necessity of continuing to represent Christ's sacrifice within Church, and therefore rejecting also Christ in this state of sacrifice. But this has been done by Christ until today, and that's why Christ has been sending the servants of this sacrifice. Christ has called through His Apostles their descendants, the first bishops, and then through each generation of bishops, He has been calling other bishops, and through each bishops Christ has been calling the priests of the local church shepherded by Him." (Stăniloae 2006: 100)

“The Protestantism has rejected the objective reality of the Hierarchy or of Christ the Mediator Who makes His work efficient in continuation, making possible to the believers to be imparted with it. The Protestant conception has made the salvation to depend only on the human subjective individuality. The mediation of Christ it has been exhausted - according to the conception of the Occidental Christendom - on the Cross, as in a purely juridical act, and therefore a sufficient act, and it is no longer needed. It depends now exclusively on us, to believe that the mediation on Golgotha has actually solved the dispute between us and God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 101)

“If the teaching and the leading ministration are tightly connected to the celebration of the Mysteries, for the man’s coming closer to God it cannot be done without the coming of the grace in the ministrations, as power of God, a bishop cannot have within Church the jurisdictional primacy and the infallibility in the domain of the teaching, without this primacy being upheld by a special Mystery, namely without the exclusive right of committing some Mystery or without a supremacy in officiating some Mysteries. The Rome’s Bishop by not having exclusiveness in officiating some Mysteries, or by not receiving a special grace through a special Mystery, he cannot decide by himself concerning the teaching or the churchly leadership. Actually, in the New Testament, there is no case when Peter - of whose primacy is used by the Rome’s bishops to justify the fact that they are Peter’s descendants - commanded to the Apostles. A contrary, we see Saint Paul giving advises to the bishops appointed by him: Titus and Timothy.” (Stăniloae 2006: 103)

“Being equal the right of the bishops in officiating the Mysteries, and the ordination of each of them being done by several bishops in communion, they exercise their decisions regarding the teaching in communion too. This is because the teaching isn’t a domain for itself, but through it is being expressed the savior work of Christ within Church, a work that is mainly committed through Mysteries. The proper-said subject Who propagates and clarifies the teaching about the savior work of Christ, is Christ Himself, through the Holy Ghost. But Christ teaches through all the limbs of His mysterious body, for the meaning and the character of His teaching works in all of these limbs, and especially through the churchly hierarchy, on the basis of the celebration of the Mysteries by the hierarchy, and even more especially through the episcopate, in actual communion with the whole Church’s body. This is for in the whole body works Christ as Hierarchy-Lamb, as Teacher and Shepherd through the visible mediation of the hierarchy.” (Stăniloae 2006: 103-104)

“Keeping the work or souls shepherding (leading towards salvation) in tight connection with that of officiating the Mysteries, or of sacrificer and sacrifice through the power of Christ’s high priesthood Who is in the same time sacrifice (the Kingdom of the stabbed Lamb), it helps the work of the priests and of the bishops not to become domination acts, and it would have been enough to stop the Rome's bishop from inter-conditioning the communion." (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

"Today, "progressive" Catholic theologians (Hans Kung) interpret the papal primacy as "a primacy of the serving" and the pope agrees this beautification of the primacy's face. In this sense wants him to interpret the Lord's words: "Who wants to be the first amongst you, let him be your servant" (Mt. 20: 26). So, the pope "wants" to be the first, by the fact that he declares that he is everybody's servant. But Christ gives by these words the urge of each of His apostles to be the first in serving; this isn't a privilege of a sole person. And this bowing down of each one in front of the others it has as result the communion, and in the case of the bishop, the synodal character, in which each one wants to be conditioned by the others, by taking in account the others' judgment, even in serving." (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

"The Church is infallible, in its quality as body of Christ, for Christ is infallible, and He exercises the threefold ministration within the Church as a whole. Therefore, the Church is imparted with Christ's infallibility, in its entirety, for the Church is imparted, in its entirety, with the Christ's threefold ministration. The episcopate makes infallible decisions concerning the faith just because it makes those decisions in the name of the Church and in the internal connection with the Church, and by taking in account the Church's thinking relating to the Church's life into Christ. And the episcopate can do this for it takes the decisions in communion. And the communion assures not only on each bishop, but also all of them together, against the dictatorial tendency within Church. Each of them and all of them together are limited in exercising the right to make decisions concerning the faith, by their reciprocal inter-conditioning, but also by the fact that they seek together the agreement amongst them, in accord with the Church's Tradition from always, by the fact that they reciprocally brake, any tendency towards mastery one or another would manifest it. The history of the Orthodox Church proves that the practice of the synodal character guarded the Church against any changes concerning the faith which the decisions made by a sole person have brought in Catholicism, and against the chaos of the individual opinions existing in Protestantism. Neither in Catholicism nor in Protestantism the living Tradition of the Church wasn't normative - namely the Tradition as practice of sacramental and spiritual life - but, in both Christian formations from Occident, the tone was set by a rational individual speculation disconnected from the Church's life." (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

"Thus, the Orthodox Church has as Christ Himself as its foundation, Christ being with His sacrificed and resurrected body in the deep of the Church. The Orthodox Church's unity is an ontological unity or, better said, it is a supra-ontological unity. In Catholicism, such a unity has been weakened by the fact that through Mysteries one receives only a created grace, and not the grace as uncreated energy in which there is Christ Himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

“The Orthodox faith isn’t absent either in the Orthodox Church. But it is not the faith in what the Rome’s Bishop says about Christ as absent in hearts and within Church, but it is the faith in Christ’s live in Christ’s presence and efficiency, with the assumed, sacrificed, and resurrected body, within Church. This kind of faith has its center in Christ, it keeps the believers attached to Christ, it gives the believers the experience of the objective-spiritual reality of Christ, and the believers take out of Christ Who is present with His sanctified and resurrected body, the power of a life striving to die to the sin, to progress into virtues, and to taste the earnest of the resurrection into the soul.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

“These speculations, partially having their origin in the doctrine of Jakob Böhme²¹⁴ about Sophia, they have lost the religious support of the Revelation through faith. They are the fruit of the free fantasy. The theory of Bulgakov gets out, besides that, from the Christian logical scheme, passing into pantheism²¹⁵. That’s why it is recommended lots of reserve when studying it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We can see how far from truth are the Protestant theologians when they separate the word from love, either to Jesus, or in the teaching of the Church²¹⁶.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Anselm of Canterbury formulated the theory that the death of Jesus Christ satisfied the honor of God, which was offended by people through the hereditary sin, on which, they, by not being able to satisfy, they had to suffer dying. Jesus, by being a man, He legally represented the people for satisfying the divine honor, but by being God too, His death had the efficacy which could not have any death of a simple man. The wisdom of God, it has found this modality to wash His honor offended by people, but also to fulfill His love which He wanted the salvation of the people through.

This theory expresses, in fact, a truth when it regards the death of Jesus Christ not only like a manifestation of the divine love, but also like an act imposed by the justice of God. The mistake consists in the coloring of this fund with the nuances of the medieval mentality. God is shown like a medieval knight of whom relentless endeavor does not aim anything else but to obtaining the satisfaction for His offended honor. He is thought either like not having tranquility since His honor was touched by people, or like not being able to forgive them without receiving satisfaction for the offence He took. The honor of God is made dependent on people. In the work of salvation, God is preoccupied whether not exclusively with repairing His honor, in any case, He is preoccupied with it into a main degree. This sight of Anselm led, in the Protestant theology, to the theory of a vengeful God. Into the death of Jesus Christ God thirstily revenges against the human sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²¹⁴ A. KOYRE, op. c.

²¹⁵ Agnetz Bojii (The Lamb of God), Paris, 1933.

²¹⁶ See, for example, at E. Brunner in his books: Der Mittler and Wort und Mystik, or at K. Barth, who dilutes the divine revelation in Jesus, by seeing in Him only the word which came from inaccessible distances, without bringing with it a more felt closeness of God.

“The Anglican theologian R. C. Moberly, in the book entitled “Atonement and Personality”, (considered by J. K. Mozley like the richest book in influences upon Anglicanism in the nineteenth century, and like a turning back to the Greek Fathers, “Christologie und Soteriologie”, in Mysterium Christi, Berlin, Furche-Verlag, 1930, p. 226-7), it sustains a theory in which are comprised many correct intuitions, though it appears to us that it does not speak very clearly about a satisfaction brought to God. But the repentance to death, which Jesus provided on behalf of the whole mankind, in which the theory of Moberly is summarized, it was necessary for reestablishing the human nature, it means that it corresponded to a divine order, since this reestablishing could not be accomplished without being a potential sufferance to death.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Orthodox teaching remains faithful to the New Testament: it doesn’t rationalize the Mystery of the God in Trinity, but, based on experiencing God Who communicates Himself to us in love, into the Ghost, through the uncreated energies, it doesn’t keep God neither at distance from us, as in the rationalist-monotheistic religions (Judaism and Mohammedanism), nor it leads us to the merging with God, as in the pantheistic religions and philosophies., who know as unique reality an essence of some sort.” (Stăniloae 1992: 31)

“By taking this inadequacy in account, the iconoclasts rejected any symbol. They have in this the same position which is had by the unbelievers, who consider the world as a reality that doesn’t reflect the existence of God, or with the agnostics, who declare that it is impossible to know anything about God. Of course, in this regard, the iconoclasts radically differed from unbelievers for, while the unbelievers place the accent on the seen world in such an exclusive manner that they consider it as the sole reality, the iconoclasts annulled almost any dignity of the seen world in their tendency of denying any spiritual meaning of it in guiding us towards God. The icons' defenders, on the opposite, they affirmed the dignity of the seen world by admitting its reports with God." (Stăniloae 2005: 101)

"One can say that the Church, by establishing the dogma about icons, it affirmed the virtual holiness of the creation, it took a positive attitude regarding the world seen in its ensemble. Saint John Damascene didn't shy to raise a true hymn to the material matter itself, for it has been made worthy to be creature, to be symbol, and to the dwelling place of God: "I do not worship the material matter, he said, but I worship the Maker of the matter. I worship the One Who has made Himself matter, for me, and He accepted to dwell within matter, and He worked, through matter, my salvation. But I do not honor the material matter as God, let that not be! (...)" (Stăniloae 2005: 101)

"The connection between the light of Christ which the believers are dressed up with – partially in the present life and totally in the future life –, with the cleaning of passions, it shows that living of this mystery, or the mystique of the full living into Christ, it must be preceded by asceticism or by the striving for detaching from passions. The Occidental theology doesn't see this. That's why to the Occidental theology, the mysticism isn't a living into the light of God but it is a mysticism of the darkness. Like that it is the mysticism of Eckhardt. Like that it is the mysticism of Jakob Böhme, who remained in the conception of living faithfully subservient to the Protestant teaching that the man cannot get rid of his sins during the present life, but only at the final judgment and only if that man believed that the God's offended honor has been satisfied by Christ Who died for us. Therefore, the mysticism of the mentioned theologians it is rather a philosophical theory about the man's sinking into the divine impersonal essence than an encounter with God as loving Person. That's why in Occident there hasn't been developed a philokalist teaching of the asceticism towards the liberation from passions, the passions as considered as fruits of the egotism." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 131-132)

"The Western theology hasn't been able to see the Creation as result of the union between God's freedom and love, because they separated themselves from the tradition of the Eastern Fathers. The Occidental Catholic theology, though it affirms that the universe is only analogue to God, and that God has created the universe "according to its (universe's) whole substance" (secundum totam suam substantiam) it is exposed to a pantheist danger, by not discerning between the God's being and things. That's why, the mentioned expression means either that the divine being has in Itself the virtuality of some works differing from Itself, or that It extends Itself in the objects brought to existence. Until they won't decide in favor of the difference between God's being and works, there will always be room for confusion. Thus, it is difficult to avoid a difference between the Son, the Holy Ghost, and the universe. The mentioned doctrine tried to escape this conclusion by declaring that one cannot discern between the idea of universe and the God's being, but immediately that this idea is directed towards the universe's external objects, it becomes many (Ludwig Ott, Grundriss der Dogmatik, Herder, 1965, pp. 950-961). But, how could have appeared diverse objects, if there hadn't been within God except one idea about them?" (Stăniloae 1995: 23)

"The Protestant theology struggled to see the Creation, either as emanation out of God's being, or as product of a creator act having at its basis a totally discretionary decision of God. The emanationism was characteristic to the Protestant theology during the XIX Century. The discretionary character of the creator act, that has produced a universe that has nothing from God, it was embraced by some Protestant theologians as extreme reaction against emanationism. Today, they are searching for a solution to these two positions, out of the desire for coming back closer to the Holy Fathers' teaching. In this orientation, they declare that God decided freely to create the universe (so that He had the alternative too, of not creating the universe), but in this decision His being manifested too. Jürgen Moltman has formulated this union between the God's decision to create the universe and the manifestation of His being in the act of the Creation, as in the following: "According to the emanationist teaching, the divine being opens Itself. But if the decision for Creation is a "existential decision" of God, we must say that God opens (in order to communicate Himself), on Himself, in the decision He took" (Gott in der Schöpfung, Chr. Kaiser Verlag, Munich, 1985, p. 98). In fact, this opinion doesn't; differ from that belonging to the Holy Fathers. It is important that also in Moltman's formulation, the God's will ultimately it decided too, whether or not to create the universe, and the will communicates the being's power of the work, and not the being Itself; and the universe isn't the God's power or work themselves, in an existence distinct from God; the universe cannot come to existence, neither it can subsist, without God's power or work. Still, God gives the universe something out of His power or work." (Stăniloae 1995: 23-24)

"The Occidental theology, by no knowing the difference between God's being and God's works, it unavoidably has reached to some sort of pantheistic understanding the universe. By identifying within God, the being to the work, the Occidental theology sees within universe a part the God's being. But this is an impossibility. Everything that comes out of being it is born out of being (at God, the Holy Ghost is proceeded). That's why, the theory of the emanation of some ever-reduced degrees of existence, out of source-being, it unacceptable." (Stăniloae 1995: 26)

Paradise

“The happiness the ones who had Christ within them go to, by being the unveiled fullness of the communion with Him, it is on one hand incommensurable plus, and on the other hand it is a continuity of the communion from the life on earth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 189)

“The ones who will be at happiness, they will be close to Christ, not physically but from the soul’s point of view, close to the tens of thousands of angels (Hebr. 12: 22-23), in the multitude of the ones staying before the throne and before the Lamb, being they dressed up in white clothes, or spreading around only purity, and having in their hand the tree branches of the eternity, glorifying the Lamb, with the full conscience that He is the salvation, that out of his gentleness and life, they have life (Apoc. 17: 9-10). They will be “in the lord’s yards”, “in the sweetness of the Paradise” – all of these being expressions of the communion with Christ and with all the ones who believe in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 191)

“The ones in Paradise, are gathered again in the Word, through Whom and in Whose image, they have been created, they becoming at maximum in His likeness (Ephes. 1: 10). As that One is the Rationality of all rationalities, or the Meanings which everybody’s meanings can be seen illuminated in, but He is the same time One, out of the unity of the Trinity as Godhead whose life is the endless love, to the ones who are elevated in Him they bear in the most luminous form His seal, never getting fed up in contemplating the endless meanings in Him, and of His loving communion, for they participate through Him to the love of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 310)

“The man, being able to advance, through kindness, in the consummation of the godlike image from within himself, to an increasingly higher likeness with God, through an ever-greater union in love with God and with his fellow humans, and by this the man advances into the life of the happy immortality. But to the immortality with the body, according to the Christian faith, the man cannot reach after his body feel prey to corruption and to death through the Adam’s sin, except through the resurrection that has been made possible to us through the resurrection of the Son of God Who has assumed our body and Who defeated the death through His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16)

Paradox

“It has been noticed the paradoxical character of the dogmas; God is One in Being but threefold in Persons, he is unchangeable but alive, active and new in His action of Providence and of saving the world; Christ is God and man: the man remains a created being but though he is being deified; but there is paradox everywhere.” (Stăniloae 2003: 97)

“(The paradox, o. n.), is especially characteristic to the person, generally, because the person isn’t submitted to a standardizing law, and because the person can embrace everything. The person is a unity, but is also an endless richness: the person is the same and though is endlessly various and new in his manifestations and states. The relations between persons manifest even highly this paradoxical character.” (Stăniloae 2003: 97-98)

“Even in the relations with the world, the person shows this own paradoxical character: the person embraces the world in its whole variety, bringing the world to unity, but the person still remains distinct and one, and it maintains the world in its whole variety. The more inevitable is the paradox in the relations of the infinite God with the limited and created world; God the One, having His life in an above our understanding mode, He is in an interpersonal love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

“The dogmatic formulas are paradoxical because they catch in themselves essential contradictory aspects of the living of an inexhaustible richness reality. Thus, the dogmas express everything: the infinite and the finite, united without abolishment in all their aspects.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

“The knowledge about God is keeps continuously a paradoxical character: the more somebody is elevated in knowing God, he is elevated to the understanding of His incomprehensible mystery.” (Stăniloae 2003: 128)

“We must always keep in mind the paradoxical fact that, although each time God is efficient through a different work, He is whole in each of His works.” (Stăniloae 2003: 150)

“God waits, “with long-patience”, for our turning back to him, for our awakening, to the love He offers us. But, simultaneously to these, He enjoys the non-temporality, or the absence of the interval in the reciprocal manifestation of the love amongst the Trinitarian Subjects. What increases even more the paradox it is the fact that the joy of the intra-Trinitarian love it coexists with the waiting for the answer of the human person and with the sadness for this answer’s tardiness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 191)

“The sight of God concerning us, it stretches over the entire future, and that is why he waits for us with long-patience and He is satisfied with less than we would be. He is in waiting, or in time, and he is above waiting too, in eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 192)

“God announces the future through prophets. He announces the future benefactions or the future punishments from Him. This means both that His deeds depend on time, but also the anticipated embracing of the time. Out times is a reality to him too, but He still is above time. He is above time by the fact that the man is internally moved by the offer from God, or by His appeal, by the fact that we are moved towards an answer by the eternal love God offers us. Through the action continuously manifested through appeal, God is like an arch stretched over the interval between His offer and our answer, between eternity and time. Only when we become totally insensitive to this offer, only when we no longer have within us any preoccupation with answering, only then we no longer depend on the work of God, and we no longer are kept by His work in a movement towards eternity. Thus, God makes His eternity efficient by the fact that we are being led, towards this surpassing, by the power of His intra-Trinitarian love, and therefore due to the eternity of God, due to his love, and due to his life above time.” (Stăniloae 2003: 192-193)

“A number of people, by maintaining themselves at a spiritual distance between them and Christ, the embodied Son of God, they put Christ in the situation to see Himself also at a distance from them. These people are deceived by the idea of the maximum accessibility of God and they do not believe in Christ. Thus, though on a transcendent plan God is with His being everywhere, in the order to the accessibility Christ has assumed it, there is the following paradox: on one hand God is in Christ in a maximum closeness to all the people, but on the other hand He accepts to be kept at distance, following to be searched for, or not, by them, while he wants to come close to them. Namely, in Christ, God accepts the space, of course in order to surpass the space, to embrace the space with our help, by embracing us without confounding us to Him, and without annulling the space related to the people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 218)

“The rational creatures have to go through a progress to the full interiority between them and God and to fully knowing Him and of His things towards them, it is given in the paradox that, on one hand, God is fully united with the creatures since the beginning, and therefore He fully knows them, in His quality as cause of theirs; on the other hand, God isn’t united with them, because neither the creatures, at their turn, they haven’t accomplished the reciprocal union and interiority with them, and therefore neither Him has accomplished at His turn the reciprocal interiority with them; consequently, he doesn’t see the creatures fully accomplished on the road they are travelling towards this target.” (Stăniloae 2003: 244)

“There was a time when the coincidence of the opposite things it was considered as incompatible to the rationality. Wherever such a synthesis was encountered – and the whole reality is like this – the rationality crumbled it down in irreconcilable, contradictory notions, by placing ones against others, or my trying to forcedly merge them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 299)

“The rationality is now used to unite the principles of the distinction and of the unity in understanding the reality, in such a measure that it is no longer difficult at all to see the antinomic mode of being of the whole reality. To the rationality it is today a general fact that the plurality doesn’t tear apart the unity, and the unity doesn’t annul the plurality. It is a fact that the plurality is necessarily interior to the unity, or that the unity manifests itself in plurality. It is a fact that the plurality maintains the unity and that the unity maintains the plurality, and that the weakening of one of them it means the weakening or the disappearance of the life or of the existence of whatever entity. This mode of being of the reality it is known today as superior to the notion of rationality from yore, and the notion of the rationality it has become, under the force of the reality, complex and antinomic. Affirmations considered yore as being irrational due to they apparently contradictory character, they are now recognized as indicating a natural stage the rationality must tend towards, as stage of which understanding it constitutes the natural destiny of the rationality, and which is an image of the supra-natural character of the perfect unity of the distinct ones in the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 299)

“The effort towards understanding the unitary-distinct constitution of the reality it helps us to elevate ourselves towards the supra-rational paradox of the perfect unity of the three distinct Persons, represented by the unity of being of the three godlike Persons. By ascending towards this understanding, we are ascending towards promoting an increasingly higher unity amongst us as distinct human persons. This is for the closest image of the Holy Trinity it is the unity of being and the people’s distinction as persons. Of course, this effort is insufficient in order to elevate by ourselves towards a higher understanding of the Holy Trinity, known through Revelation, and for deepening the unity amongst us – because we need to be helped by the grace itself of the Holy Trinity, or by the power of the Holy Trinity, which strengthens within us the unity, but without weakening us as persons, and by doing so the grace helps us to increasingly understand such a supreme unity between the persons which remain not-confounded.” (Stăniloae 2003: 300)

“Given the fact that in the state of impeccability the man had it in the beginning it was involved the unimpeded communion with God, and this is the basis of the consistency of the human nature and of its incorruptibility and of its immortality according to the grace, the Holy Fathers rightly attribute to the man from before falling, the state of incorruptibility and of immortality and of shininess, in the light of God. For the man wasn't asked for anything else but to persevere in will in that state of impeccability for, by spiritual strengthening, the incorruptibility and the immortality still not fully assimilated to the man's person to become some features definitively assimilated through virtue. Through sin, though, the people have been brought back to death which was and which wasn't characteristic to their nature. Thus, the death and the corruptibility depend on one hand on the human nature, when the human nature remains in connection with God, and on the other hand they are contrary to the made out of nothing human nature's aspiration, when the human nature remains in itself. The death's, and the corruptibility's report, with the nature it has the same paradoxical meaning like the nature's notion itself: it is, on one hand, a reality by itself, distinct from God, and in the same time it cannot come to existence and it cannot maintain and develop itself without the relation with God, or without a certain participation to God." (2003: 432-433)

"One cannot say that knowing the nature's rationality through the mediation of the human rationality it doesn't represent at its turn a development of the human spirit. We have thus, also in this, an ambiguity, that means a simultaneous increasing and weakening of our powers, symbolized by the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the bad." (2003: 497)

"A clearer formulation to the communication of the features between the two natures in Christ, it was given by Saint Maximos the Confessor. He admits, on one hand, that in Christ the features of the two natures are maintained to some extent, so that they can be known as human. But the features always are combined with the ones of the other nature. This means a deification of the human nature, to some degree, while still being in the earthly existence. The deification of the human nature will be full after resurrection. But even then, through cogitation, it will be known what will be deified and what will be deifying, namely the human nature as differing from the godlike nature, though in reality the two natures cannot be separated and not even discerned from one another. Paradoxically, there takes place, on one hand, a continuous progress in deification, and on the other hand, the human nature won't get out of its definition, it won't get out of its specificity, and it won't get out of the fact that it will always need to receive, whilst the godlike nature will remain always an always inexhaustible reserve of life and of light." (Stăniloae 2006: 27)

"The paradox is that, through the suffering accepted through kenosis, the Son of God communicated to the human nature a godlike nature, and on this way there is no longer a contradiction between the power the Son of God gives it to His body, making His body a collaborator in committing wonders, or making His body life-maker, and the power of enduring and, through this, of overcoming the passions. Enduring the sufferings, without speaking against, it is a power too. These sufferings are actually the body's needs which, when satisfied, they offer pleasure, and when they aren't satisfied, they cause pain. But the man has become so accustomed to the pleasure of satisfying the bodily needs, that he satisfies them even beyond the necessary measure, by searching the pleasure itself. And the man runs away from pain, even with the price of renouncing to the values which maintain the spiritual health of the human nature, and he overlooks the durable future for the sake of the passing present instant. The man overlooks the fact that repeatedly satisfying the present pleasures it will bring a continuous chain of future pains. Jesus kept in check the tendency towards pleasure, by satisfying the human nature's needs only within the strictly necessary frame, and when, by doing this, He risked the weakening of the spiritual powers and the betrayal of the spiritual values, He satisfied the body's need even lesser, and He accepted even the pain of death. He did this for through it He restored the human nature's strength, namely He brought the human nature back to its real conform state." (Stăniloae 2006: 31)

"We bring to Christ the most total worshipping, accompanied by the deepest love. The embodied Son of God has unveiled us the mystery of the serving dominion and, together with this, He has unveiled us the paradoxical joining between the deepest worshipping and the warmest love. Between the real mastery and the true serving there is no contradiction, but they constitute an apparent paradox. Only the pride's sin has separated these two, and it has created a contradiction between them. This is because of the sin separates everything in the spiritual order and in the sensitive order, and it creates a false order, a forced order. Only the pride's sin has separated our heart from God and we rather worship Him out of fear. Christ has reestablished the true worshipping towards God and towards Himself, by revealing us the loving God. We worship Christ as God, all the fuller of love, for He has made, on Himself, the Son of man, and but this He has made us His brothers and sons of the kindest heavenly Father. Until He hasn't made, on Himself, man, and until He hasn't received the death on cross for us, the Word of God Himself wasn't known and exalted by the whole creation, as he has become known and exalted after that." (Stăniloae 2006: 45).

"In Christ's case there is an identity between the one who commits the sacrifice and the sacrifice, meaning that His Person Himself is a willing sacrifice, that the sacrifice is the person who sacrifices on himself, that one cannot discerns between the passive state of the sacrifice and the spontaneity of the one who commits the sacrifice, that one cannot separate between the passive state of the sacrifice and the active disposition of the ones who commits the sacrifice. The same is active as the one who commits the sacrifice and passive as being the sacrifice, better said, sacrifice as receiver of the state of sacrifice; the Same One actively upholds, as the one who commits the sacrifice, His passive state, or receptive of the giving. The paradoxical combination of active and passive - or receptive, in the state of continuous sacrifice, identical to the one who commits the sacrifice, it means that in the self-sacrifice, the one who commits the sacrifice continues to actively uphold His self-giving, the fulfillment of the will of the one whom he has given Himself; He continues to be totally active in this self-giving to the favor of That One; He continues to be whole for That One, and to not be in any way for Himself." (Stăniloae 2006: 98)

"To be the paradox noticed: being different, we compose a body, and by composing a body, or a unity, we are no longer different. Each one's openness towards the whole and his filling up with the whole, it makes him rejoicing of the whole, and so not to life only through what he differs." (Stăniloae 2006: 119)

Personalism

“In the supra-natural Revelation, it is imposed the personal savior reality of God, with a much-accentuated pressure.” (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

“(…) in the supra-natural Revelation, the faith is produced by the evidence or by the truth of the personal reality of God which imposes itself to the man without the man’s effort.” (Stăniloae 2003: 73-74)

“The reality that presses upon us in the supra-natural revelation is the Divine Logos as Person, in the Revelation of the Old Testament in a non-embodied manner, and in an embodied mode in the Revelation of the New Testament.” (Stăniloae 2003: 74)

“A person doesn’t reveal himself, namely he doesn’t open himself except to the one who at his turn opens himself to him too. This belongs to the nature of the revelation as relationship between persons. A person doesn’t reveal himself to me if I do not open myself to him. Much less the divine Person. But since the existence of the divine Person has revealed Himself to me, He becomes obvious, true, and of another degree of existence to me, so that I am no longer able to find a meaning of my existence without the divine Person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 74-75)

“The meaning is the foundation of the existence. In the meaning is the existence’s truth and evidence. But the person has a meaning which is incomparable more important than the things are. The person gives the things a meaning. According to the Christian faith the meaning that is absolutely necessary it is in the divine Person. The divine Person gives meaning to everything. The existence of the divine Person it is ontological. The supra-natural Revelation is necessary to us in order to know about the divine Person and to know our meaning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 75)

“The person is close, and in the same time he is far; the person opens his internal thesaurus and makes himself known, or he doesn’t open that thesaurus and he remains hidden. The truth of the Christian faith is the thesaurus of the supreme Person, which he opens to the one who opens to Him through faith. This openness it means my free choice for what I accept to reckon as being true.” (Stăniloae 2003: 75)

“The first basis for accepting the dogmas it is their communication through the supra-natural Revelation, in which the personal divine quality it presses through its initiative, upon the human being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 76)

“(…) there is no salvation for the human person except the communication with the supreme Person. Outside this communication, the human person doesn’t find the power to spiritually strengthen himself and to remain eternal as person, not reduced to the nature, or: not reduced almost to nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 78)

“The Christian dogmas are an insurance of the liberty of the believer as person, not letting the human person to be submitted to the nature and dissolved in the nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 78-79)

Within the Holy trinity (o. n.): “(...) the absolute is tri-personal, and it is not something impersonal. But the person is ensured through the perfect love between person and person, a love having its basis in the common being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“Only in the Trinity being a unity of not-confounded Persons, the character of person is fully ensured. A person without communion is not a person. And the communion is conditioned by a common nature. We do not know what the divine nature is in itself, except the fact that it is consummate. But we know that the divine nature is the basis of the consummate communion between the divine Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 82)

“The Christian dogma on the union of the godlike nature and of the human nature in the Person of God the Word, it doesn’t foresee the loss of the man in the infinity of God. This dogma highlights our preservation even on the level of this supreme union between divine and human; even more than that, it provides the human with a maximum development.” (Stăniloae 2003: 96)

“God, as Person, he always remains a You, differing from the man united with him. In the communion of the persons, each one remains, in the same time, a border for the other one; each man had within himself the other person, but as differing. In their interiority there is an alterity. In the Christian faith the man remains defined even in the maximum union with God and while being imparting with the infinity of God. Or, more precisely, the one who believes he deepens at maximum also in what himself is, as creature differing from God, in the union with God. The different structures are strictly preserved, though they become internal to one another; or, they are preserved just because they are reciprocally internal.” (Stăniloae 2003: 96-97)

“The divine nature, the human nature, especially when united in a culminant mode, but unmerged in the godlike Person of Christ, they comprise and offer the thinking an infinite content. One can never exhaust the explaining of the divine nature and of the human nature in their richness of life and, in the same time, in their unalterable character, like it is also impossible to exhaust the description of the depths and of the complexity of their union in a Person Who is, Himself, an inexhaustible mystery, always new and yet unalterable.” (Stăniloae 2003: 98-99)

“What also makes the apophatic, direct, and mysterious knowledge, different from the rational, and deductive knowledge, it is the fact that in the first one the human subject lives the presence of God in a more pressing way as person. But understanding God as Person isn’t excluded either by the affirmative-rational knowledge, although the mystery of His Person isn’t revealed to the man in such an accentuated, profound, and pressing manner. (...) Both these ways of knowing God are based on the supra-natural revelation when is about knowing God as Person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 117-118)

“This pressing presence of God as Person, out of Whom irradiates His infinity, it is not the conclusion of a rational judgment, as in the case of the rational intellectual knowledge which is cataphatic or negative, but it is being noticed in a state of thin spiritual sensitiveness, a state that doesn’t occur as long as the man is dominated by bodily pleasures or by any passion of any kind. This thin spiritual sensitiveness requires a getting above passions, a getting rid of passions. After a more durable purifying, the thinness of the spiritual sensitiveness, which is capable of such a perceiving, of the mysterious reality of God, it is also more durable.” (Stăniloae 2003: 121)

“God is not the essence of the world, or of the human spirit; God is transcendent to these ones, because He is uncreated, and these ones are created. The transcendence of God is provided by His character of Person, capable of being above an infinity which is not a person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 123)

“Only the transcendent Person ensures an infinity that isn’t in a continuity of essence with the essence of the world or with the essence of the human spirit; but the transcendent Person is in a continuity which is possible by grace, by the man’s participation due to the benevolence of the godlike Person and due to our being’s effort. In this case, the impartation of the last one with infinity, it implies the joy of the communion, with the perspective of becoming eternal, without being the man annulled as person. Otherwise, the infinity wouldn’t ensure the person except momentarily.” (Stăniloae 2003: 123-124)

“If God is transcendent, then He is a Person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 124)

The Christian knowledge of God implies both a descending of God to the capacity of the man of noticing Him, and his transcendence. God descends through His energies. His quality as a Person it ensures His transcendence. His Person transcends even His infinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 124)

“(…) God is not identical to any of what we call as His features: neither to infinity, nor to eternity, and neither to simplicity. He is above these ones. They neither are the essence of God nor are they the Persons in Whom the Being of God subsists integrally, but they are “around the Being of God”.” (Stăniloae 2003: 124)

“We can say that there are two kinds of apophatic knowledge: the apophatic knowledge of what is experienced but it cannot be defined, and the apophatic kind of knowledge of what cannot be even experienced. They are simultaneous to one another. What is experienced it has an intelligible character too, for it is expressed, though, in affirmative and negative intellectual terms. But this intelligibility is always insufficient. The Being Who remains beyond experience, but we still feel that Being as a source of everything we experience, it subsists in a Person. By subsisting in a Person, the Being is the living source of energies or of acts which are communicated to us. That’s why the apophatic has as ultimate basis the Person; and that’s why, neither this apophatic kind of knowledge doesn’t mean a total opening of God in Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 125-126)

“God cannot be comprised in notions for He is the Life, or better said, He is the source of the life. Thus, no person can be defined because is alive and in a certain measure any person is a source of life. Even the less can be defined God, because He is the Supreme Person. The one who thinks he knows God, namely he limits God by using notions, he is spiritually dead from Christian point of view.” (Stăniloae 2003: 133)

“The One Who shines is Christ as Person, to the ones who through purification have reaches the full love. Only out of a person comes an inexhaustible light, a continuous novelty of meanings and of love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 138-139)

“In knowing God out of the concrete circumstances of the life, our being lives, practically, the kindness, the power, the righteousness, and the wisdom of God, His attentive care for us, the special plan of God with our being. In this report the human person lives a report of particular intimacy with God as Supreme Person. In this knowledge I no longer see God only as the Creator and the Providence Doer, of all things, or as the Mystery making Himself known to everybody and Who fills everybody up with, more or less, the same joys; but I know Him out of His special care for me, in his intimate report with me, in the history of His relations with me, in his plan leading me, especially me, towards our common target, through the pains, through the claims, and through the particular directions he established to me in my life. (...) this mystery is lived especially in these states of responsibility, of being conscious about the own sinfulness, of feeling the need for repentance, of encountering the insurmountable difficulties in life. (...) all these circumstances cause a thinning, they make our being sensitive for noticing the realities from beyond the world, in order to search for a meaning of these circumstances.” (Stăniloae 2003: 145)

“The full relation between person and person it is a relation of power in the positive sense of the word, it is a relation of feeling that is opposite to indifference and to drowsiness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147)

“(...) even the human person as subsistent of the being, that as such maintains the being as a reserve that isn’t exhausted by any acts, it has no name to be characterized by, in itself. The names we give to the persons (John, Peter, etc.) are conventional. These names do not say what the person is. All the other names we want to characterize the persons with, they all refer the person’s modes of manifestation. That’s why the person himself uses a pronoun (I) in order to indicate himself. And in the relation of intimacy with the other one, the person calls that one as you. Even the less we can attribute a name to the Supreme Subject. The name doesn’t indicate the content of the person. The name restricts and masters. The person cannot be restricted and dominated by knowing him. The person is, generally and by excellence, apophatic. The person is above the directly noticeable existence. The person is notice out of his acts. The person is on another plan, on the supra-existential plan. The more is such the supreme Person. But neither the attributes can be comprised in names. The attributes have a dynamic character and they activate their efficiency through diverse acts. Or, the inexhaustible simplicity of the divine essence is activated under the form of varied features through its acts.” (Stăniloae 2003: 152)

“God is, like personal reality, the undetermined source of all the features which are somehow determined by coming out of Him. The divine personal reality is undetermined in an eminent manner, for it is the hypostatizing of the supra-essence, out of which any created essence receives its existence. We can say that God is the three-personal supra-essence, or the supra-essential three-personality. What this supra-essence is, we do not know. But it is from itself. But, like any essence, it is not real except by the fact that it subsists in a hypostatic manner, in persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 156)

“The life by himself, the existence by himself, the wisdom by himself, they cannot exist as some general attributes of a multitude of entities, which themselves depend on one another. If the case was that, these attributes wouldn’t be lived concretely by any of the entities, as attributes in themselves. Their existence by themselves it would be an abstraction. The world, being in reality a sum of dependent entities, it cannot be as a whole an independent reality. These attributes cannot exist except as attributes of a unique personal reality. Actually, only a supreme Person can be, Himself and all His things, by Himself.

Even the human person, as image of the supra-existential Person, he has somehow the quality of being n y himself. The human person is the last to decide his acts, his thoughts, and his words. Upon the human person there are exercised many actions. But the human person stops those actions and he alone decides whether he wants to transmit those actions forwards and the form he wants to transmit they in. The human person is not a simple part of a mechanism a movement started from somewhere else is transmitted by. The human person is not for the system he is part of in a certain degree, but the human person is by himself, having the possibility of being somehow above the system. The human person thinks at how can be profitable to himself an action that is being exercised upon him, an action that by doing this it rather asks for the person's adhesion than to get through the person without asking for permission. The person is not for something, but everything is for the person. Although, our human person is brought to existence by another factor and our person needs the connections with the elements of a system in order to spiritually enrich himself, even though he uses this connection in the way he wants. Our person develops himself through the ensemble of the act he has produced, and through the ensemble of his relations with the surrounding things. But also, these ones are always depending on the human person. And, in a certain manner, the human person comes from the existence itself not through an act of fabrication, but is sprouts out within existence by answering a call from God." (Stăniloae 2003: 157-158)

"Thus, even the human person doesn't totally belong to the system of references in which the nature is totally framed through its strict rules. Therefore, only a reality of human person's kind, but incomparably superior to him, can have the capacity of not belonging at all to a system of references. In the references system of the nature everything ends in death, in order to appear other things. Our human being cannot exist as person not integrally framed in the system of references, except for the fact that there is such a supreme Person. The report with that Person isn't identical to the appurtenance to an involuntary system of references. In the report with that supreme Person, as in the report with any other person, our human person is free. Even that supreme Person gives the human person the possibility of a freedom from the references system, as in some measure does to him also the person of his fellow human. Any other person the human person is in relation with, appeals him in order to do certain acts, and doesn't purely use him as passing point for its movements." (Stăniloae 2003: 158)

"(...) our human person is by himself/herself, or absolute, in the sense that he decides in all his acts, acts which have effect in him and in the external reality." (Stăniloae 2003: 158)

"The supreme Person is by Himself in the supreme sense of the word. This is because he actually is from nobody and everything is from Him: His own acts and the reality produced by these acts. The supreme Person not only produces modifications in the realities from outside Him, but he also creates these realities. The existence by Himself, as real existence and not as only thought existence (anybody could think at it), it is subsistent, it is hypostatic, it is the absolute hypostatical existence. This means that all the things have their origin in the supreme Person's power and will. This means also that the His being is of a totally another order than the created being. The supreme Person is supra-essential, He is supra-existential, and He is the transcendence of the entire creation. The reality of the supreme Person is totally free of any references system, and he is fully the ultimate forum of all His acts, and that's why, he is the ultimate forum of any other existences. Only this explains the existence of our human persons and it can provide us some freedom from the references systems we are in." (Stăniloae 2003: 158-159)

"Only as supreme Person God is from Himself and all His attributes are from Himself and he can give the human person also the possibility to be imparted with this being by Himself quality of His and of His acts." (Stăniloae 2003: 159)

"Even the infinity experienced by us it has its support in the supra-existent and apophatic Person Who is therefore above infinity and "exceeding the whole infinity"." (Stăniloae 2003: 159)

"The existence by Himself it would have been useless to God if he hadn't had anybody to receive it from, or to communicate it to. The supra-natural Revelation satisfies through its teaching about the Holy Trinity, the both sides of the paradox. God has His existence from Himself; but He is alive for he receives and communicates the existence within Himself. This last fact makes the person's character whole, for this character isn't only a reality existing by itself, but it is also communion. The Divine Persons are interior to One Another, namely They do not receive anything from outside Themselves, but they are not confounded to One Another, They being in a movement and in a communication of the being and of the love. The total interpersonal community intensifies to the supreme degree the character of God as Person." (Stăniloae 2003: 161)

"The reality of the divine Person being above all His attribute, attributes which can be defined even though He doesn't have these attributes from somebody else, it is the apophatic reality by excellence. If everything that enters the range of the knowledge, and whether everything that can be participated to, it belongs to the category of the existence, the person is supra-existent. (...) as image of God, even our human person has, somehow, an apophatic, supra-existential character.” (Stăniloae 2003: 161)

“God – being existent by Himself, namely not entering any references system and being by this supra-existent in a culminant manner, or He is Person – He is by excellence apophatic, indefinable. For He is not given His existence from outside Him, but He is Himself the source of the existence, He is the supreme reality as Person, neither Himself is defined and called except by using personal pronouns, or He is identified to the existence by excellence, or to the source that is above existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 161)

“The One Who is truly existent, by the fact that He exists by Himself, or He is the support of the existing by Himself, and therefore He is supra-existence or supra-existential, God is the supreme reality as Person. Only as the supreme reality as Person, he is totally apophatic, for only He has existence in an eminent manner. Of course, His reality is, by excellence, supra-existent or apophatic as subsistence of the godlike Being, for God is the hypostatizing of the divine supra-existent Being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 162)

“(…) our rationality has as support the rationality of a person Who created it. Thus, God calling Himself as the One Who really exists, or supra-existent, He presents Himself in the same time as a real Person: Me. He is the Me by excellence. The existence by Himself it cannot be but of a Person. The impersonal essence isn't supra-existent. The impersonal essence would fall, in all aspects, in a references system. There is nowhere essence that doesn't subsist in a hypostasis. But the fullest existence the essence has it by subsisting in a person, and the consummate existence it is that existing as the reality of the supreme Person. The supreme essence is the existence by itself, and it is a person. The essence that still is submitted to a references system it doesn't subsist by itself, neither in form nor in its reality. That essence enters the order of the existence that is determined by the supra-existent subject.” (Stăniloae 2003: 163)

“Only by subsisting as reality of the supreme Person, the godlike supra-existence can be by Itself, since only thus It can be also for Itself. An essence or a nature that subsists as an object, it exists for a subject who differs from it, namely for a person, and on the basis of this fact it receives its shape from the human person, in report with the human person; and in report with the divine Person, it even receives its substance from the divine Person. The reality which is for another, it receives also its existence and its shape from that one. That reality is inferior to the person and as such it isn't supra-essence, but it is simply existence, in the references system. Only a person exists for himself and only the hypostasis is by excellence, supra-existential.” (Stăniloae 2003: 164)

“Only for there is a Person as reality and supreme supra-existent support of the existence by himself, there is everywhere given an existence. The existence from the accessible plan being the voluntary product of the reality of the supra-existent Person, it cannot be neither its own cause not the ultimate cause of an existence everywhere. Only the reality of the supra-existent Person, as support of the existence by the self, it can produce - without being exhausted - the existence on all the existence plans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 164)

“The Threefold Supreme Hypostasis creates, upholds, and consummates all the things, through all His inexhaustible acts, for He is the threefold hypostasis of the supra-essence. Our subject is the hypostatizing of a nature whose fundamental part is the spirit, which, amongst all essences created by God, it is the image of the supra-essence hypostatized by the Trinitarian Persons. Only because of that, our subject can have person character, and only because of that our subject is endowed with an eternal stability like the other existences do not have. (...) Only because of that, our subject is apophatic at its turn and doesn’t exhaust himself in acts, for his acts (or his energies) aren’t one with the essence, as it is in case of the objects.” (Stăniloae 2003: 164)

“Not only the definable existence it has its explanation exclusively in a supra-existent reality of a Person, but the human persons too, though they are in some degree partakers to the supra-existence, to the absolute and to the apophatic character of the supreme Being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 166)

“According to our faith, if there hadn’t existed a supra-existent Person, not framed in the references system of the nature, there wouldn’t have been possible to exist either the human person, who is in some degree supra-existent at his turn, and capable of an existence that not to be fully framed in the references system of the nature – or framed with one of his arms in this system in order to penetrate the nature with his person character – and called to the communion with such a perfect and eternal existence, namely in free relationship with the supreme Person. Only the transcendence of the divine Person ensures the existence of the persons as not fully framed in the nature’s references system (after God provides them this freedom). Otherwise, everything would fall under the nature’s, and death’s meaningless laws.” (Stăniloae 2003: 166)

“(…) God is Person and, as such, He can live on multiple registers, or better said on two main registers: the register of existing in Himself, and the register of the activity for another person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 178)

“The eternity of God is comprised in the inexhaustible fountain of His existence by Himself. The general existence couldn’t be born out of void. And the existence by the self it cannot be except a personal existence. It is the supreme existence like supreme person, Who, being in Himself inexhaustible, He is ultimate source of all the acts manifested in His life. Properly said, God, the One from above any determination, or the supra-existent One, he is even above eternity. As eternal, we experience God in comparison to us, for he deigned to enter the relation with us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 178)

“(…) the human being’s growing capacity it wouldn’t be developed except from a beginning to an end, and therefore the human being’s thirst for reaching the infinity and the eternity, if there had been no existence of a supreme person - and therefore eternal and infinite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 181)

“One cannot enter to God except in state of sacrifice, says Saint Cyril of Alexandria, namely in state of death, a death wanted toward yourself, in a total self-giving to God. Through this, the time implies in itself the greatest freedom the creature has. Without this freedom the time would be meaningless. If this freedom had been fixed in good, as God is, it would have been eternal. If this freedom had moved monotonously in a circle, there would have been not seen the purpose of the movement and of the time. If God had been moving the creation towards Himself without granting freedom to the creation, we could ask ourselves why He didn’t bring it to Himself from the beginning. In such a case, the eternity would have been also lacking its freedom – it would have been a impersonal eternity, an eternity of the relativity. The time presupposes the communion of the supreme Persons, a communion that have brought to existence persons who are created free.” (Stăniloae 2003: 195)

“Of course, surpassing the interval amongst us, and between us and God, it remains always insufficient during our earthly life, always braked by sin, by egotism, even though we accomplish a progress. On the other hand, I do not search for the supreme Subject through the subject of the neighbor, and I am even condemned not to fully find out either my neighbor. I do not find in him the continuous essential “new” that gets me out of myself that gives me life that escapes me from death, by surpassing, in report with him, in a great measure, the interval. One must notice that this surpassing of the time it doesn’t get the man out of the interpersonal reality, as in the Platonic conception about eternity. On the opposite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 197-198)

“In this stretching of mine beyond myself, towards the other one, I want to find him like as self-giving himself to me. The person of the other one is the most precious gift filling me up with life, but only if he remains in the same time person, namely he gives himself freely, and he isn't grasped as an object. Only the person can be such a benevolent gift of himself, for only the person can give himself freely, and only this gift fills me up with life. But the other one gives himself to me for, at my turn, I give myself to him. Getting out of myself it is, from another point of view, the giving of myself. Getting out of myself, I am no longer mine, but I belong to the one towards whom I am getting out. But I can give myself completely, or infinitely, to the other one, only if I see through him the infinite God." (Stăniloae 2003: 198)

"(...) We won't have power to completely give ourselves to one another and to God, if we do not receive within us, from a superior Another, the impulse in order to give ourselves thus." (Stăniloae 2003: 198)

"God by living the interval between our answer and His appeal and the appeal to love our fellow humans, he lives all the pains growing up between the partners who haven't reached yet the full love." (Stăniloae 2003: 199)

"One can defeat the time only by remaining with another person. This is for then each person will have time for another person, and there won't be any person neigh to which there won't be another person having time for him. The space is overcome only by spiritually traveling the space and by much remaining in the external space, and not by flying over it. By spending much time for some persons and by much persevering in spiritually traveling some spatial distances, we become used to find through all the things both their variety and their eternity and infinity. The eternity and the infinity we will find, they will be rich eternity and infinity, and not abstract and monotonous ones." (Stăniloae 2003: 210)

"Generally, in the loving relation between persons the space is transfigured, being overwhelmed by the subjectivity of that person. Our of the loved person it irradiates over the space a transfiguring light, that makes the space around that person to be filled up with the soul of that person, and it makes the space from around that person to be filled up with that person, and to be personalized. It is about an overwhelming of the space through the inner light of the person, an overwhelming that can have several degrees, to a swallowing up of the space for our experience. The love songs highlight this." (Stăniloae 2003: 210-211)

"Saint Simeon the New Theologian continuously repeats that when Christ shows Himself to him in light, he no longer knows if this takes place in space, or outside the space. A contrary, when nobody loves you, you do not feel but the space, the loneliness eats you in the space. And when a person hates you, the whole space around that person it becomes unpleasant, unbearable, so that you do not know where to run in order to escape the irradiation of that person's presence." (Stăniloae 2003: 211)

“Generally, after the embodiment of His Son, the presence and the almightiness of God has entered a dynamic phase, through which he exercises His power of attraction upon us, by helping us in a much more active mode than before, for us to surpass the distance between us and Him and amongst ourselves. The presence of God is not static, namely permanently and everywhere the same. This is because His presence is a presence that is being actualized amongst Persons, out of a Person that is accessible to the human persons. For it is a new presence, namely the presence of the embodied Hypostasis (though not with the body), namely on the plan of the human accessibility, that was initiated through the personal will of God, of God threefold in Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 219-220)

“God surpasses any power. But, the One Who has in Himself the source of all the power, or the source of the whole almightiness, and Who is its cause, he isn’t lacking the power because of this, but He is above the power, in a positive meaning. This implies also His character of Person, for only the person is more than the power he manifests or he wants to manifest it; and only the godlike Person is above the power He manifests of He wants to manifest it, a power that is always unlimited in Its source.” (Stăniloae 2003: 221)

“One could say that also a nature conceived in a pantheistic mode it is inexhaustible in the manifestation of its power. But the nature is monotonous in its manifestation; the nature is maintained in a cyclic repetition; the nature dissolves the existent individuations, in order to compose identical others. The novelty in its manifestations is insignificant. A contrary, the person is always new in his manifestations. The human person, in quality of creature, he is new on the same plan of the created order. The human person is only the image of the infinite novelty of the divine Person on the plan that exceeds the created limited order.” (Stăniloae 2003: 221)

“The almightiness is involved in the quality of absolute Person of God. A reality having an object character or a character of an impersonal force, such a reality cannot be almighty, namely powerful from all points of view, because it hasn’t power upon its own movements, because of being submitted to a system of laws. The reality that is not free in what concerns the own movement or lack of movement, rightly speaking, it hasn’t any power. Such a reality is the support of a power and in the same time it has no power, not to say that this power is, in a way, strictly limited. A power submitted to some laws it requires to be explained, and its explanation cannot consist but in a will; and this will by producing the power, it establishes in the same time some laws to it, as limits. The true almightiness doesn’t have but an absolute will.” (Stăniloae 2003: 222)

“The formal definition of the almightiness is: the power of a person to do everything he wants. This definition hasn’t in its sight a will that limits itself in its acts, according to what the subject knows that he can do. That wouldn’t be almightiness. The power of such a person it would be limited.” (Stăniloae 2003: 222)

“If a power without will, as that one of the impersonal or involuntary movements, it is not a true power, the will that is limited in its manifestations by a power that is smaller than its sphere, it would indicate a subject; but not an absolute subject, but a subject like the human subject, who cannot overcome all the obstacles, or he cannot do whatever he wants. In both cases the almightiness lacks. In both cases it is given a limited power, a power that needs an explanation; and this explanation cannot be held except in an unlimited power, and therefore in a personal will that can do everything he wants.” (Stăniloae 2003: 223)

“According to our faith, only an absolute Person can bring to existence, out of nothing, persons who, though they are created, they are absolute too, being able to freely oppose even Him. Then, in the creation of such persons, who are absolute in a certain sense, it is manifested also the trust God has in His almightiness, namely the surety that these persons won’t endanger His almightiness, being given the fact that He is absolute by His being, unlike these persons who are absolute by participating to Him, on the basis of His will.” (Stăniloae 2003: 227)

“The limited power, as source of the always higher movement of the creature towards the infinite God, it will find its fulfillment which it cannot find it in itself – as the time and the space, within which this movement takes place –, when God will give Himself wholly to the creature, above the movement from within the creature. When the creature will participate to the unlimited life and power of God, but without merging with Him, the creature always having the conscience that is rejoicing of God, namely through participation, and not by being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 228)

“The Resurrection fulfills the expectation seeded in the human being, for the fact that the Resurrection makes the human person capable of consummate and eternal communion with God, the supreme Person, and with the fellow humans, by surpassing all the restrictions imposed to this communion of nature in its earthly condition. It makes possible a consummate and eternal interpersonal intimacy due to the full spiritualization of the matter.” (Stăniloae 2003: 234)

“The spirituality is the most characteristic content of the person. And the person isn’t known except on the measure he unveils himself and on the measure the person can unveil himself and he can be understood by others. The spirituality is a content under the guard of an own freedom.” (Stăniloae 2003: 235)

“Both the shyness and the fear in front of holiness are shyness and fear in front of a person. And in the state of unveiling these place us, there is also an unveiling of what is good within us, and this requires us, at its turn, a purification of our own conscience in front of another conscience. The man too is conquered by the charm of his own being, for he discovers in it a desire for cleanness and a connection with God, when before his being appears His holiness. And we feel well, for the Holy One has known our true being and through this He doesn’t reject us, though we are in a state of sinfulness, but he calls us to cleanness. We feel happy for we feel ourselves unburdened and unimpeded to manifest ourselves with sincerity towards him; we no longer play a theater role, because of which we end to no longer know ourselves and to always remain with the fear that we will be unmasked. We no longer play a part, through which we want to imagine that we aren’t sinners, but we are unable to do that – we only maintain our filthiness covered up. Now we set our subject free for the true communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 267-268)

“From God as Person, it irradiates the kindness, the purity of the disinterest for the Self, or of the interest in man, or the transparence and the communicability. Through this God attracts in communion with Him any person that wants, by conveying him the same kindness, transparence, and communicability. We call this kindness, transparence, and communicability, on one hand, as the absence of passions, and on the other hand, we call it virtue. This is because of there cannot be virtue where there is passion. The passion is the blindness of the exclusive preoccupation with the self. Therefore, being free of passions, the dispassion - without which there is no virtue - it is not insensitiveness, but it is a supreme sensitiveness for others.” (Stăniloae 2003: 273)

“One cannot attribute the cleanness in a proper sense, to an impersonal absolute, for the cleanness itself is a matter of intention, of thoughts, of subjective interiority, of delicacy in report with other persons, in the conscious acts. And only an absolute as person it can be definitively and totally clean through himself, for it is clean through the being, and not through effort, in a limited sense. Only a person can attract us, can arouse a real interest, for he can surrender to us but at our turn we can also surrender to him in a total delicacy. And only an absolute person can attract our absolute interest and he can exercise upon us an absolute, willing attraction, and as such, he can make us to surrender ourselves to him in an absolute sincerity, to “consecrate” us to him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 277)

“The one who is totally faithful to God and, through this, to his fellow humans too, he is humanized or sensitized as man in a superior degree. That’s why being sanctified it means being humanized and any true humanization it is in the same time sanctification.” (Stăniloae 2003: 283)

“The spiritual character of the transparency or of the interpenetration of the divine Persons, that is also an interpenetration of Their consciences, it can be expressed in a fuller manner by using the term inter-subjectivity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 312)

“The Orthodox teaching about the proceeding of the Holy Ghost from the Father towards the Son and about the Ghost’s shining out of the Son towards the Father, by keeping the Son in light before the Father, it implies in itself the fact that the Son and the Father are not confounded, neither separated. This role is had everywhere by the third Person relating to the other Two Persons: due to Him, the Two Ones aren’t confounded in a love without horizon, in pantheistic sense (as in Catholicism or in diverse impersonal philosophies), neither are they separated in individualistic sense (as in Protestantism), but They are kept in communion. Actually, both the pantheism and the individualism are a fall into nature, from the level of the existence as person – the only existence truly spiritual. That’s why from individualism one passes into pantheism, because of the individual tends to merge himself in another. But the persons cannot escape by themselves, the fall into nature, but only with the help of the existence as persons, namely in Trinitarian manner, namely the way of existence of the transcendent reality, or of God. Only the Holy Trinity ensures our existence as persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 332)

“According to our faith, each human person is in a certain way a hypostasis of the entire cosmic nature, but only in solidarity with the other. This means that the cosmic nature is common to all the human hypostases, through each one has a hypostasis and it personally lives it in his own way and complementary to the others. It is impossible a separation of the cosmic nature to the end, amongst the human individuals. Too much separation introduces the war amongst persons and even in the interior of the human nature, or it makes the human nature the war’s slave. Just because of that, each one can cause to the corruption not only of a nature which belongs to him personally, but also of the nature that belongs to everybody. This indicates a responsibility of the man towards the nature, in which it is implied, also, a responsibility for his fellow humans. And the acuity of this responsibility it shows that it has a reason in a responsibility towards a supreme Person Who is the Creator of the nature and of the people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 338)

“Even the words addressed us by God through things, these words stimulate us to their understanding. And understanding them it causes an answer from our part. This is for there isn’t a word understood by man, towards which the man not to take attitude, namely not to answer it. The man started speaking when he started to answer God, having to answer, being obliged by God to answer through the things God has placed in front of the man; the man started actualizing himself as dialogue partner of God. God accepts the names the man calls the things, in dialogue with Him, for the things have been given these names by God Himself. By calling names to the things, our being started actualizing himself and developing as dialogue partner to God. Only in this dialogue with God about the things, our being proves to be superior to the things as objects, as God is too. Through this our person is elevated on a plan of common dialogue with God, as between two subjects who speak about things as objects, our being is also superior to the things and capable of standing, by the dialogue with God, somehow on the same plan with Him, By His benevolence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 367-368)

“The fundamental meaning which we have discovered in the rationality of the world it is that the world comes from the supreme Person and the world’s rationality is being addressed like to another person, namely the fact of the totally special importance God grants it to the human person. The rationality is the intelligible mode a person communicated himself to another person, in order to accomplish and develop the communion between them. The person is more than the rationality is, through his endless intentionality directed towards another, through his unlimited love, and through his borderless freedom. But these ones aren’t meaningless. The rationality is the mode of communicating the more profound meanings implied by them. In the Trinitarian communion there is the infinite meaning. Out of it the man is being communicated on rational or intelligible way, adapted to the man, the Trinity’s will to elevate the man too, to the communion with the Trinity, as to the man’s supreme and in finite meaning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 372)

“We perceive the things in their clean or true meaning, when we know their connection to God or in the purpose God has thought the things on, in the favor of maintaining and developing us as persons in eternity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 373)

“Our person is spirit capable of feeling and of knowing through senses, but maintaining the self-consciousness and the liberty and the power of his movement by moving the body and, by this, it also maintains the power of moving the objects as it wants, for it has the body as participant to the spirit’s acts of knowledge and of movement.” (Stăniloae 2003: 398)

“Our rationality and our heart ask for the communion with the Person Who is capable of an infinite relation, in order to fully explain the meaning of the existence and to fill themselves up with the incessant and without shortcomings joy. That Person is intuited by the mind as supreme meaning of the life. That’s why the Holy Fathers see the image of God manifesting in all the functions and in all the movements of the soul, or better said of the human being. All of them are imparted with the image of God, of the capacity of the relation with God and with the aspiration for the communion with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 411-412)

“A nature sliced in individuals, it no longer preserves the full and authentic features of the nature, because it no longer manifests the harmony in itself. The person has become an individual not because he has mixed himself with the element of the human nature, but because he no longer comprises the whole nature, because he wants to keep divided the nature - he represents it – from the whole nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 424)

“The idea of nature as not-free element it is borrowed either from the external physical-biological nature or from the fallen nature, in which the spiritual factor also belonging to the human nature it is no longer affirmed with the whole its power, fact that brings also the weakening of the man as person. The depth of the person it is actually the depth of the nature that is preserved intact.” (Stăniloae 2003: 242)

“The nature really exists in several hypostases and it is endlessly enriched in the complete relation with them, according to the model and from the power of the Trinitarian community. The hypostases cannot be understood, either if it is emptied of nature, or outside the relation. The hypostases are the nature in the concrete existence, and the form of the relations amongst them; they are the nature in the dynamic of its internal relations accomplished in its multi-hypostatic form. The hypostasis is a me related to a you of the same nature. Only thus the hypostases experiences endless relations of knowledge and responsibility. And only thus the nature exists in a real mode. But in form of hypostasis, the human nature accomplishes also the endless relation with an absolute You. The human hypostasis, as really subsistent human nature, he cannot really develop himself without the relation with the absolute as person, without the responsibility towards the absolute as person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 425)

“The man is called to grow up by spiritually mastering upon the world, by transfiguring the world, through his capacity of seeing the world and of making the world an environment transparent to the spiritual order that is irradiating out of the Person of the Word.” (Stăniloae 2003: 426-427)

“In passions and in their violence, there is in the same time a weakening of the character of person and an accentuation of the character of nature. But it is not about the natural nature, but it is about a nature which is called like that because of not letting itself to be led by the freedom put in work within person. Animated by the spirit, the man’s nature is a nature of the person, of the freedom, it is the hypostatized nature. The passions represent a getting out of the nature from the power of the full state of person: of the freedom, of its full subsistence. The man who is no longer entirely human, he has become inhuman, because of he has partially become impersonal, because of this nature of his it is no longer fully consistent, namely in full community with the nature from within the other persons. The personalized nature feels in itself the power that comes to it from the full relation with the nature from within the other persons, for it can be through this continuously springing out and receiving new acts and thoughts, generous and good, and in the same time original, for in each person it finds for itself an original expression, but in the same time standing in communion with the other persons. This nature is profoundly human and creator, through its opening, through its reciprocal enriching of itself in its positive relations amongst persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 475)

“For the ones who rise up into Christ, from this narrowing of the creation, death doesn’t have the last word. The existence stretches infinitely beyond death. The rationality achieves to them its full meaning, and the existence does the same. They see ensured their eternal duration, according to the value of the person they feel it. The eternal value of the human person is ensured by the fact that itself the supreme basis of the existence has character of person, as partner of communion and of eternal love, to the man. Reentering in the communion with God escapes the man from eternal death.” (Stăniloae 2003: 496-497)

“Saint Gregory of Nyssa draws our attention upon the amazing fact that also in the center of the Paradise there was the ‘tree of life’ too. This means that both trees were in the same central point, because of there cannot be two central points. This can mean that in the same world, exclusively perceived through senses and through the rationality put in the service of the senses, there is a source of some good that is not good; but being perceived in its signification by a more deeply seeing rationality which, on the opposite, it takes the feeling in its service, it is a source of life. Therefore ‘the tree of life’ it is either the same world perceived through the ‘mind’, or it is God, seen through the world that is thus perceived. A ‘tree of life’ it is any persons of another subject, who is the source of my life, through his love for me; and the ‘Tree of life’ by excellence and all-comprising, is the absolute Person, as source of the endless love for all the people and of the love of all persons amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 498)

“Experiencing the me-you relation it is perfect only in the experience each one has it upon another as undiminished subject. But no man can defeat within himself the tendency to reduce the other one - after the fire of the first encounter has quenched – to a more or less state of an object. Only the holy ‘fear’ of the supreme Person helps me to continuously relight the experiencing of the other one as subject, towards whom I have an unlimited responsibility, and this fear impedes me to neglect the other subject or to try taking advantage of him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 518)

“Whilst the things, as materialized images of the divine rationalities are created through the commanding words of the divine Logos, Who gives these materialized images the character of some thought rational unities, characteristic to the objects, the human person involving in himself all the human persons it is called to existence as created partner of the Word of God, the one Who is Person, as an image of Himself, in order the human person to think himself too, in his subject quality, the objective rationalities of the things together with the godlike Word, the original thinker subject of theirs. The human persons are thus places in a special dialogical relationship with the personal Word of God, and with the persons of the fellow humans. Each man is a thinking word and in dialogue with the godlike persona Word and with the other personal human words; each one sips power out of the godlike Word, and also out of the things’ power, he gathers their rationalities in his thinking, and he gather their power in his life, and he communicates these to others and he receives from them their communication, and by this he deepens his connection with the divine Logos and the understanding of their origin and meaning. By creating the things as rational images of His rationalities, for the persons created as images of His Person, the persons being in a reference towards the Father and the Holy Ghost, the Word has addressed these ones to the people as some rational materialized words. What is materialization towards the rationalities of the Logos or towards the images of these rationalities, the same is the man’s body towards the human subject created as image of the Person of the Logos. The human subject is invited to a spiritual-materialized and conscious life, in communion with the Logos, and the man is invited to gather within himself all the created materialized rationalities, for by doing this, to have a content of thinking and life common with the godlike Logos.” (Stăniloae 2006, 5)

“Only as Person can the Logos be understood as One, as unseen, and the One Who makes Himself known to us wholly, through any materialized or through any word of His and through all of them together, because none of them cannot subsist by itself; and only for we are understanding subjects, He can unveil Himself to us through each one of these images of His rationalities and, through all of them together, Himself as a whole, as Person. The rationality of the things implies a creator person who thought them and who continues thinking them out. More than that, any rationality is an interpersonal rationality. In the case of the world, there is a first Person Who thinks the rationalities out, and Who creates them, and there are also other persons whom the rationalities are addressed to, towards together thinking them out. And the fact that we are thinking the rationalities, as thinking subjects, it means that we are in the image of the Word Who has thought them and Who has created them for a dialogue with us. The human subject is the thinking rationality as person, who is created in a correspondence with the things though by the godlike Logos even before he has created them. The Logos doesn't create only some thought out objects, but as some subjects brought to existence in His image as Subject Who to think them out in a dialogue with Him. Our placing in this report it coincides with our bringing to existence. So, one can say that this bringing of ours it coincides with our answer to His calling, even if in the beginning we do not realize this, or even if we do not ever realize it. We are moving ourselves towards existence on the ground of being called to existence by the Word. Coming to existence we actually come towards the Word, the Only One truly existing, attracted by Him out of nothing, but we do not come as some object, but as some subjects, to whom the attracting to existence it is in the same time a calling to an eternal dialogue with Him. The Word, by doing this, He gives to Himself a created alter-ego, or a multitude of alter-ego-s. He gives consistency to a subject, who is some sort of thought out and created projection of Himself." (Stăniloae 2006, 6)

"If we can know and think out the things, it is for the things are materialized images of the rationalities of a Supreme Rationality as Person. If we can express the things by words, it is for the things are materialized words of the Word, words addressed to us, on our level. We think rationally and we speak, for we are partners with the Person Who is the Word Himself as Person, and for He has placed before us His thinking, or the created image of His materialized thinking, on the level of our created rationality and power of expressing, with a creator power which we do not have it. We feel ourselves driven to gather the things' rationalities within us and to express those rationalities, for they are addressed to us a means of our dialogue with the Word of God and in communion with him. It is impossible to conceive that this expressible rationality of the reality not to have a Subject who has thought it out, and Who has expressed it by creating it, and Who continues to thing it out and to express it in a continuously knew diversification, for the subjects created in His image. It is impossible to conceive that these things haven't been expressed as materialized thoughts for persons created on this purpose. He has given a materialized expression to His thoughts on our level, as subjects created by Him in His image. He has created them for us, in order us to accomplish an accord with Him and amongst us, by thinking them out and by expressing them, together with him and in a together-thinking of ours, an accord that means a love too. In our conception, without the world's origin in a supreme Person, without understanding the world as being on this purpose of this dialogue and accord out ours with the world, the whole rationality of the creation wouldn't be understood, it would be a meaningless fragment of rationality, a rationality that would be moving in darkness." (Stăniloae 2006, 6)

"This dialogue and this accord are in a continuous developing. We understand increasingly fuller the things and the purpose the divine Person has pursued through them; and the Supreme Person unveils increasingly more the meanings hidden in them and He diversifies them by combining them in new connections and circumstances, in collaboration with us, by Providence. These circumstances and combinations constitute as much increased claims addressed to our understanding and behavior towards the supreme Person and amongst us, equally numerous occasions on which we can manifest our love for Him and amongst us, corresponding to the new manifestations of His love for us." (Stăniloae 2006, 6)

"Even objectively, the connection of the Logos, as Person, with the human rationality and with the things' rationalities, it hasn't remained as tight as at the beginning, due to the fact that the human rationality has weakened its connection with the supreme Logos as Person. This weakening of the connection with the Logos and with His power, with the rationalities of the things and of the human body, it has led to a weakening of the composed unity of these rationalities, and therefore to the corruptibility of the things and of the bodies and to their decomposition (Rom. 8: 21-24)." (Stăniloae 2006: 7)

"In order not to let the people in this unrealized waiting for, the Word of God made His presence and His action as Person in relation with the people, through the Revelation of the Old Testament, in the same time preparing them for His fully clear and close presence as Person in Jesus Christ – the embodied Word and Son of God. Thus, the presence of the godlike Word through the rationalities of the words of the things, and through the words and through the direct deeds of the Old Testament and His coming into body, they all are chained in progressive line, each on the previous ones preparing the ulterior one and each of the ulterior ones making the previous ones even more obvious." (Stăniloae 2006: 8)

"God the Word has made His presence and His action clearer in the Old Testament through direct words whispered in the prophets' hearts and through deeds which were discerned in a more obvious manner as His deeds than the natural events and circumstances, which could be interpreted as being done without a God as Person. The Patriarchs and the Prophets lived, in the words communicated to them and in the deeds committed with them and with the people of Israel, the direct presence of the Person of the Word, though He wasn't entering as Person the community with the human persons. They stood face to face with the Person Who addressed them His words and announced them His deeds. They entered a direct relation with Him as Person, but not as embodied Person yet, ontologically descended amongst people. The Word's Person still remained above people, though He strongly made felt His quality as Person and His interest in the human persons and in His relation with them. That's why His words were powerful, and they had the warmth of the personal communication and the force of stopping the people from doing the things contrary to His will and to upheld the people in fulfilling His will, a force that upheld - in the same time - the people's rationality, because that force was rational too. Saint Maximos the Confessor found between the presence of the Logos, amongst the human things and the and through the human rationality, and His presence in the Old Testament, a background identity. The clearer words and deeds from the Old Testament didn't contradict the ones from nature (or through the natural revelation), but they highlighted also these ones as being His words and deeds, and they fulfilled what must have been fulfilled through those ones: a progress towards the increasingly deeper communion with God. Thus, the Psalmist saw more clearly, in the light of the direct speaking and action of the Word of God in the Old Testament, the order itself from within nature as being: "The heavens say the glory of God and the doing of His hands heralds His strength. The day says word to the day (about God) and the night herald the science to the night. There are no speeches, nor words, whose voices not to be heard... In sun He has placed His dwelling place" (Ps. 18: 1-5) (In KJB we have Ps. 19: 1-5; the words are also quite different, but the content may be considered as similar, t. n.) (Stăniloae: 2006: 8-9)

"Not only by words the Word made His presence more noticeable in the Old Testament, but also by deeds, by types he established and by a power, in which was felt something from the grace which was irradiating out of Him after Embodiment and Resurrection. "The grace of the New Testament was mysteriously hidden in the letter of the Old Testament", also said Saint Maximos the Confessor. Or: "Wanting God to send to the ones from earth the grace of the godlike virtue (of the producing virtue power) from heavens, due to His mercy on us, He symbolically prepared the holy tent - and all the things from within it - which is a reflection, an image, and an imitation of the wisdom". Of course, the Old Testament's tent wasn't only an intellectual symbol of the word, but in the sense of a vessel of something from the power of the tent from above, or of the godlike Word as Person Who will bring through embodiment the whole His power in the human body, His true tent, and therefore in the direct relation with the people. Saint Maximos considered that any means the spiritual presence of God is made felt, and His power is made felt, it is a symbol of His. Thus, there is a suite of symbols. The Word of God Himself can become increasingly transparent and

He can manifest His power in an increasingly more felt mode, corresponding to the spiritual state of the ones who unite themselves with Him, by faith and by life. "Like the words of the Law and of the Prophets, being forerunners to His coming into body, they were guiding the souls to Christ, likewise the embodied Word of God, He has made the forerunner of His spiritual coming, by guiding the souls through His own words towards receiving His luminous spiritual coming. This coming is always being done by Him, by transforming through virtues, the worthy ones, from body to ghost. But He is going to do it also at the end of the time, by plainly showing what was hidden before, to everybody". The more His presence as Person is more clearly noticeable, the more irradiate, from His Person, a more obvious light." (Stăniloae: 2006: 9)

"(...) not only the Revelation culminates in the embodied and resurrected Logos, a fact that it will be fully unveiled in the future life, but the whole cosmos makes its concentration and its richness of meanings, obvious, in the Person of Christ, or of the Embodied Logos. The keystone of the creation isn't an impersonal general law, it isn't a substance, but it is the full of meaning Person, full of all meanings, of the Logos. Everything culminates in a person, namely in the Person from Who it comes. From this Person come all things, in Him are being upheld all the things, in Him will be shown all the things as comprised and illuminated. The Pantocrator, the upholder and the fulfiller not only of the Church, but of everybody, He is a Person: He is the embodied Logos as Person. The worlds have been created for the man, and the man, he was created for Christ, in Whom the man fully accomplishes himself. "The man's nature has been constituted from the beginning for the new Man (Christ). The man has been given mind and will for That One. We have taken rationality for Him, in order to know Christ, and desire, in order to run towards Him. We have received memory in order to wear Him, for he was the archetype of the created ones". (Stăniloae 2006: 9-10)

"Since the first times of the Church, Saint Irenaeus said: "The historical Christ was the prototype God had in mind when He created the first man. Christ was the full and consummate man Who was to show Himself on earth, and the Maker saw from before and He created Adam according to this future prototype. Consequently, Adam was created in the model of the Word Who was to assume in time, as Christ, the human nature and to show Himself as consummate man on earth". "It is known the teaching of Saint Irenaeus about Adam as "little child" and about the development of the "little child" until Christ. According to this Holy Father, the Word made Himself man at the end of the man's development into "word" (in rationality), "as a crown and as a final purpose of the mankind". The Holy Fathers highlight through this the connection between anthropology and Christology, or the fulfillment of the man and of the cosmos into Christ, as being supreme Person in relation with the other Trinitarian Persons.” (Stăniloae 2006: 10)

“In Christ it has been opened to us the way towards the full humanization and He is the way towards this, for he is the way towards the communion with God as communion of persons whom He doesn’t reduce to the state of objects and, by this, the way towards the full communion with our fellow humans. Through His embodiment as man, Christ has made accessible to us the communion with Himself as God in culminant human form or, better said, He has made accessible to us the communion with the whole Holy Trinity. Only Jesus Christ has given us the power to fully exit the egotism of the sin, and to get out from the prison within the nature’s limits as system of the processes of composition and decomposition, or of the corruptibility which ends in death.” (Stăniloae 2006: 14)

“Know we know for sure that God- the Word is Person, or an existence resembling our existence as persons, by the fact that He makes on Himself also the Person of the human nature, without ceasing to be the Person of the godlike nature. By this, he guarantees the maximum value of the human persons and their eternity. But this shows, in the same time, that the human nature has been created capable for receiving God the Word as hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 17)

“It is difficult to understand what this capacity concretely consists in. The man’s quality as image of God, or as image of the Word of God, it doesn’t tell us so much, at its turn, in a concrete manner. In order to edify ourselves in this concern, let’s see first what the hypostasis is. The hypostasis, or the person, it/he is the state of self of a spiritual nature, or of a spiritual nature also; it is one of the unities of such a nature, in tight correlation with the other unities, and in the case of the human person, in relation too, with God as Person. As such, the person, who is the concrete mode of subsistence of the human nature, he is a unitary center of all his acts and of all his always new relations with other human persons, but also of the relation with God as Person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 17)

“Nothing opposes, in principle, for a unitary supreme “who” to comprise in himself an even greater complexity, greater than the complexity of the human subject. Nothing opposed to be accomplished a “who” which to comprise not only the complexity of features of the human nature, in which are comprised, as personalized, all the elements from cosmos, but also of the godlike nature, and vice versa. Through this it is accomplished the most comprising unity as person. This is Jesus Christ, the Word of the embodied God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 18)

“Each man is both hypostasis or subject, and nature; he is a subject, as subsistent nature, as subsistent center of his acts and reactions, as background which actualizes his potentialities; and he is nature, as instrument or background valued by his aspect as subject, or by the fact that he really subsists as hypostasis. In each man there is both the hypostasis and the nature, or the quality of subject and that one of background or of instrument, without the hypostasis to be added from outside, but by being the necessary form of the nature immediately he really exists. In the phrases “I am getting warmed up”, “I am thinking”, I express both my quality of subject who feels and thinks and my quality of background and source of feeling and thinking. One cannot be without another, once I exist. The human nature can never exist concretely only as nature, as background, as “object”, without having the quality of subject too, neither could the subject can be without the nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 18)

“Of course, the divine Rationality, as Person, He is more than the rational principles’ sum of the right judgment; the divine Rationality is life too, as supra-rational source of the rationality, as infinite depths of meanings; and the human rationality of the human person is, at its turn, a meaningful life, a resembling depth of meanings. The human rationality of the human person has, in its hypostatizing in the Logos, the culminant fulfilling. The Logos is thus the man’s fulfilling as person; the human nature has its hypostatical fulfillment in the divine Hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 20)

“Not being a simple human hypostasis, but the divine al-comprising and loving Hypostasis of the entire mankind, Jesus Christ has in His humanity as Person, an environment through which he lives the pains of the entire humanity and all the people can be imparted with His humanity as Person, with His godlike life.” (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

“The today’s theology rather explains this (the deification of the human bodies, t. n.) through the direct relation as persons established between God-the Word become man and the other people who believe in Him, and therefore they open themselves to Him. But this relation doesn’t disregard the communion of nature, but only this community of nature makes possible this relation. The body we receive within our body is the Body of Christ, as Body of One of the Godlike Persons, but is about a Body in community of nature with ours. Without this relation as between persons, without the love between the embodied Son of God and the people, a love that animates this relation, simply eating the Body of Christ wouldn’t deify the people. That’s why, an important role in the deification of the other people by being imparted with the Body of the Lord, as present in the Mystery, it belongs to the Ghost of the Word, as love of the Father towards the Son and towards us, and as love of the Son towards us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25)

“The whole this communication of features it is accomplished through the unity of the Person, more precisely by the fact that this Person is God –the Embodied Word. This is because the man could not, out of his own initiative, to dispose of the powers of the godlike nature. The two natures could not communicate they powers and their acts by themselves – this would lead to pantheism. And in pantheism there aren’t two natures. The real variety and the unity in existence are upheld by God as Person, Who, being transparent by His Being, He can make Himself, by His will, Person of His creature, thus reconciling everything but without suppressing them or confounding them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“Enduring the sufferings of the human nature in a mode above the human nature’s needs, it is again a form of collaboration or of communication of the features of the two natures. And this is accomplished only in the Person and through the Person, as form of actualizing the two natures’ will, as Subject Who obeys the will of His inferior part to the will of His superior part, and he imprints the first one with the second one, but without suppressing the inferior one. The restoration and the consummation of the human nature is a work of the Person, of the highest Person Who has made on Himself the Subject of the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 33)

“From Adam, through creation and through the full breath of the Ghost as Person, Christ “takes the image of God”, of His image; from Adam’s descendants, by birth, Christ takes the irreproachable affects and the corruptibility consequently to the sin, but not the sin too, for His birth it has been more closely united with Adam’s creation and with the work of the Holy Ghost, and Adam didn’t bring the sin, through this origin, from God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 36)

“The one who doesn’t do everything from his part for purity, he cannot be sanctified by the Ghost and overwhelmed by Him. The one who doesn’t give away, on himself, integrally to God, in a full liberation from passions, he cannot integrally receive God as person in order to find in God his full development as person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 37)

“As one can see, the Holy Fathers highlighted, in all the implications of the hypostatical union, the unity of the Person. Nothing remains in Christ outside the unity of the Person, without the seal and the presence of the Person. Christ Himself is God and He is present on the plan which is accessible to us. That’s why the Son of God has embodied, on Himself, to make, on Himself, present in a direct relation, or in a direct dialogue with us. This direct presence of God as Person, it cannot be covered by the man's presence." (Stăniloae 2006: 44)

"Without any doubt, the Person of Christ is the Savior for He is the Son of God. This is for only in God there is the power of the salvation and the eternal life. And only for He is the Son of God it can be explained His love for people. Only for He works upon us out of His loving community with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, He brings us the salvation the whole Trinity – with love - is active in. And the people are saved not like some objects, but by freely accepting the communion with Christ and, in Christ, with the whole Holy Trinity. Thus, the whole salvation has the seal of personal relations between Christ and - through Him - between the Holy Trinity and people. The Christendom is personalistic; the Christendom means the salvation of the human person through the supreme Person. The Christendom believes in the not-passing value of the person." (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

"In the savior deeds is presented the Person of Christ and these deeds cannot belong to somebody else. And the Person of Christ is presented in these deeds for he cannot remain without being activated in these deeds, and without accomplishing, on Himself, through these deeds, like man. In of the plan of the passing human existence, only the relation with another person can occasion us some warmth of the life, a certain meaning and a reason to live, the not-passing life and the meaning and the full reason of this imperishable life, they cannot come except from the godlike Person entered in direct relation with us, by the fact that He has made, on Himself, a human person." (Stăniloae 2006: 47-48)

"The person of my fellow human means to me more than all his deeds, but this person doesn't work and he doesn't prove his irradant force except through his manifestations. Christ-the Man, for He is also God, He is incomparable more than any other person, and more than all His deeds. But these deeds are manifestations which prove the Person of Christ and His love. Even more than that, in the case of Christ, His Person is everything, unlike any other man's person is. But like the human person is more than man's deeds, for the person isn't static, for the person isn't being exhausted in the committed deeds, but it shows himself through his deeds like a source of love and life that is more than his deeds, likewise the Person of Christ, as God and man, His Person is everything, for His person isn't static, for His Person hasn't exhausted His reality in His savior acts during His life on earth; but, through those acts, His Person has shown us that He is going to be ceaselessly active in the spirit of those acts, and He is going to always be present in the availability of His acts. This is for those acts are under the culminant expression of His love and those acts have achieved in Him a state of permanent irradiating His love. As such, those acts are always up-to-date in report with us, or better said the Person of Christ Himself, He ceaselessly manifests through these acts, His culminant love, or He ceaselessly manifests, on Himself, through them, as an endless and inexhaustible source of love. (...) The deeds committed by a person, are being inscribed in that person with their consequences. The reports with other persons too, are influenced by the states inscribed in that person by his deeds, and that person conveys to other persons those states.” (Stăniloae 2006: 48)

“Jesus Christ is the supreme Teacher and Prophet by His Person Himself. Jesus Christ isn’t a teacher as any other man, not even like any other religion founder. In the same time, He outdoes any other prophet from before Him, for He inscribes, on Himself, on other plan. For He is unique, His teaching is unique too. His teaching is unique but not on the same plan with other unique teachings. He is identified to His teaching. And His teaching cannot spring except out of Him. He is Prophet in a unique and supreme sense. His quality as prophet belongs to His Person, unlike the meaning the word prophet had in the Old Testament, where this quality is accidentally tied to a person or another. Jesus Christ is the Teacher and the Prophet through Himself, and not through a gift that comes from anywhere else. He is the Teacher by excellence (Jn. 13: 13) and the Prophet by excellence. He Himself said, about Himself: “I am the light of the world” (Jn. 8: 12), and: “I am the truth” (Jn. 14: 6).” (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

“Christ is the Teacher in the supreme sense by His Person Himself, for out of His Person Himself comes His teaching, showing the true road of the man towards the consummate eternity of the existence. He, as such, is the “Teacher” the ‘teaching’ in Person, for he is the “light” in Person. He is “the One Who preaches” and “the One Who preaches, on Himself”. In Him the Subject of the teaching is identified to the “object” of the teaching.” (Stăniloae 2006: 49-50)

“The words and the deeds of Christ are necessary for knowing His Person, as God, and as fully accomplished man. This is because the Person cannot be known otherwise, and the Person cannot be actualized in His effects upon others and neither in Himself, in the Person’s human side, except through words and deeds.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“For the words of Jesus express Himself, they are a direct irradiation of His Person as their source, and a self-interpretation of His Person Himself. This means that Himself as Person, He is the Word as godlike hypostasis, become a human hypostasis too. Even the human person is a hypostatical Word, for the human person is wholly attention and tendency of self-communication, and for the human person, wholly, is calling for, and answering to: a ceaseless love. As such, the human is, endlessly, a hypostatic word. If the human person is hypostatical word, The embodied godlike Person is the divine and human hypostatical Word, in the supreme degree. The godlike Person ceaselessly communicates His supreme love and He asks for the ceaseless answer of a corresponding love from the part of the man. Out of Christ irradiated the most demanding word. He is being lived with the sharpest responsibility, with the deepest obligation to positively answer Him, with the word and with the deed. Christ awakens this responsibility within us, not only by His words, but also through His Person, both as God and as man: as God, by commanding us what we have to do in order to accomplish ourselves as people in His image; and as man by showing us the model he accomplished to the man. All His words have a full justification in His Person." (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

"The human person is the hypostatic word (subsistent) and therefore speaking, for it exists through dependency on the supreme hypostatic Word, and it must answer and conform itself to This One. Any word starts from the human person as an answer, out of the necessity to answer, and it expresses the human person as being the responsible hypostatic word, and therefore ties to the supreme hypostatic Word Who speaks to the human person asking him to answer. The human person exists in quality of responsible word, for God speaks to the human person, for God asks the human person to answer, and therefore the human person is asked by God to conform himself to God. In this sense, God, the supreme hypostatical Word, He is the creator and the sustainer of the human person, the human person being the answering word. In the word of the human person is concentrated the quality of man as "image" of the godlike Word. The man is called to existence and he is sustained in existence, for he is called in every moment to advance in an existence like the one of the godlike Word, by the answer the man gives to That One. On the measure the man answers less positively, his existence weakens, and in hell the man's existence becomes rather a shadow of the existence." (Stăniloae 2006: 53-54)

"The one who saw Christ, or the one who sees Him by faith, he sees the Person of Christ everywhere, as being the hypostatical Word springing out words and deeds, both the words and the deeds being accompanied by power and light. So, He exercises His full efficacy. Today, this full efficacy of Christ upon us, it is being exercised through Mysteries, in which the words uttered yore highlight Christ Himself as Person in His present work. This is for, by invoking Him through faith and prayer, He comes and manifest His acts of power, of the power He showed in His acts of yore, in the favor and for the benefit of the ones who invoke Him with faith, by imparting the grace of the Holy Ghost through the mediation of some gestures and materials which are sanctified through prayer." (Stăniloae 2006: 54)

“The teaching of the Holy Fathers doesn’t disregard either the blood Christ shed on the cross, for we are imparted with it in the holy Eucharist, and it represents concretely the state of sacrifice Christ has made, on Himself, to be permanent in, as also the cleanness Christ has brought His body to, by enduring the passions unmixed with the sin. It cannot be approved either the sliding into a spiritualism which disregards the body in the relations amongst persons, and in the given case, the relations between the Person of Christ and the human persons.” (Stăniloae 2006: 63)

“The resurrected Christ is the beginning or the new creation, for He comprises in the state of sacrifice and resurrected of His body, all of us who believe, not only through the communion of nature He has with us, but also through our comprising as persons in Him and through His living within us. It is redundant to say, that this means also our comprising in Christ’s memory (He virtually comprises too, all the ones who do not believe in Him). Christ presents in Himself, to the Father, all the ones who believe in Him, and therefore they are attached to Him. They are seen by the Father, in Christ, for Christ has them inscribed in His eternal memory. And the Father sees them inscribed in Christ’s memory. In the same time, the Father sees also Christ as imprinted in them, in His state of sacrifice and of resurrection.” (Stăniloae 2006: 75)

“The state of resurrection will mean a victory of the persons and of the liberty upon nature which enslaves them, a victory of the people’s communion, out of the communion with the divine – or supreme – Person, which has become also the liberated human person, by willingly enduring the death, by mastering upon death – the death being the supreme tyranny of the callous nature and the supreme enemy of the person or of the interpersonal communion. Everything is given us now, as nature, it will be personalized, and it will serve the communion amongst persons. The imperial glory of the supreme Person Who has become the human Person too, it will become glory of all the ones who will open themselves to the supreme and central Person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 75)

“The Holy Ghost comes to the fore of the work, for our sensitiveness, and because in Christ’s fully spiritualized body there is the Holy Ghost as Person full of loving initiative, so as He is in Christ, as God, from eternity. But this Ghost’s initiative as Person, it makes Christ as Person more obvious to us, and therefore full of initiative and power. Thus, the Ghost communicates to us out of Christ, as Person, He makes Christ, in the same time, fully obvious as Person, and the Ghost makes communicable, in a more accentuated manner, the power of Christ Himself. Now the Holy Ghost is entering within us with His integral presence, due to the fact that the human body of the Lord – a ring out of our humanity – it has become fully transparent to the godlike infinity which is directed towards us.” (Stăniloae 2006: 84)

“The presence of the human Person of Christ Himself in the grace conveyed to us through the Holy Ghost, it is made understood by the analogy which the relations amongst human persons present it to us. When a person exercises a positive influence upon another person, the influence of the first one won’t remain a simple external work upon the second person, but it is imprinted within in his being as a power ceaselessly exercised by him, but which can be actualized by the second person for his benefit, when he wants that. For this actualization isn’t but a passing to a together-working of the second person with the first person. Thus, in working, a person meets another person not only in a passing manner, but also durably.” (Stăniloae 2006: 125-126)

“The human person is being spiritualized in the intimate and conscious relation with the Person of Christ, as according to a model the human person orients after and which attracts the human person; but this relation the human person has it with the Holy Ghost too, Who is like a Person comparable to a life-giver force, with Whom the human person feels himself, on one hand, as almost unified, and on the other hand, the human person feels as being distinct, because he cannot attribute to himself that much force as he puts in work.” (Stăniloae 2006: 136)

“In the relation with the Supreme Person of the Word become neighbor man, one cannot progress except by advancing in the relation of love with the believers’ community, in which Christ dwells like in His body, strengthening its unity. The plenary humanity, of the plenary deified humanity of Christ, by being the humanity open at maximum to everybody, through it we have access and power of access to the everybody’s humanity, but vice versa too, through the everybody’s humanity seen in unity and loved, we have access to the full of Godhead humanity of Christ, which the humanity is comprised in. And the advancing in Christ’s humanity is being done infinitely, for through it one advances in the infinite godlike light and love; and by advancing in these ones, our humanity itself increases in them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

“The one who loves the people who are in hardships and in a reduced understanding, he descends on their level, communicating them summarized sketches, out of His wisdom’s richness, and straining Himself together with them under their burdens, not for sparing them of efforts they are being strengthened through, but neither to let them to succumb under those burdens. On this way, He climbs together with them. This is for if He elevated them out of hardships without their effort, they wouldn’t have the occasion to grow up through those efforts; and if they didn’t come up to the superior understanding being helped by His participation to their hardships, they wouldn’t fortify their mind towards the real understanding of His loving Person, and they wouldn't understand all the reasons and all the depth of His love." (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

"Fighting for weakening the sin's habit it equals the action of fully becoming a person and of fully becoming rational, of the human nature, after the first affirmation of the human person took place at Baptism. That's why the liberation from the ancestral sin isn't done for all the descendants of the baptized one, for it is required a beginning of person's affirmation, of personal option for abolishing the ancestral sin as sub-personal and counter-personal state. The fight, in continuation, against the human nature's weaknesses which drive the human nature to sin, it is a strengthening, in continuation, of the man's character as person." (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

"This action of personalization means an increasingly fuller imprinting of Christ's Hypostasis in the man's person. Through this, the human subject becomes fully opened to other subject, like Christ, by having His human nature in the Word's Hypostasis, He is fully opened to the other human subjects, not only as God but also as man. Thus, through full participation to Christ, the man becomes a person, namely a fully communitarian person, liberated from the prisons of the egotistic passions. Like through the dwelling of Christ, within man, with His human nature clean of sins, on the basis of the man's consent, it has taken place the man's cleaning of the egotism of the ancestral sin and of the other sins and the beginning of the action of man's communitarian personalization, likewise the man's as person union, in continuation, with Christ dwelling within him, it produces an increasingly fuller personalization of the man's nature, imprinted by the Person of Christ. This man makes Christ transparent through his human nature and, more precisely, through the person that man wears." (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

"Everything takes place within Church, for Christ, by being the divine Hypostasis of His human nature, by this He is open to all the human hypostases, easing their framing in Him, with the human nature these hypostases wear it, as in theirs and of the entire mankind Head-Hypostasis. And only because it takes place within Church, this action is an action of personalization, given the fact that the person is the factor which cannot accomplish himself in his aspiration of openness and communion except being in the deeply founded in Christ community: the Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

"Saint Mark saw the progress of the man in the new life right in the personal frequent meeting of the baptized one with Christ Who dwells within him, and through this, in the increasingly greater union with Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 146)

“It is not only about the death of the former man of the sin, but it is also about our death as subject, by and large, in order Christ to live within us as subject (Gal. 2: 20). But I am myself into Christ. He has made Himself the subject from within me, without Me to cease being as subject within Him, but by seeing me accomplished in Him and full of joy for this accomplishing. He has made Himself a subject to me, by remaining to me, in the same time, a You, the most responsible You for me.” (Stăniloae 2006: 148)

“The motif the Eucharist imprints in us the state of resurrection for, a state we are going to surpass with, the death we have to cross through, it is the union in the full degree with Christ Who has defeated the death which He cross through, and Who is in state of mysterious and consummate death and of resurrection. If through the Mysteries of the Baptism and of the Chrismation, though Christ dwells within us with His death and resurrection, He has made our own only His work into the Holy Ghost which gives us the power to die to the former man and to come out to a new life in a not-full manner, in Eucharist He unites Himself with us through His body and through His blood themselves, out of which irradiates this power. In Eucharist we eat His body and we drink His blood, dead and resurrected and pneumatized. By these, His body and blood give their quality to our body and blood, which thus bear within them, together with Christ, the mysterious death in God and the foretasting of the resurrection which is being worked within them. Doubtlessly, the body and the blood of Christ remain His body and blood as Person. But they are prolonged in our body and blood, so that these ones are framed in His body and blood, receiving their quality. Consequently, in addition to the Lord’s body as Person it results His extended body, without being possible to be separated from one another, given the fact that the center of the extended body it is the Lord’s body as Person.” (Stăniloae 1997: 59)

“The unity doesn’t abolish the persons of the believers. Although they are imparted together, each one is called on his name: “It is being imparted the servant of God (first name)”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 62)

“Christ brings us as sacrifices not like on some objects, but like persons, so as sacrifices which we are bringing ourselves too. We must do this out of a life lived for God and dead to the passions which tie us to the world or which lock us up within ourselves.” (Stăniloae 1997: 72)

“The sacrificed body of Christ as Person, it meets His mysterious body, sacrificed in the Eucharistic bread and wine. The Lord’s body sacrificed in Eucharist is only His body, but it has within the gift of the community, or the community’s sacrifice, in order Him to present the community’s sacrifice, in Himself, to the father. The community, though present as sacrifice in the bread that has been transformed in His body, it isn't confounded to the body of Christ as Person, but it further remains in a dialogical report with Him, as infinite reserve of gifts. In the case of being confounded to Christ as Person, the community would lose its character as community of persons, becoming depersonalized. The believers always keep the belief that though Christ they bring themselves as sacrifice, though they do this by the power of Christ and by this Christ too brings them as sacrifice. But He brings them in His sacrifice, as distinct persons, and not like amalgamated objects." (Stăniloae 1997: 74)

"Especially on the moment of the Impartation, the community though tightly united in Christ from before, it receives only the body of Christ. This is for Christ always remains distinct from the community, as the One Who Imparts Himself. The unity with Christ crosses through diverse degrees, but the believers' persons always remain distinct, as partner of the dialogue, and as the ones who are imparted with Christ, and not as the ones who give to one another towards impartation, or like ones who in some regards are imparted with themselves. And this happens also to the community: no matter how tightly would be the community united with Christ, the community is always the one which is imparted with Christ, and Christ remains always the One Who gives on Himself towards impartation. The community never imparts itself with itself. The believer's distinct character as person and the fact that he is imparted only with Christ and not with the community too, it is affirmed through the phrase uttered by the priest at Impartation: "It is being imparted the servant of God (first name), with the honored body and blood of our Lord and God Jesus Christ". (Stăniloae 1997: 74)

"As in all the Mysteries, in the Eucharist too, through Mystery it is being inaugurated a personal relation or a new stage of the personal relation which Christ has with each person, though this takes place in the frame of the community, in a connection of each person with the other persons. The Mysteries' charismas are given as gifts to the persons, for the persons are entrusted with the responsibility for actualizing and developing these charismas, through the efforts of a sacrificial life, out of the power of the Christ's sacrifice." (Stăniloae 1997: 74)

"The dialectics of our assuming as sacrifice in Christ, and of maintaining us as distinct persons, it is concretized also in the fact that, in addition to the wafer out of which is taken the Lamb of God (Agnus Dei), as future body of Christ, the believers bring also the wafers out of which are taken pieces which are places around the Lamb of God (Agnus Dei), together with those of the saints and of the Lord's Mother. This practice of placing pieces of wafer next to Agnus Dei it isn't mentioned before the 9th Century. Before that time the names of the believers who asked for that were simply remembered, after the gift's bringing forth. This means that the believers' sacrifices were considered then as they are now, as being assumed by Christ, in His sacrifice. But later on, in order to avoid the idea of depersonalizing the believers' sacrifices, it has been reckoned as necessary to specify also their persistence as persons in bringing their sacrifice, so that the wafer pieces are placed next to Agnus Dei." (Stăniloae 1997: 74-75)

"Many Christians struggle as much as they can, in order not to let themselves be dominated by the pleasure's passions, or by pride, namely against being dominated by the forgetfulness about themselves, or they struggle in order to advance in some measure towards being mastered by themselves as persons." (Stăniloae 1997: 152)

"The immortality isn't based on the indestructibility of the soul seen as substance, but of the person, namely of the soul as basis of the human person, given that the person is factor of this relation. This is for the relation between God and the human being it shows more its importance for the man isn't destroyed for a while, but he is uninterruptedly maintained, but judged immediately after his death, and awarded or punished with a new style of life, according to how he has been living on earth. If God has made the human being as person, as relation partner, this relation will be and eternal and uninterrupted relation." (Stăniloae 1997: 163)

"Only the objects disaggregate. The persons remain indestructible, as unique, original entities, but, in the same time, the persons remain as sources of endless novelty in their attitudes and in revealing their will. We cannot forget a person either that person has done good or evil to us. And we want both cases to last forever, either in order that person to repent for the evil done to us or in order to us to enjoy continuously his love." (Stăniloae 1997: 163)

"What at us is only an unrealizable will, at God it is reality. To God, actually, no person whom He has been in relation with, he doesn't cease to exist. God, when He made the human being as person, He has given the human being an importance as His partner forever, He has made the human being for an uninterrupted relation with Him. This can be seen in the uniqueness of the person too. No person can be replaced for another person; a person cannot be replaced regarding what he can offer. Of his loss, properly-said, it is not the person who suffers, but the other persons suffer. Through the death of a person is taken away also the possibility of an irreplaceable relation. Likewise, to God, each disappeared human being still would mean an irreplaceable relation. Does God accept the absence of some irreplaceable relations after He wanted those relations? Does His love accept the disappearance of the person whom it has been directed towards? If he accepts this, why He would resurrect those persons?" (Stăniloae 1997: 163)

“The theories on the destruction of the whole man through death, they hide out the known understanding of the Protestantism regarding the value of the human person, the known affirmation of the exclusive reality of God in front of the human nothingness. To the unique value of the human person to God, it belongs the human person’s permanent and uninterrupted existence. If the love of God is uninterrupted, then uninterrupted will be the existence of the persons whom He gives His live. And the non-interruption of the love of God it belongs to the perfection of His love. We can forget, because of not loving perfectly. But God doesn’t forget, for he loves perfectly.” (Stăniloae 1997: 163)

“If the souls had ceased to exist between death and the universal judgment, it would have meant an interruption of the relation between God and these persons. But we cannot imagine that God would interrupt His relation with a person, once He has brought that person to existence. Otherwise, what would Him have brought that person to existence for? And the man must have, at his turn, the conscience that God hasn’t interrupted and He won’t ever interrupt the relation with him, that he isn’t an accident to God, but that he has a permanent value. The adherents of the theory of the souls’ destruction vainly try to argue that God keeps too the dead, in connection with Himself through the memory He has about them, and through the decision to resurrect them. A memory on somebody who existed or who will be, it is interweaved with the painful feeling that He is missing that person, and this feeling is endured unwillingly by the one who doesn’t have the power to maintain in life the one whom he loves. But God doesn’t lack this power. If God won’t ever forget the one whom He has been in relation with, He keeps that one in existence in order the memory not to be interweaved, at Him, with the feeling that He is missing that one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 163-164)

“God wants to show that His love will last forever, even for the ones who don’t ever answer His love. Otherwise, it would seem impossible to understand that they too are going to be resurrected. Any person is a unique reality, a unique sign of the creator imagination of God, and each person remains as a unique witness of this creator imagination, as a unique form of God’s revelation. God won’t ever forget a person and that’s why He maintains any person in existence. The thesis of the destruction of some persons for awhile, it leads to the possibility they to be destroyed forever, and this empties of seriousness: the creation, and the embodiment of the Son of God as man, and the resurrection, and the entire salvation’s plan. In Christ-the Man God reentered the intimate virtual relation with all people, even if subjectively some people do not know about this relation. God affirmed, through the human face He has given His Son with, the eternal value of all the human faces. Without being annulled the freedom of the people as persons, because of this would make them nonhuman, all the people remain in a various bond with Christ. In Christ, God has tied His existence, on the mankind. And vice versa.” (Stăniloae 1997: 164)

“The interest of God in the human person as such, it wouldn’t have been full, if God had destroyed the human persons who didn’t do His will. Saint John Damascene said that even the existence of the demons, as existence produced by God, it is a good thing. God wants to show that He can tolerate even the existence of the persons who use their freedom in a way unpleasant to Him. The opposite would have meant a denial of the importance of the freedom granted by Him. But God doesn’t deny this important gift which He has given to the man. God doesn’t condition this gift on certain conditions. In the end, those human beings too, they confess their dependency on God; these human beings too, they are in a dialogue with God, even if they answer His call negatively. God doesn’t feel Himself endangered either by the somehow autonomous existence of some human beings next to Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 164)

“We have the paradox that the affirmation of the person it is a good thing, but the egotistic affirmation of the person, outside the communion with God the Supreme Person, it is a bad thing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 179-180)

“The world’s transformation at the end of time it has its cause, anyway, in the Lord’s coming closer to the world. It can be exclusively the effect of the light and of the spiritual “fire” of the Lord’s body. But this can cause a material fire too. In the songs on the Sunday of Thomas they say that the Lord’s rib, or bone, it was of fire and God sheltered Thomas against being burnt by it. That’s why this “fire” could be felt as fire especially by the evil ones. All the more it irradiates fire out of the Lord’s eyes. Anyway, the Lord is the ultimate cause of the old-world consumption and of the apparition of the new world. The created world is potentially comprised in the godlike not-embodied. The transfigured world it is comprised in Person of the embodied and resurrected into body, Word. Through this it is affirmed the superiority of power of the person upon nature, and the dependence of the last one on the first one. Out of the world and out of the face of any person it irradiates a superior power, which is due to the spirit. All the more it irradiates a power out of the Lord’s Person. If the world has been created through word, then it will be transformed through the light of the face, of the eyes which God has put on, in order the world’s matter to be made according to the way of existence of the resurrected body. And if the bodied were animated in the beginning through the breath of the not-embodied God, at the end of the time they will be resurrected through the irradiation of the whole power of His resurrected body, which is His Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 261-262)

“The luminous face of Christ will lighten everybody and everything. The things will no longer appear as independent from persons, but as a common content of theirs, as an environment of manifestation of Christ's love and of the angelic and human persons in a pan-personalism of the consummate communion." (Stăniloae 1997: 266)

"Although the entire world and the subjects open to Him will be covered by the light of Christ's face, this won't mean their disappearing. On one hand, out of this sea of everybody's communion each individual and each spiritual level of the ones living in it is being imparted according to his level and mode." (Stăniloae 1997: 266)

"If the people differ now also due to external "natural" causes, independent to their will, after resurrection they will differ exclusively due to moral, voluntary, and spiritual reasons. This is a meaning of the matter being overwhelmed by the spirit. These differences distinguish the people as spiritually nuanced persons. The other differences distinguish the people due to the external circumstances and to the inferior and not-free passions. The last ones distinguish the people as individuals opposing to one another, and not as persons whom it is expressed in the communion spirit. If the passions urge the people to camouflage themselves, the kindness makes them totally sincere, and therefore not-uniform. All the more the heavenly man will receive his own characteristics by spirit." (Stăniloae 1997: 284)

"Christ, for He has become unseen through His Ascent, He uses for working upon the ones who want to unite themselves with Him and to grow up in Him – by entering the Church where to spiritually grow up -, a person as seen organ. The need for some seen material means or for some seen gestures implies also the need for some seen person, whom Christ to work in a seen mode through, upon the ones who want to unite themselves with Him and to grow up in Him. The most efficient work is that from person to person. Christ as person He works in the most efficient mode upon the human person through human persons as well. Only a human person can commit expressive acts, namely intentional acts, differing from the nature's unintentional movements, and only a human person can utter words explaining the meaning of what it is being done and the intention Christ has through Mysteries. The priest's gestures touching the one who is provided with the Mystery, or which are answered by the receiver through his own gestures, they make the Mystery to be more efficient within the receiver's being. This efficacy is characteristic also to the words uttered by the Mysteries' committer and heard by the receiver or uttered by the receiver as answer and as engagement towards the committer." (Stăniloae 1997: 18)

"Actually, the acts of will and the works, whose agent is the subject, they wouldn't make any sense if the subject hadn't the tendency to manifest himself to the others and to enter in report with others through voluntary acts and through his works. From the two characteristics of the subject: to have a nature, and to work through that nature, namely to manifest himself, the first one made no sense but only in the goal of the second one, because otherwise the nature would be conceived like something static, and there would not exist the possibility to want and to work through it. The purpose of the subject it cannot be either only that of exercising his will and his work on his nature, because in this case the will and the work would have to have their origin into the subject, and not into the nature itself. The nature would have to be a passive object, totally at the disposition of the subject.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus is Savior through His own Person. No man can find the salvation somewhere outside of Christ’s Person, where Christ would have placed it, like a standing alone aid, after He has created it. Searching for salvation means searching for Jesus Christ, for the communion with Him. The state of salvation is the state of communion with Jesus Christ like God and, through Him, or due to Him, with the fellow humans. We have the salvation only if the Man Jesus unveils Himself to us like God Who has become to us that supreme but though close to us: “You”; that “You” full of authority, but though full of love that wakes up our subject from the death of the selfish loneliness and put us in a not-annullable connection with Himself, and through Himself with the fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The work of Jesus Christ it is inseparable from His person. The work is, by and large, an external manifestation of a person. Through the work of somebody, we enter the connection with his person. The spoken word of somebody, by being a work of his, it is a manifestation of his person, a bridge which he gives us to call us into relationship, into communion with him. Through word we are always passing to the person who has spoken it. Only then it can the word be considered like something which sends us away from the person, when we consider the word like a standing alone idea.

In fact, when a man talks to you, your attention concentrates on him, his imagine dominates you and imposes to your spirit. You do not feel his words like something putting a distance between him and you, but, rather the opposite, like something which opens up the one whom you are talking to and it brings him closer to you, and also like something which also opens you up and it brings you closer to him. The word makes the connection between him and you and gets you closer to one another.

This truth is especially valid regarding Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The work of Jesus Christ it cannot be separated from His Person, because of not being but the necessary manifestation of His personal structure itself. Being fully a human person, Jesus Christ cannot be but the most undisturbed actualization of the tendency towards communion. And a fully human person He could not be except for He is in the same time the created reverse of the uncreated divine person. In Jesus Christ the spirit of communion is not maintained by a center from outside, but it has the last residence in Himself. He does not need to beg for love, which to show it to the people, from God like from a foreign somebody, but He has the love in Himself, in a not diminished manner.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Person of Jesus Christ is not-separated from His work, by the manifestation of His love. Only through an abstraction it is possible to speak separately about His Person. In a natural way His Person manifests in savior deeds, and the savior deeds are not-separated from His person.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Of course, this thing seems somehow self-understood when it is treated like work, in the sense of a present action. Then, to any man there exists an inseparability between his person and his work. We understand how, on the moment when Jesus was speaking a word of teaching, this word was forming a whole with His Person and what was giving life to the listeners it was not the word taken by itself, but it was the hanging, of their being, on the Savior. The words and the deeds of a person, on the moment they are spoken and done, they cannot be separated from the person, because they are the person’s himself manifestation, and they reveal and convey the person, in an existential way, to the persons whom he can attract into the unitary circle of the dialog. But how it can continue to be valid this fact to the words which once flew from the lips of the Savior and they have been fixed into a book, or to the deeds once done and which remained into the memory of the people?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ’s work is the bridge which He throws permanently to the human being for tying it by His Person; it is the manifestation, and it is the openness of His Person.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The savior work of Jesus Christ, though indissoluble tied to His Person, both in the effectuation and on the result of it which we are imparted with, it can be contemplated in itself, being given the fact it was necessary for the salvation of the people, and thus having a fundamental significance.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“From what we have told about the indissoluble connection between His manifestations and His Person, but also from other consideration which we are going to mention, it turns out that, at Jesus Christ, we have not only disparate and accidental deeds of a teacher, of a hierarch and of a king, like some Protestant theologians affirms, but Himself is, through His being and through His mission of embodied Son of God: prophet, hierarch, and king. God in Himself, in His internal reports, is neither a prophet, nor a king, and He is even less a hierarch. But immediately that He creates an inferior world, still a spiritual one, which He wants to stay into a report with, He is its teacher, and its king. In report with the man, God is also the man’s teacher and the man’s leader by excellence. Even if the man hadn’t had sin and God hadn’t embodied Himself, God still would have been the teacher and the king of the man. Hierarch, however, the Son of God is only after the man’s falling, like the one who embodies Himself and mediates like man to God. But, even if He is a hierarch like man, though, if this man hadn’t constituted, through embodiment, the Son of God, He couldn’t have been a hierarch. God gives the man the power of the high priesthood, because who else can obey God, except the ones who enjoy the divine grace in front of Him? And the fully listened to, by God, is that man Who is, in the same time, the Son of God. If the dignity of a teacher and of a king of Jesus Christ, it has its last source into His quality of God, the dignity of a hierarch by excellence, He has it through His quality of the fullest Mediator between man and God, assembling into His Person, ontologically, both the one and the another one, by being both in the camp of God Who must be reconciled, and also in the camp of the people, who are begging for reconciliation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The same consideration could be made related to the tendency of our being to come closer or to impropriate everything that represents a value. This is also an infinite tendency, which we know about that it won’t be satisfied with any finite value, but by crossing through all those values, it searches for the infinite value which it confusedly feels it as existing. This thirst for the infinite value comes also out of an experience of our concavity, of our insufficiency which we must complete through values existing outside us. The dynamism of this thirst it has in itself something positive, which cannot be explained only through our minus; and this positive force it cannot be upheld in us except by the irradiation and by the attraction of the supreme value, with which, consequently, we are on the line of an uninterrupted bond. But we know that out of the concrete values incorporations, the worthiest of love it appears us to be the human person, for the human person represents the richest and the most complex concentration of values. The objects present us, each one of them, a sole value, anyway a much-reduced number of values. And the objects especially lack the value of the conscience, the value of the knowledge, which are characteristic to the human person and which our loneliness finds the much-desired healing in.” (Stăniloae 1992: 17-18)

“The identification to God, it is excluded not only by His quality as Creator which God has, and by the man’s fundamental quality as creature, but also by God’s character as Person. Besides, God could only be a Person, for the free and conscious existence mode of the person is infinitely superior to the inert existence mode of the objects, and God cannot be except free and sovereign; but just because He is Person, namely he is an absolutely sovereign Person, He doesn’t bring the world to existence by emanating it out of His Being or by involuntary unfolding out of His Being, neither by using - because of helplessness - an external matter, but only by creating it out of nothing. Making abstraction even of this and through God’s Person as fact as such, it becomes impossible the pantheistic identification of the man to God, but it gives the possibility of an infinite progress of the man in the communion with God. Namely, firstly by the fact that in His quality as Person God cannot be known by man through a man’s cognitive offensive, as one can neither enter the intimacy of a communion with God without God’s will.” (Stăniloae 1992: 22)

“You cannot know the person of your fellow human only through your initiative, or through your aggressive undertaking. In order to know him, he must unveil himself through his own initiative and he does this all the more as it is absent the aggressive element from your tendency to know him. All the more God, the Supreme Person and Who isn’t dressed up in a visible body, he cannot be known by the man if He doesn’t reveal Himself (Max Scheller, Vom Ewigen im Menschen, Berlin, 1933: 681-686). Through this it is confirmed, in the first place, the thesis of the Christian spirituality, that one cannot reach to see God without a special grace received from God. But this excludes also the possibility that our being, in our thirst of knowing and appropriating God through knowledge, to reach to absorb the divine essence in ourselves, until identifying to God. Besides, identifying the man to God it would be equivalent to a disappearing of the human being as distinct being, but it would mean also a disappearing of the world as distinct reality. It would mean that God renounces to the creation’s existence. But the, what God has created the world for? Only for ceasing the world’s existence by absorbing it within Himself, after He has crossed it through the detour loop of an ephemeral existence? If the form of this created existence hadn’t had a value in itself, or it hadn’t had the possibility of enjoying the divine values by remaining in itself a creature, it wouldn’t have been more logically if it hadn’t been created at all?” (Stăniloae 1992: 22-23)

“If the man too has been created as person, the God’s intentions it has been that the man too to exist as an irreducible self, capable of defending in his relations of communion his being’s intimate hearth. The relations amongst the created persons show us, on one hand, what tight it can be the communion amongst them like, and on the other hand, these relations show us the irreducibility of the selves along with the not consummate union amongst them. These relations are an icon for the man’s connection with God. These relations make us understand the relation that cannot be expressed by words, except contradictorily (Nicholas Kabasilas 1946: 4). On one hand, it is a “union”; on the other hand, this union isn’t identification. God overwhelms our being which his gifts and powers, but these gifts and powers do not become gifts and powers belonging to our being. Our being doesn’t become divine being, because of our created self doesn’t become godlike self, and that’s why in this living our self preserves his conscience that, not by his power he enjoys all the good things he tastes, but through God. The spiritual Christian impropriates this affirmation of supreme humbleness, but also of supreme daring: “I am man, but I live as God by what God has given me; I am man, but I am on God’s level by the grace of God which He has deigned to dress me up in.” This expresses the content of Saint Apostle Paul’s words: “I am no longer living, but Christ lives in me” (Gal. 2: 28). Namely, my own self of man, he hasn’t ceased to exist, for I continue having the conscience of my own self, since I am affirming it; but my own self lives the life of Christ. I have remained man according to my nature, but I have become Christ according to the powers which my own self is now living through. This is the experience of the Christian on the supreme peaks of his spiritual living.” (Stăniloae 1992: 23)

“The Christians spirituality, by having as target the man’s deification and his union with God without being confounded to Him, it has as its basis the conviction in the existence of a God as Person Who is supreme source for the love irradiating out of Him, and Who, by cherishing the man, he doesn’t want to merge the man to Himself, but He wants to maintain and to elevate the man up to an eternal dialogue of love. Such spirituality cannot take place where it is affirmed an evolutionary progress of the man in connection with a divinity conceived as impersonal essence. That sort of progress cannot have any other result than a man’s getting lost in the impersonal divinity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 29)

“God as Person, and therefore as supreme source of love, He cannot be conceived as singular Person, but only as community of Persons in consummate unity. Behold why, the Christian teaching about a Trinity of Persons in a consummate unity it is the only one that can constitute the basis of a consummate spirituality of the man, understood as full communion with God in love, without the man being lost in this communion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 29)

““Our thinking from today it has been accustomed so much to identify “the logics” with the “rationality”, so that it judges the correctness of any thinking according to the measure which that thinking corresponds to the “logics” in. But in reality, the logics suppose the Plato’s doctrine about ideas, or the Aristotle’s concept’s unity. For this ideas’ doctrine there is no place in the Bible, because of here the whole thinking is preoccupied not with the ideas but with the person; it is existentialist” (Koeppen). And the person is infinitely more than the ideas are, through his indefinable, living, passionate, always new and thirsty for a living and loving relation with other persons. Only the person really warms me up. The ideas are only some partial products of the person, or non-fully communication means amongst persons. And the person’s thirst for endless relations with other persons it implies both the eternity of the persons and the source of this eternity of theirs, in a supreme community of persons.” (Stăniloae 1992: 34)

“The sentiment of plenitude, of overflowing, of happy drunkenness, as the Holy Fathers called it, we actually live it too, in our love for others, all the more for the communication of the love starts both from within me and from within my fellow human. But this love cannot have as ultimate source a universal natural basis. Only the supreme, infinite Person can be the source of such a plenary love and joy. This is for you realize that the overflowing joy had by another for you, and the boundless will of him to comprise you as whole in himself, it is not only you the one who cause it with your relativity, neither it can start from the content of his nature, nor can come out of an impersonal source. The other one unveils himself to you and you to him, as a gift of the infinite Person. So, the joy for another it is also a gift from the supreme Person from beyond you and him, Who, through him He gives Himself to you and through you He gives Himself to him. This conviction is enforced to you also by the fact that this joy doesn’t last except for a moment at the time. If everything had come from nature and it had belonged to the nature, it should have lasted and it could have lasted permanently. But when we receive that joy, it seems to us that our being is melting down like, it seems is being shattered, it seems we would faint out, if that joy would last for more and it would increase in intensity. If this spiritual joy had been born out of the nature’s content which we are co-natural with, how could have been us capable of experiencing our incapacity of living it wholly, and for a longer time in continuation, or even all the time?” (Stăniloae 1992: 271)

“In my rejoicing of you, in my love for you, which goes up to forgetting about my own self, in order to put you on the place of my own self, in the union between you and me, the human nature allotted in persons it overcomes its division and it finds itself in its unity, a fact that produces an overflowing joy. The allotting in persons it was and it still is necessary just for through the reciprocal love amongst them, the persons to unveil a value and a beauty which otherwise they couldn't unveil." (Stăniloae 1992: 274-275)

"The icons' defenders explained that the man, and therefore Christ too, for being a man, He has a comprehensible side too, a side that can be represented in icon, but they didn't deny that Christ, according to His godlike nature, he is incomprehensible, uncircumscribed, and therefore impossible to be represented in icon. By this they distinguished between icon and prototype. But the icon, by representing the prototype, for the prototype had a visibility, the icon indicated towards Christ Himself as Person. By representing the seen aspect of a person, for this aspect cannot stand detached from person, it is indicated the integral person. And the worshipping of the icon it aims not the icon as object in itself, but it aims to the represented person. And for the Person of Christ is also God, though the icon represents Him only according to His humanity, the icon makes us thinking at His integral Person, divine-human, manifested, on one hand, as confession of the real humanity taken by the Lord, and on the other hand, through it is affirmed and it is remembered always the hypostatic union of the two natures in the Person of God-the Word, it is affirmed that the Person seen in icon, through His humanity, that Person isn't only a human person but He is a divine Person too. This is the sense the worshipping of Christ has, a worshipping occasioned and caused by icon." (Stăniloae 2005: 143)

"Without any doubt, for the nature doesn't really exist except into person, the image is characteristic to the person. The person gives concrete consistency to the nature and it shows the image, thus, as manifesting one person's relation with other persons and a difference from them, within the same nature. The Son is the image of the Father both for having the Father's nature and for being Son of the Father and not the Father. Even in God, the image means a certain distinction of a person from another, and therefore a certain specification. Neither God is totally indefinite. There is an infinity in His reality which isn't totally indefinite." (Stăniloae 2005: 168)

"We must affirm both the fact that the human nature subsists in different hypostases and the fact that in its real state, each hypostasis comprises the whole nature. If the individual hypostasis hadn't comprised the whole nature, the people wouldn't have accomplished the love amongst them. If the nature hadn't existed in non-confounded persons, the love wouldn't have been possible either." (Stăniloae 2005: 199)

"If the Son of God had made Himself man only generally, if He had made Himself the bearer of the humanity by and large, without its will, the people would have lost their character as persons. In such a case the people would have constituted an impersonal mass, a mass borne by divinity in a pantheistic sense. And Christ wouldn't have been, properly said, a Person.

There wouldn't have existed a self-awareness in people, either in Christ as man. With this, it would have become impossible the love between person and person, and therefore also the love of Christ as person, towards the human persons." (Stăniloae 2005: 200)

"We have said that the notion of hypostasis or of person implies the fact or the relation with other persons (as it is the case amongst the human persons and the divine Persons). The divine Logos, by creating all the persons in His image, He comprises in the relation with Himself all the human persons more than the human persons comprise one another reciprocally, but, still, He remains a distinct Person, as role model and as upholder of everybody. The human persons cultivate the relation with Christ and amongst them, also through their conscience and will, once they are persons in the image of the supreme Person, and they are not objects. This quality as distinct Person, but a Person comprising all the human persons more than they comprise each other, it is being reflected in Christ quality as Man too, in His embodiment." (Stăniloae 2005: 200)

"The iconoclasts' thesis about the removal of the limits of the human nature by being assumed by the Word of God, it means a diminishment of the human and a helplessness of God-the Word of keeping in undiminished. Despising the personal character of the human it implies a divine's lack of freedom, a helplessness of the divine, a submitting of the divine under a process. Understanding God as nature it determined understanding the human as nature, and vice versa; it means identifying them in a unique nature in a pantheistic sense. And understanding God as Person it implies admitting in Him the power of creating persons, of organizing by His power free and distinct persons, and of making Himself a factor of restoration of the human as such, as distinct, personal, and individual human. If the Word hadn't been able to give an individual character to the assumed humanity, by making Himself its formator hypostasis as individual humanity, the embodiment wouldn't have taken place, namely it would have been only a fiction. Since the Word of God hadn't been circumscribed by embodying Himself in order to circumscribe the assumed nature and in order to manifest Himself as a Hypostasis matching it, He wouldn't have really taken our real nature, or, by taking it, He would have essentially modified it, he would have taken it out of its individual characteristics which are the condition of its reality." (Stăniloae 2005: 207)

"Not admitting that the Son of God has made Himself a concrete, individual man, it means not admitting His love for people regarded as other persons, but it means reckoning that there is a diffuse love amongst people which is nourished out of God, but there isn't a love between the Son of God as man and each individual man, or of each individual man for the Son of God made man accessible to them. The love is a persona report, and it isn't a tendency of the nature to stay together in its generality - this means, again, placing the nature above person.” (Stăniloae 2005: 208)

“The man won’t be able to grow up in freedom if he isn’t in dialogue with a God-Person. An impersonal fund of the world carries the man away through the meanders of an involuntary destiny. The existentialist experience of the man outside a dialogue with a God Who is Person, it cannot be else but the tragic experience of accepting a fatality leading the man inevitably to death.” (Stăniloae 2005: 10)

“The Christian reckons that the impulse for a vigorous affirmation of his freedom it comes just from God, as Person partner in the dialogue with the man. Nothing claims the man stronger, nothing upholds the man’s forces in a life of responsibility, than a God Who isn’t submitted to the mundane automatism. A God submitted to this automatism cannot give the man the force of getting rid of this automatism, of being free for new acts, acts which to create a better world.” (Stăniloae 2005: 10)

“The western anthropocentrism is passionate with accentuating the man’s independence relatedly to God, and it tends to consider the man close to nature or even to confound him to nature, and that even happened; while the eastern personalism means the tendency of differing from nature, not of becoming – the human being – autonomous in report with to God, but, a contrary, the whole value of the human person descends from above, it comes in connection with the divine person. The Orthodox peoples believe in person for they believe in God as Person, and not in nature.” (Stăniloae 2005: 66)

“The Orthodox personalism isn’t hostile to nature; it doesn’t want the disappearance of the nature, but its transfiguration. But the transfiguration is being done through person, in the last analysis through the divine Person of the Son of God. His icon uses the nature’s elements but it unveils a meaning from beyond, and in its light the whole art and ethics of the Orthodox peoples aspire to transfigure the nature. In the Orthodox conception the person appears on the foreground upon the entire nature it overflows the brightness and the meaning of the person. To the West, the man is an annex of the nature, and ethically speaking, the nature is indifferent to the man; the nature must be taken as it is, for it is mastered by the iron unchangeability of the laws. To the East, the nature as it is, it is under the shadow of the sin and of the powers from beyond nature. The nature must be transfigured: parts of nature must be liberated from under the evil’s domination. This cannot be done through the activism aiming its immanence, but only through the moral purity and through the man’s prayer, which touch the evil’s forces reigning in the nature’s unseen.” (Stăniloae 2005: 66)

“What is different by, the messianic symbol, from the prophetic symbol, and the symbol by and large? If the general symbol makes us the thing’s nature itself transparent to God, in His transcendent spirituality, the prophetic symbol presents us, by a divine special choosing of the respective thing, if not either by being invested with a special power too, with anticipation, the Embodied Word, His intention of making Himself man, namely it unveils to us, out of God, something more than the general symbol does, or God as somehow more leaning towards the world in His intention of becoming one with the world. By their instituting, God really unveils Himself, to us, as Person, by showing His intention regarding some future deeds of His, which cannot be known by man otherwise, because of not being committed yet, namely brought to light. If through embodiment, the Word of God fully comes to light, as much as the man can notice, in prophetic symbols it is made known His intention to come in the future, to light, so that these prophetic symbols have a plus of revelation in comparison to the general symbols. In the prophetic symbols God made a step towards the world, but it cannot be seen except shadow, like a person about to go out his room, which is illuminated by the light from outside, but until that person doesn’t get out fully, only his contour can be seen, or his movement towards the light from outside, while he still is inside the chamber’s shadow. In those symbols, the Divine Logos stood as “in shadow”; He didn’t come out to light; He was overshadowed by the thick eggshell of the symbol. This idea has been developed by Saint Cyril of Alexandria in his work “Worshipping in Ghost and Truth”. The prophetic symbols presented us the Logos as closer, but only in His intention, than the general symbols which say that there is a sole God Who created the world and Who upholds the world, but not also that this God is on His way to come to us and to commit a series of savior act which reveal His love even more.” (Stăniloae 2005: 72-73)

“The supreme existence itself makes the human persons capable of knowing Him and of loving Him, by using the world as a means transparent to His light and love. Out of this love, we deduce, as a first conclusion, the fact that the man and the world have been created out of nothing and, as a second conclusion is that the supreme existence has the capacity of uncreated and eternal love, so that it is a structure which, in its unity as godlike being, it is not only One Person, but it is from ever Three Persons Who love on one another.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 7-8)

“But the will of God and the will of the man, in the relation between God and man, in order to fully elevate the man at the uncreated, eternal, and infinite light, it actually highlights the character as conscious persons, of God and of the man. This is for only the conscience of God can found the love for the man and only the man’s conscience, it can find the man’s will for eternity, namely the man’s will for advancing into the God’s infinite and eternal light.

Only a conscious God can cherish the man and only a conscious man can cherish God. And only the man's conscience can crook his own will, by deviating it from willing to achieve the true, eternal life, from God, by thinking that he can achieve it by his own egotism." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 15)

"Everything that exist has in itself a rationality, or a light, but that light is concretely shown in its richness through individuations and through persons and it is being noticed and it is being communicated through personal consciences." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 28)

"The fact that each conscience belongs to a person, it is shown in the fact that each conscience needs another conscience which, on the other hand, it is different from the own conscience, and on the other hand, it enriches his own conscience. The conscience belongs to a self, which addresses to a conscience of a you, who doesn't let the self to be alone, but neither keeps it in a limitation and in a poverty, but he makes possible the conscience's enrichment. The another's conscience is like an open gate to me, and not like a locked-up gate. Just by the fact that each self has in front of him another conscience, as a gate, it shows that fact that he isn't locked up in a monotony." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 28-29)

"The personal consciences realize that the world with its light and the persons whom the light belongs to, no matter how enriched the world and the light would be through them, they aren't the unique reality, neither they have the light by themselves, that they have their existence from a supreme existence, and therefore they have the light too, from a supreme light. This is for that supreme reality and supreme light must be, at its turn, not only a power which the world and the humanity which notice the light and the man, but it also must be a conscience who communicated and who knows consummately, the light, or the meaning, or the rest of the world and of the man. For, otherwise, the world's light and the human conscience that notices it, they would have remained in themselves, too little understood. And the human conscience, by noticing that the world's light and his own light aren't fully perceived, it realizes that they do not depend on themselves in their own existence. That's why it cogitates, rightly so, that this conscience about the world and about the man it belongs to a supreme Subject Who even created them out of nothing and Who upholds them in existence." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 29)

"A God of the eternal life and, so, of the perfect love, He cannot be except a God of a Trinity of Persons. The love cannot exist except amongst Persons. And a perfect love cannot exist except amongst three Persons. A Father Who had had several Sons, He wouldn't have directed His infinite love towards several different sons, because, if those ones had been diverse, they would have been also limited and they wouldn't have been able to receive the whole their Father's love. And this love shows its perfection into the Ghost Who rejoices together with each of the Two Others. Thus, in God too, there are Three Persons, Each One of Them rejoicing of the whole being together with the Two Others - as the people do too, but the people aren't able to rejoice consummately." Son too, but as given back by the Son, as a gift, to the Father. They know one another, therefore, as having the same being, but a being that is on each time lived with another personal feeling. This makes possible to the people too, to know one relatedly to another." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 30)

"Each limited existence is luminous light, it has a meaning and, when conscious, it asks itself the question about its meaning and, in the case of the purely physical individuations, by putting the conscious human existences the question about those ones' meaning. And the answer given by the human conscious persons to the questions about the meaning of all the existences, and so also to the physical individuations, it is expressed in words. In words, the conscious persons express the rationalities of their own existence and of the physical individuations and of the connections amongst these rationalities, for there is a harmony of rationalities on each individuality or person and, likewise, a harmony between the rationality or the amongst rationalities persons, and the rationalities of all the unconscious things. The words are multiplying to the extent of the knowing the diverse rationalities of the things and of the persons and the relations amongst them, and to the extent of some modifications occurred within them. Expressing these relations is done in sentences or in more elaborated speeches, which the man makes efforts in, in order to express the relations amongst the rationalities of the entire universe, and also in order to express their dependency on a supreme personal cause, which is imposed to the man's conscience, when he goes all the way to explaining their existence and their harmony." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 33)

"All the kinds of the created natures are inexhaustible, by the Revelation of God through them, but the conscious created hypostases remain always the same, inexhaustible in itself their existence, due to the power of God Who has created them and Who upholds them thus. But only the human persons speak, for only they live in a conscious manner the interest in one another, through bodily senses, and they need the common material universe. And this imposes us the belief that, on the supreme top of the existence, there is a communion of Persons in an eternal and perfect love." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 35)

"The human persons communicate to one another, through words, or mainly by words, the inexhaustible light or the common rationalities which the human persons gather in, the light of the things and of the persons known to them, and those have, at their turn, a never fully definable source, in God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 35)

“John the Evangelist, by saying, that “through Him were done all the things and without Him nothing was done from what was done” (Jn. 1: 3), he showed that the world and the man aren’t emanations of an essence, but they are creatures of a Person Who speaks spiritually from ever, and Who gives them also the power of being expressed and of expressing the created things, through words, by people. But, by declaring that all the things were created through the godlike Hypostasis Who is the Word from ever, the Evangelist showed that this Hypostasis of the Word didn’t created those, without the Father and without the Holy Ghost, to Whom He speaks since ever. Through the Word was speaking, powerfully, the Father, and in creating all the things the Word was united with the Holy Ghost Who was also working and, by this, the Ghost was putting upon all the things the seal of the harmony amongst them and the aspiration towards the union with the Son and with the Father. This is for, if the Son, through Who all the things were created, He is the Word, and the Ghost is a Person Whom the Son is united with the Father through, then the Trinity is a seal of the union amongst all things. This union of the Son or Word, with the Father and with the Ghost in creating all the things, it is expressed through the Greek form of the term “at the beginning”, which is “en arhe”, into beginning, a term that can be translated not only as expressing the relation of the Word with the created world, but also a relation with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, as Saint Cyril of Alexandria understands it. The Son “was at the beginning” of all things, or in the Father and in the Holy Ghost, for They were in Him. This is for the term: “was”, it shows also the fact that the Son was without beginning within the Father (together with the Holy Ghost), because of not being given a term since when was within the Father (with the Ghost the beginning of all the things. So, the two understandings of the term “beginning” they must be united. Both these understandings are reflected within all the created things, which are products of a since ever speaking Person, giving them too, the possibility of being expressed through word, due to their rationality, but by giving the rational and conscious creatures the possibility of expressing through word the existence of all the things, and also the love amongst them, and to aspire towards the increasingly fuller revealing of their Creator. Therefore, another meaning is that, by unveiling their harmony in the same time with their dependence on the Creator Word, they reflect in their harmony the unity in one being, of the Three Godlike Persons.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 36-37)

“Christ is a seen way towards the target which also is Him, by the fact that He is the role-model man, but He is also God, and He is the man’s full life through the full union of His human nature with His godlike nature. This is for, as we’ve affirmed, in a person there is the concrete life of a nature. And into Christ, the humanity's life is accomplished in Himself the godlike Person. And, if in another's person my person has its completion of the life too, into Christ we have in the another's person not only the limited man's life but also the limitless nature of the Son of God, which places us in communion with other godlike Persons: with the Father and with the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 71)

"For the power of advancing towards Christ it isn't conveyed to the man only by Christ as God, but that power comes within the man also from Christ as Man, Christ has made Himself, to us, path, also by the example of His deeds. He was, as man, a perfect environment of His godlike powers, since the beginning, but in order to show us that, through His concrete deeds, He has made out of his humanity such a visible and successive environment, through His life unfolded in such deeds, in order the believer to be able to imitate Christ. Christ shows Himself as travelling, at His turn, a human concrete path. He has given us the possibility of seeing Him as travelling a concrete path, with His full of godhead humanity, in order us to imitate, at our turn, His deeds, and the image of His kindness and cleanness in such deeds, a path traveled since His childhood until His sacrifice on the cross. He has shown us what we can manifest our gentleness like, and our cleanness of passions, our patience, and our love, through His concrete deeds. But Christ, in His quality as path, He is to us as luminous light, and vice versa. But he is an endless path to us, for he isn't only a man but he is also God. And He is an endless path to us even as Person, given the fact that itself the human person is a never exhaustible mystery. Even the human person is, on one hand, a luminous light and a path to our will of advancing endlessly in the communion of love towards it, but never being confounded to it. The human person is too, an endless path, for the human persons never end having something more to communicate. The human person constantly lives something else of himself, and I live always in another state of connection with another human person; the human person always wants to communicate himself to another person. I advance in knowing the human person, but I always have many things to know of him. But in this endless communication there still is something finite, something definite, or a limited indefinite. But Christ, as Person in the same time divine and human, he is endlessly in a communication of His infinity. He is always luminous light, above any light and mystery, eternally above the human definable. Christ is infinite mystery in what He communicates to us, and He is infinite mystery in what still remains uncommunicated by Him. The more luminous light communicates Christ, the greatest is proven the mystery to be. Christ is the endless luminous light and mystery in just His humanity, for it is a humanity which the godlike Person is communicated through." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 74-76)

“It is a great mystery the fact that Himself the Person of the Son of God, he has made Himself Person of the human nature and, by that, he was born out of Virgin Mary and He received the death willingly. But this mystery means that not the blind and fatal laws are everything, because they, through themselves, they do not explain anything.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 91)

“The Person of the Son of God made Himself Person of the human nature, for He created the human nature. This shows also what great qualities God has given the human nature. The Son of God descended to what Himself created, out of nothing, and to what He gave a great value. But in order to show that Himself was the one doing that, through His power, He didn’t submit Himself to the usual birth like all the other people, because that would have meant not having the existence through Himself. But Himself made man, unseparated from Himself; He wasn’t’ made man by a pair of people. But He made Himself man, out of Virgin. This means that He made Himself man in full freedom. He didn’t make Himself man out of nothing, in addition to the existing people, but He took His human nature out of the common human nature, that existed also in the Virgin Whom He was born out of.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 91-92)

“Without Christ, I, as limited man, and another person, as limited human being too, we cannot communicate to one another except the same defined - and therefore monotonous - contents, and a life ending in death. We need a Person Who has in Himself an endless spiritual content, for he has in Himself the infinite reality or the infinite life. And That Person must be in union with a Person having the same infinite life, namely an infinite being, and They communicating from ever and forever to One Another. Only One of Those Persons, by making Himself, out of His infinite love for people, as man close to us, he can communicate us the endless and the new contents and life, by giving us too, the power to love Him and to love the human persons whom He loves endlessly.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 151-152)

“This character as light is had by the godlike Person or Hypostases, from eternity, from Themselves, and the created human persons have it since they are brought to existence, for they are aware of the values included within their beings. And the human persons’ values have this character by the fact that they are communicated between Hypostases and Persons. In the divine being there is included the kindness, the love, the knowledge, and the limitless power. But they are values communicated from a Person to Another, and for that these values have at their basis the awareness about them. Where there aren’t Persons or Hypostases, uncreated or created, there cannot be communicated values, so that there aren’t wholly values.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 183)

“Without Persons there wouldn’t have been communication of love, namely the godlike love wouldn’t have been seen. And why would have been there existence by and large, without the values communicated by persons amongst themselves, and which to give the person a joy, how could have had a meaning and what it would have constituted of the unity, which the persons contribute to, with their conscience?” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 183)

“The person is luminous light just by the fact that he communicates himself to another person and he wants to communicate himself to that person for eternity. The person is luminous light by the fact that somebody conscious wants to communicate himself to somebody else who is conscious too.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 184)

“Because an existence which there isn’t conscious communication of somebody with somebody else, it is meaningless, there must be an existence without a beginning, or from ever, which such a communication or such a light is within. And if the Persons of the supreme existence couldn’t had been cogitated in Their unity of being, while still maintaining Themselves not-confounded, They couldn’t have been cogitated either as fully knowing on One Another without They loving on Each Other. The perfect love that unites Them on the basis of the unity of being, it makes Them perfectly knowing on One Another, and vice versa.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 184)

“The godhead, as present wholly in each godlike Person, in an undivided mode, with the characteristics of the Three Persons, which, on one hand, it distinguishes Them from One Another, but on the other hand it unites Them, it is affirmed in the prologue to the Holy Gospel according to John, through the words: “At the beginning there was the Word and the Word was at God and God was the Word” (Jn. 1: 1). The Word was the Son, before the time existed; in His quality as Son, coming out of another Person, He must be a speaking Person, and that presupposes a third Person too. This is for the Word is said by Somebody Else.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 184)

“God, as supreme, and without beginning, existence, He is a conscious and loving Person. But the complete and loving existence as Person must be amongst Three Persons, in a full unity. This is a necessary height from where it can be done a descent towards not-fully satisfying levels: imperfect dialogue amongst us about a third person, or about passive objects which one can speak. But from these inferior levels of not-full existence, one cannot achieve an elevation on a level of supreme existence, wanted by the inferior consciences. The perfect love amongst the Three Persons of the supreme existence it implies the perfect knowledge of One Another, namely of Their limitless being. It is a knowledge which, to the inferior levels of conscious existence, it remains forever non-full, but it is an eternal aspiration too. This existence remains, ceaselessly, not only cognoscible, but as a mystery too.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 184-185)

“It is characteristic to the man’s nature to be aware of a meaning of itself, and to communicate through a person, to other persons, about this meaning of the human nature. Thus, the human nature spreads luminous light, or it is a light endlessly communicated, as constantly improved, to other persons. This means that each person, not only that he communicates luminous light, but is also receives light. And the human person receives light not only from other conscious persons, but also from impersonal existences, who spread the light consciously and voluntarily.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 189)

“The human person remains forever a luminous mystery and a mystery searching for light, who wants to enlighten on himself and to lighten others, endlessly.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 190)

“The human person communicates, on himself, through word, through deed, through smile, through his face’s expression, and even by his presence; and the human person searches for light, especially through his hearing and through his sight. The meanings from his eyes make his entire face as speaking. The whole man presents himself as a dialogical being and, in this purpose, as reflexive. And both these features show the human person as being luminous light and endless mystery.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 190)

“Both in his conscious communicativeness and in his reflection, the human person demonstrates also a quality as endless movement into light and mystery. And we cannot cogitate that into this it would be manifested a movement imposed to the human person by an irrational force. The man has an infinite thirst for light and he also has the feeling that he is an endless mystery.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 191)

“All the things are shown as participating, consciously or unconsciously, to the infinite light and mystery, without being themselves that infinite light and mystery. And that’s why the human person isn’t satisfied with the things’ light and mystery, or with the nourishment those things give it to the person’s light and mystery. That’s why the human person searches for the infinite light and mystery beyond the things. The human person searches for the light and the mystery itself.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 191-192)

“The human person searches for his own light and mystery into God, and he continuously increases in them through communication and loving thinking at God, and this is for the human person himself is a light and a virtual mystery, a light and a mystery meant to eternally increase within God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 196)

“The great mystery consists of the fact that God has brought to existence the created persons of the same being and dressed up into body, namely subjects aware of the value of their being, and aware of the values of the material universe, values lived differently by each person, and which each person communicated to another person, thus strengthening with their will their unity of being and sharing the mode of perceiving and of actualizing the value of the human being and of the universe. And into Christ the human persons become active subjects of the divine being, towards the richness which God into Trinity has prepared them for.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 202)

“What give me joy in the communication with another, it doesn’t consist of what he gives me as differing from himself, but it consists of his presence in everything he gives me. The person himself is life for another person. Although, in this reciprocal self-giving as gifts, the persons are not confounded to one another. If in the supreme existence hadn’t been this joy and understanding of other beings, then that supreme existence it wouldn’t have been an existence of joy, namely a consummate existence.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 49)

“If the man, as person, he cannot really accomplish himself except by being accepted by another person, he won’t be able to accomplish himself in a totally satisfying manner, except if the Absolute Whom the man tends towards is Himself too, a Person accepting the human person and being to the human person, in the same time, a supreme border, which isn’t a simple and own small extension.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 52)

“The Absolute Himself as consummately accomplished Person must be not only a Person to extends Himself, but also as a Person accepted by another Person. In this way, we understand how the interpersonal communion, or the Holy Trinity, it is the supreme form of the existence. Only in the Holy Trinity, or through the Holy Trinity, it is lived the true infinity. A God Who hasn’t been a Person Who gives Himself as gift and Who is eternally received by another Person, such a God would have been the God of an apparent infinity. The infinity is within person. More specifically, the infinity is lived by persons in common.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 52)

“The eternal importance of each person in his uniqueness, but also in his specific communication he brings to the other persons and which the other persons bring to him, it is shown also by the fact that each person we once knew, it remains us unforgettable; namely, to the extent we accomplished a communication with that person, as persons. If all the persons had been the same, they wouldn’t have remained unforgettable to us. Each person lays a living seal of his own, on the spiritual life of the person whom he communicated with. In this is shown the eternal value imprinted by God within each person. We do not forget a person whom we knew, for that person is a living and unique existence, and that person penetrated within us through the unique communication.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 52-53)

“Another unity of contrasts characterizing the human person, it is the passing character and the importance of the lived moments and of the committed deeds. Through this the human person is shown, on one hand, as temporal, and on the other hand, as destined to eternity. The human person is elevated through himself, right on the unforgotten plan of the eternity, not by always remaining a succession of moments, but for everything a person lived on the passing moments, it will remain forever imprinted within that person, as in a unique screen, which is reflected, as such, in the persons whom that person is in connection with. This makes everyone’s eternity having a unique content, for each human person has been imprinted during time, and forever, by other thoughts, and feelings, and passing deeds, and relations. But each person’s eternity is reflected in the eternity of all the other persons whom a person has been in connection with, and whom that person could influence for better or for evil. An eternity without a direct personal conscience, it would have been impossible to understand. I will eternally rejoice myself and I will rejoice other for the good things I did to others, for those things reward me too, or I will be eternally tormented by my evil deeds done by me, while I was alive, to others, my evil deeds imprinted within me and in others. All of these represent relations with others, relations extended into eternity. But the forgiveness is like a restoring water, out of which are born to a new life the ones who wronged to one another. And the good things done to other and the forgiveness we grant to them, we owe to the fact that we saw them in their mystery and in the reality of the existence of God within them. So, I will rejoice myself for the good deeds I did during my life, in my relation with the others and with God, a joy extended into eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 53)

“In the reports between me, you, and him, it is reflected the reports amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 67)

“The human being will feel the another as center of power and of requiring authority for himself but, the first thing, only if that one is to him, an irradiating of attention and love center. The power for me it isn’t within myself, but it is in another. But within myself there is the power for another. We are going to see that this power of another for me, it consists of his self-giving to me, and my power for another it consists of my self-giving to that one. “The one who wants to be greater amongst you, let him be your servant” (Mt. 20: 27). But only a person can be a source out of who to really irradiate an all-generous and borderless love and self-giving. They feel that they cannot give their whole power to one another. They hope in one another, but they soon ascertain that there cannot come from one to another the everything he needs. This only shows that there is Another Whom they receive everything they need from, that they have in front of them a supreme communicative and requiring center, for their need and for the need of others, and by no means for Hi need.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 67)

“Each person’s unity and his value for the other persons, it is also shown in the fact that each person bears a distinct name and it answers when called on his name. The name awakens the self-awareness of the person as also his awareness and the awareness of the ones who know that person, about his irreplaceable uniqueness and the desire of the others to have him forever present and the helplessness to forget him. Through name, we will have forever a person once known by us, in our conscience. In memorizing the name of each person, it is shown the capacity and the necessity of the human being, to remember each person he has known, as an irreplaceable person. And even all the memories the human being has through his past, about himself, are connected to distinct persons whom he cannot but to remember about, while he cannot confound them once they have a distinct name. Nobody can thing at himself and nobody can rejoice, without thinking at the person he has known as distinct persons. That’s why it is impossible to a person to definitively forget the persons he has known, and whom he distinguished by their names. Through their names, through which we can remember them, through which we bring them distinctively into our conscience, we no longer can cogitate that they enter a total nothingness, but we remain somehow connected to them, forever. Without them we would have been empty of joys, of longings, or of thoughts. We are and we will be forever with them. Without them we wouldn’t have existed ourselves. We are with them even if we encountered them in the past, or even if they are far away from us. I cannot know myself except by being imprinted by others.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 68-69)

“The teaching about the Savior Christ, as established by the Fourth Ecumenical Synod and as specified by Leontius of Byzantium and by the Fifth Ecumenical Synod, it affirms that the Son of God has made Himself man and He remained God as well, for He has made Himself, in addition to His quality as Person of the godlike nature, the Same, also as Person of the human nature. He didn’t unite Himself with a human person, but He has assumed in His Person, in addition to His godlike nature He has been having it from eternity, also the human nature, without the human nature lacking anything because of the fact that it has been built up as nature of His godlike Person, neither the godlike Person has lost anything of His character as Person of the godlike nature, because of the fact that He has made Himself person of the human nature too. Only thus, Jesus Christ was a unique Person, a both godlike and human Person.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 70-71)

“In the human beings’ doubling, it is involved the reality of the connection with others, but above all, with God. The human being can say you to another, for he can call himself as you, without this you of his to have the reality of the you of the another. The human being can call himself as you, only because there is another human being: the tight connection with a you of the another it has its basis in the doubling between the knower you and the known you, or in itself the human being’s responsibility for himself. But without the supreme forum there wouldn’t have been possible either the interior doubling, or the interpersonal half. In all thing the human being depends on the Third One, as Person-absolute.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 79)

“The road back from the spiritual death which the man has reached in, because he has turned himself towards the world as reality limited in many ways but considered as exclusive, the man cannot travel it, according to the Christian faith, except into Christ. This is for Christ is both God-Person and the man accomplished at maximum in His character as Person destined to the eternity into God. In Christ the humanity is elevated in God-Person but without the humanity being confounded into Him. By entering Him as man in relation with the people, as persons of the same being, all the people will be able to remain into eternity if they keep alive the relation with Him, and He infinitely gives them God, as a gift.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16)

“Some of the people, by reckoning the death of the body as the death of their entire being, they are satisfied with a surrogate of immortality, namely with the living into the memory of their descendants, for the admiration of their contemporaries gained while they are living this life. Other resign themselves with the idea that what they have become during this life it will be preserved into the ensemble of the universal existence which they will merge within. Only a small part of the people, they resign themselves to no longer waiting for any immortality, and they even find in this the freedom of enjoying, without any restraint, of the pleasures of the passing moments. These three categories of people try to chock down the greatest preoccupation of their conscience and by doing so they weaken their conscience itself. The last ones, especially, they reduce their conscience down to a purely theoretical quality, one inefficient from moral perspective, and thus they cause big division and struggle amongst people, by a greediness maintained by the perspective of their future in this life, which is had by no other creature. To all of them, the reconciliation with the personal death is solidary with despising the man’s value as person, by considering the person as a perishing product of an impersonal essence.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 21)

“The man is a person and the person tends “to an uninterrupted exceeding, as being who self-creates himself”. The man sees that his self-creation depends on a superior Creator Who has given the man this existence, and

Who the man must remain in connection with. But this exceeding is endless in two ways: the man always searches for widening his conscience, in order to comprise the whole existence accessible to him, but also in order to realize that beyond the accessible reality there is another reality, inaccessible to him, but which explains the accessible reality. By this, the conscience wants to know all the existing things, not only superficially, but in their ultimate meanings and explanations, which they have in an existence superior to them. By this, the man forms on himself increasingly more, but he is also filled up, increasingly more, with life. By this, the man knows himself, in the same time, as a being who, though being imprinted by all things, he exceeds or he transcends all the things. The man knows that he is capable of comprising all the things in his conscience, but he also realizes, through his conscience, also what is above all things, and which the man remains thirsty for. The man exceeds the things, by comprising other and other of the things which can be comprised and, by exceeding all of them, the man tends with an unsatisfied thirst towards what is non-comprisable, and by that the man exceeds himself too.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 34)

“The communication with his fellow humans, it doesn’t bring to the man only new contents in his conscience, which he can cross over, but it keeps him in connection with other human subjects as with some life springs, which he can advance in the harshness and in the heat of the life with, in the consummation of self-knowledge, of their knowledge, and in the knowledge of everything that exists. The other persons blow within a person, the life, as God did to Adam. Those persons have, at their turn, the quality and the conscience of being superior to things, and especially of being inexhaustible source of life. That’s why the man, in his thirst of knowing everybody, he cannot elevate himself upon the persons as upon objects. The persons remain in themselves as source of life, multiplying this person’s life even by the fact that they are free in their communication. But those persons do not close this persons’ ascension towards a Person superior to them, as supreme life spring, but on the opposite, they are transparent to That One, they help this person to feel That Superior Person, or they accompany this person towards the communion with That Superior Person, as Supreme Source of Life in Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 35)

“The man realizes that even the communication with his fellow humans, if they are seen as the ultimate reality, even that communication lasting forever, that communication will present some insufficiencies and a certain monotony. The man feels the need and he can satisfy that need by communication with a superior and consummate conscience. The man feels the need for a supreme transcendence. Even in fulfilling this thirst, by transcending through nature and through people, the person feels that there is something infinitely higher than those.

This need, which upholds the man in this true transcending of his, it strengthens the man's faith in an Absolute Person. Through faith and through hope, the man anticipates and he accomplishes partially, the exceeding and the transcending of all things, or the union with The One Who is above all things, but not separated and not contrary to the things, but as Upholder of the things and of the man's being." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 35)

"By having in himself a thirst for infinite, the human person is limited right by that, but in communication with the endless in the highest meanings, and not in a physical and monotonous sense, and the man wants to advance in the communication with the infinite for he feels himself capable of that communication. The same limitation and conscious connection with the absolute Unlimited the man lives it in the relation with the objects' world too, and in the relation with the persons seen as transparent environments which that Absolute makes Himself known to the man. This is for in the relation with other persons the man doesn't live only his limitation but he experiences their limitations too. But just by experiencing their limitation, the man lives his thirst and their need for the absolute Unlimited, or the man intuitively that Unlimited beyond all the limited things. The man sees the One Who lacks any insufficiency, the One Who can explain and satisfy all the things, namely everything the persons desire and everything the things need to be complete. And this is because there cannot take place an endless crossing from limited to unlimited. If that has been possible, then it would have been purposeless. And the other persons, at their turn, they communicate to the limited human being too, the connection with the Absolute, through their thirst for the absolute Unlimited." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 35)

"In God Himself there must be an interpersonal all-comprising dialogue; there must be a communication of all the meanings and of the entire life by a Person to another Person. And the meanings are consummately satisfying, when they are meanings expressing the love. This is for only in the love amongst persons, there are the fully satisfying meanings of the existence. And only for there is a dialogue amongst Persons in God, He talks to us too, by creating persons whom He talks directly to. During their live in the material universe, the people communicate to one another from the meanings they receive from God, in a less luminous mode. But in the future life they will receive the meanings from God and they will communicate those meanings in the whole their richness and light. This will mean an especially intimate union with God-the Word and amongst people, without the people being confounded to God or amongst themselves. This is for only the person can communicate meanings. And the person communicates meaning only to other persons and the person expects only other persons to communicate themselves to him. This is for not the meaning matters in itself, but only the person matters. The person is the living and all-comprising meaning. Or, there isn't a true meaning, where there isn't a person. And each person care for other person. If the persons had been confounded to one another, a part of their existence's meaning it wouldn't have missed. And the full meaning is only in the self-communication of a person to another person. And only in the both person's communication, the meanings are illuminated as living meanings." (Stăniloae 1995: 113)

"The communicated words, or meanings, they bring the persons one into another, or they show the unity of being when communicated, either amongst the godlike Persons, or amongst the human persons. But in no case they are confounded to one another. And when the words or the meanings are communicated by the godlike Persons to the human persons, and vice versa, it is shown the fact that the people are created by God in His image, so that He is the people's meaning, and that God can be in a communicative and upholding dialogue, with the people, and the people can be in dialogue with Him, and that God can descend to the people's understanding level, in the meanings He communicated them, and He can descend to the joy for the meanings they communicate Him, in their words, and to the joy for the fact that they understand the meanings they receive from Him, or the meanings brought forth, as firstfruits, by them." (Stăniloae 1995: 113-114)

"The person's mystery consists of the person's dignity of being an ultimate decisional forum in everything the person does, though the person doesn't exist in this quality by himself and though he cannot manifest this dignity except for or contra a supreme decisional Forum and only by referring to the persons and to the cosmos the person has in his front, which he knows that he doesn't have them from himself, as himself too, he is not from himself." (Stăniloae 1995: 116)

"I won't ever be able to get out of my quality as subject, be it even only because, in order to know on myself I have to always exceed myself, but I still find myself as knower subject, and because I stand in front of another who, no matter how much I would try, I cannot reduce him only to a state of object, but I still feel him as a subject, as a self who answers my love, or who refuses my love, and I know that he is responsible too, for myself. And this happen also when we feel a third person, when he answers our common love, with his love, or when he refuses to do that." (Stăniloae 1995: 116)

"We have to specify that the human being's need for another man and for God it is so important by the fact that it is a need for people and for God as persons, namely as other subjects, and for the human being, only in relation with another man and with God as persons, he is defined as distinct, self-conscious, and free, namely as person. I cannot thing at myself as distinct person except in relation with another as distinct person. Only by experiencing another's freedom, I experience my freedom too, and vice versa. I cannot experience, on myself, as person, except in connection with another person. All my memories about myself are united with the memories about others as persons. Even the hermit who has succeeded in forgetting about all people, or who can think at them in a totally free manner, even by the fact that he perseveres in prayer towards God, he lives in relation with God as Person." (Stăniloae 1995: 117)

"I am I, to my conscience, for I am in relations with other persons. Through my name that I am aware of, I distinguish myself from others, as being somebody, or I ascertain that the others distinguish me from themselves, as being someone, and not like something. The persons receive and give names, for the live reciprocally and consciously as distinct persons, whom one appeals to, and who aren't manipulated." (Stăniloae 1995: 117)

"I distinguish, on myself, as unique person, in the relations with other persons, for I cannot freely communicate, on myself, except to other free and distinct persons, and only through the communication towards them or with them, I get freely out of my indefinite, by being defined as a different and free person, a unique person, in relation with them as unique and free persons. The fact that I cannot communicate, on myself, entirely, to others, it unveils my quality as free person, differing from them as unique and free persons. The fact that I cannot entirely communicate, on myself, to others, it unveils my quality as inexhaustible mystery – but either as mystery, I cannot know myself, except by the fact that I communicate, on myself, to others. Or, my mystery doesn't contradict the fact that I know, on myself, as person who communicates, on himself, to other persons, who are unveiled to me as mysteries." (Stăniloae 1995: 117)

"If I didn't communicate, on myself, to other persons, I wouldn't know about me either, as distinct and free person, or as mystery. And I also wouldn't know that I exist. But I can say that I exist, before communication, as a distinct nature, who has become distinct person through communication. Immediately that I exist, I start communicating, namely I start existing as person. One could say that the child doesn't freely communicate immediately after his birth, so that he wouldn't be person since the beginning. But the child is a person to the ones from around him. And the others address themselves to him as to a person. The child is seen as a person who can receive communication. That's why the child is given a name, in order him to know, from the beginning, that he is the recipient, and others too, to know him as a recipient differing from all of them, and they to promote his freedom. And the fact that the child is made as person for persons, it is shown in his impulse to see persons even in the material inanimate thing. One cannot say, therefore, that, at the beginning, the child is nature and then he becomes person. The human being is person right from the beginning. The human nature isn't except within person. That's why, by being a person since the beginning, the child isn't born except by others persons whom he is in relation with, since the beginning. The child isn't produced by nature. At the beginning, when there wasn't any human person, the first human person was brought to existence by the Person of God Who immediately spoke to the human person and Whom the first human person answered to. The second human person was brought to existence also by the Person of God, but out of the first human person. The fact that at the beginning there had to be a person, but that person couldn't come to existence except out of another person, and there was no other human person at the time, it shows that the first human person had to be brought to existence by the divine Person. And the divine Person Himself, by not being alone, He was, from eternity, in relation with another Person, or, better said, in relation with Two Other Persons. The human being's need for the divine Person, it is shown in the fact that the human being needs the Person-God, for the fullest communication." (Stăniloae 1995: 117-118)

"The first created man couldn't be except a person, brought to existence by the godlike person, and being immediately talked to, by God, and as person being the potential partner of the communication with another person - a person brought to existence, out of the first person." (Stăniloae 1995: 118)

"Nobody is a person except in relation with another person. The person is person in relation with another person, though the person has, in this relation, a unique value." (Stăniloae 1995: 118)

"The purpose of the existing persons and their reciprocal defining as persons, are accentuated by the fact that the persons are called to contribute to bringing, in the material universe, other persons to life, through the love amongst them, a love elevated to the quality as common love for the persons whose existence they contribute to. But the persons can fall, also in this regard, from their responsibility, by avoiding not only the development of the persons who comes to existence out of their love, but also by avoiding to contribute to bringing to existence other persons. The love between man and woman falls, by these, down to the movement of an egotistic and purely physical voluptuousness." (Stăniloae 1995: 118)

"In the end, the human being pursues the eternal happiness. But one cannot find the happiness in individually tasting some material or spiritual goods (health, food abundance, wide horizon of knowledge etc.), but only when these goods are tasted in community with other persons. You cannot rejoice of anything when you are individualistically, totally and definitively separated from others. You do not enjoy the food abundance when you are alone. You don't need a future when you are in loneliness. When you are totally and definitively alone, you don't need anything. The present and the future joy it mainly consists of communion with others: "Behold now, what is good and beautiful, except to be the brothers together (Ps. 132:17: 1). The person of another is the source of my life, he is my life itself, when he communicates himself to me with total love; my joy of being able to communicate myself to him, the joy that he accepts me to communicate myself to him, it is my life too. Maybe this is the most characteristic definition of the person: a source of life for another and joy of life received from another. This also indicates the person as a mystery impossible to be ever understood completely. But only God, as consummate communion of Person, only Him can totally give on Himself to me, as a gift, perfectly, in order I to give myself as a gift at my turn, and only Him can nourish the person of my fellow human with a love that to make him totally communicate on himself, to me. In this sense, God is the supreme Mystery, the Mystery irradiating endless life and inexhaustible light. Nowhere in the Holy Scripture it is said that the human being's happiness would consist of something else than seeing on God Who looks with love at the human being. Only the person can irradiate life and therefore only the person can give the happiness to another. Only the person can receive another person as inexhaustible life and non-confounded with himself. Not out of things or out of abstract spiritual values, live in isolation, one can live the plenary life or the human being's happiness, but out of another person. But only out of a supreme Person can irradiate the whole life or happiness to the human beings, who have been created able to be in communion with God-Person, and amongst themselves." (Stăniloae 1995: 133)

"The mankind is one in its being or in its species, but this being or this species doesn't exist except concretized in persons differing from one another. This fact was clarified by the Fathers of the Eastern Church. The need for explaining the God in Trinity helped them to discern between the common nature and the common persons, both referring to God and to people. They noticed three elements differing the person from the species: a) the nature's, or the being's concrete state as self; b) certain distinct traits of each person, traits which aren't common to the entire nature, though the nature doesn't concretely exist without such traits which distinguish the persons from one another; c) the common nature and the distinct traits imprint the persons, as a third element, the need for one another. And the fact that all the persons need the universal nature too, and the fact that they live in dependence on an Absolute and they aspire to Him, it indicated a certain connection of the human nature with That Absolute Whom we must have a great responsibility towards, meaning that That Absolute has the character of a Person." (Stăniloae 1995: 141)

217 In KJB we have Psalm 133: 1 (E. l. t.'s n.).

“Only by existing various in persons, the humanity can be explored and revealed, and even endlessly enriched, either by actualizing what it has within itself, or by really growing it up spiritually. And by this, even the persons are enriched. This is for the nature is common to the persons, but the persons whom the nature is concretized in, are various. Either the individualistic separation, or the mass uniformization, they don’t reveal the richness of the common nature and, therefore, they don’t enrich the persons. And the model of the true human life is given in the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 143)

“The more divers are the persons whom the human nature is concretized in, the greater is the spiritual enrichment but it is due also to the fact that even the same persons are inexhaustible in a continuous relation, through the indefinite of the common nature lived by each person in his own manner and communicated by each person according to his different way of living it. Each person is indefinite in the content he can communicate to us, for he actualizes in another mode the integral human nature and its relations with the material universe, but not as an independent unit. Thus, the humanity is multiplied in persons in other and other modes, through the individual modes imprinted within the persons whom it is concretized in, and by the fact that these modes are necessary to one another, or the complete on one another, by accomplishing, on the other hand, a sole increasingly enriched humanity. That highlights the eternal value of each person, for no one ever-finishes to communicate, in his characteristic mode, the whole content of the human nature concretized in the respective person. No person can be replaced in the own mode he lives and communicates the humanity to the other persons, and no person ever-finishes to communicate the humanity in his own way.” (Stăniloae 1995: 143)

“For this possibility of changing and of elevating the relations amongst people and the life in the material universe, it depends not only on the people’s freedom, but it also depends on the aspiration of their spirit towards increasingly more intimate union with the Absolute, Whom the human being knows himself as depending on, and towards Whom, when the human being is enlightened in conscience, he feels himself responsible to, and Whom the human being knows it comes from an increasingly higher and richer spiritual life. The man wants himself to be accomplished, but he experiences the fact that he cannot be accomplished only by what the people and the external material universe offer him. In the same time, the human being knows that, in his accomplishment, he must eternally advance, and that he can advance. This implies, again, the quality of each person as being destined to eternity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 144)

“If in the human being, the soul can come together with the material matter constituted by soul in a body, in a person, all the easier will be gathered together the godlike nature with the human nature in a Person, more specifically in the Hypostasis of the godlike Word.” (Stăniloae 1995: 145)

“This love for the Father’s Son and for the Father Himself, it places all of us in communication with the Persons-Absolute of the Holy Trinity. But only in our love, that never fails, we live the absolute love of the Persons of the Holy Trinity, as love given to us too. Only by having that love, we have the happiness and the surety of our eternal value, the non-relative value of the own person and of the others. The Son, as man too, by loving the Father in absolute mode, He helps us too, in order us to love the Father with that love, and the Father, by loving His Son made man, with an absolute love and from ever, he loves us too, with that love, and so the Father gives the human persons an absolute value, and He makes us too, to grant that value to one another, by loving one another with the love which the Heavenly Father loves us with, and with the love which the Father loves His Only Begotten Son with, and with the love which the One Who has made Himself as our Brother, He loves us with.” (Stăniloae 1995: 186-187)

“In suffering and in sacrificing my life for others, even I reach beyond me. And even when I do not do that with the conscience that I am going towards God, I still am going towards Him, through the strength of the spirit. The mode I do that with the conscience that I do it by addressing myself to God, for my brothers. Christ deepened Himself, with His humanity full of love for His brothers, into the Father’s godhead – namely His too -, and He moves, as answer, the Father’s love and power for His humanity, but also for all the ones whom He brought Himself as sacrifice for. Only by totally forgetting about yourself, in your self-giving to others, you fully deepen yourself within him, producing, as answer, the wave of his love. And when you do that for others, by self-giving to God, the wave of His love is moved, as answer to your love, also upon the ones whom you love, up to forgetting about yourself for them. But by this, the ones who forgets about himself, in the same time he is elevated, to the union with That One Whom he brings himself as sacrifice for the ones whom he loves, and who brings those ones too, to God, through his example and power. And if the death, as sacrifice, it elevates the one who sacrifices himself, to a higher life, and the ones whom he sacrifices himself for, it is elevated to a higher life too, the death as sacrifice cannot belong but to a person, brought to a person, and for a person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 192)

“The death of Christ must be within us a continuous state of sacrifice, equivalent to the truest force, as it is within Christ, in the sense that it always can instill us His power of sacrifice, but just by that, the power of the true life is a total self-giving of His humanity to God. And the condition for this continuous capacity of sacrifice, it is given to us, in the same time, by our mortal body. How would you have been capable to show your strength, if you hadn't had a weakness to defeat? On the other hand, this being equivalent to the death towards sin, it is one with the life of continuous communion with God, of continuous transcendence towards Him. And this is characteristic to the state of sacrifice. And in the highest degree of this sacrifice, there is Christ with His humanity. And only by being united with Him, we can be in that state too. So, we have the paradox: on one hand, we totally self-give or we totally renounce to ourselves, and on the other hand, we are totally filled up with God and with His power. One can enter at the Father only in a state of total sacrifice. But we cannot do that except by being united with Christ, said Saint Cyril of Alexandria, in his writing called "Worshipping in Ghost and in Truth". Only by totally renouncing to myself, I will be filled up with the another, and with the true power from him. So, I do not renounce out of a sentiment that everything is futile, but I renounce out of my will to give myself, namely to open myself to the Person-Absolute. One cannot self-give, consciously, to the impersonal essence, which one cannot find a conscious love in. There is no sacrifice in pantheistic conditions. In pantheistic conditions there are laws for apparitions and disappearances of the individuations which you obey to, with self-resignation, and willy-nilly. Those are inexplicable and meaningless apparitions and disappearances." (Stăniloae 1995: 194)

"It at his birth the new human being receives a name from the existing persons, for in the relation with those the new human being is defined as unique, irreplaceable person, through Mysteries, the newly born human being is provided with his existence as unique person, by being received, by God, in communion with Himself, a supreme communion of Persons non-confounded amongst Them, and, therefore, They too, bearing distinct names. Only the persons can give happiness and name to other persons." (Stăniloae 1995: 203)

"We are irreducible to one another, in our quality as subjects, though we can become interior to one another, in a certain manner, as objects, and in a different manner, as subjects. Especially as subjects, we live our irreducibility of one to another. And just this shows us that none of us is alone. For, even if I am not able to live the another, as subject, like I live myself as subject, I still feel myself under his attention even through his body. And I feel in this the fact that he isn't indifferent to me." (Stăniloae 1995: 93)

"Only a Person God can attract, and only persons aspiring to their consummation of accomplishment. An impersonal essence would have attracted the persons only in order to annul them. The attraction takes place from God Person towards persons whom He grants to, an eternal value. And the fact of attracting or of setting the creatures, through creation, in movement towards Him, it shows that God irradiates an attraction power.

So, God isn't in a dead movement, but He is in a movement of the plenitude birth-giver to movement in the ones which, being created, they tend towards plenitude. God manifested this attraction power of His, through the loving act of creation, and through the connection of His Providence – also loving – with the creatures. When the human creatures become insensitive to the loving attraction of their consummate Creator, He has made Himself the Hypostasis of their nature, in order to have in Himself both the attraction of the plenitude and the feeling of the attraction in an imperishable mode.” (Stăniloae 1995: 7)

“The Hellenes philosophers couldn't be consistent, for they didn't know the God's character as Person. Being kind, it means being kind to another Person from ever, namely it means loving another Person and communicating to a third person the fact that you are rejoicing of the beloved Person. Otherwise, what kindness had been, that out of which would have come, in the virtue of some law, other existences? In the vision of the pantheism of the Hellene philosophy, there cannot be a truly kind God. If the Hellene philosophy had admitted that God is kind, it should have had to conclude that God is in Trinity, though the Trinity is so tightly united through the perfect love, so that God is, in the same time, One.” (Stăniloae 1995: 9-10)

“The Kindness is characteristic to the free Person, and in kindness, one can see the relation of a Person with another Person. When you are kind to another, not only that one rejoices your kindness, but yourself feel happy by showing your love. This shows that the love or the kindness, it cannot be lived except as belonging to a person and shown to you, or as shown by you to a person. And because of not being us able to imagine that the love and the kindness occurred somewhen in time's flowing, then we will have to admit that there has been existing, from ever, a Person Who has been loving and another Person Who has been loved, and vice versa, for no Person is deprived of having something as His own. In God a Person loves as Father, and another Person loves as Son, and the third Person rejoices with Each of Them, of Another, as Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1995: 10)

“The Christian faith affirms that within God, the common being or nature, it doesn't exist except concretized in Persons, and Their existence is due to the power of giving birth, belonging to One of the Persons. In Trinity there is a Father, Whom the power of giving birth to divine being is manifested by. The Father is exclusively Father, and He is birth giver and proceeding Person, by excellence. The Father isn't the Son of Other Person. Only the Father gives birth, and He isn't born. He is Father from before eternity. There doesn't appear a Father out of an essence or out of some other father, and that to lead back, the string of fathers, in an endless unfolding. And the beginning of all things, there is an absolutely atemporal Father, and He is a conscious and loving Person. The Father's quality as birth-giver from before eternity it is related to the conscious love of a Person and not to an impersonal or unconscious essence of being. If the existence from before eternity hadn't had the power for birth-giving, it wouldn't have been plenary. And if the existence from before eternity hadn't belonged to a conscious Person, it wouldn't have belonged to an unconscious essence, submitted to a superior law, without any explanation and lacking the love, namely lacking the plenitude. It is birth-giver a conscious Person from before eternity. What has been existing since before eternity, there is a Father and a Son, as Persons. A Person isn't born except out of Other Person. And this is from before eternity. There isn't born and there doesn't give birth except the Person, even from before eternity. There wasn't something from eternity, before the Father and the Son. The Son is, consequently, at His turn, from eternity, out of a Father. If the Son has appeared somewhere in time, He wouldn't have implied a Father from before eternity, but an emanator essence submitted to the temporal development – in such a case, everything would have fallen under time. In such a case, vainly we would have affirmed that that essence submitted to evolution in time, it is eternal. If that essence had been eternal, it would have been meaningless and inexplicable that essence to become Father and Son, somewhere in time. Therefore, the essence must be from eternity of a Father and of a Son as Persons. Relating such new apparitions to an eternal time essence it will be an absurdity and a contradiction.” (Stăniloae 1995: 13-14)

“The supreme and plenary being has been existing from eternity, as Father and as Son, or it has been manifesting from before eternity, in the same time with its existence, its quality of giving birth and of being born, in a conscious and loving manner, as Persons directed One towards Another. The Son didn't appear somewhere, for the Father didn't appear somewhere within time. The Son is born out of the Father “from before all eternity”. From before all eternity, from before all eons related to another existence thought by God, there existed the conscious and fecund love of a supreme Person Who gave birth, out of Himself, to Another Person. The birth within God it belonged to the eternal plan, an atemporal one, and it implies the Person Who gives birth and the born Person. A supreme Person given birth, from before eternity, to Another Person, and this means that, on the other hand, a Person gives birth and Another Person is born from before eternity, without existing something before the Person Who gives birth and the born Person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 14)

“The Father gives birth not by giving a part of His being, but he gives the whole His being. But He still continues to exist, and even having His being as whole. The Father and the Son, They have in common the whole being, from eternity, but the Father as giving it, and the Son as receiving it. From before eternity, it appeared from within the Father not a person having a repeated being, but by bearing the same whole being of the Father. The plenary being isn't repeated, for it is limitless, but out of the Father Who bears it whole, it is born from before eternity, Another Hypostasis, as bearer of the being. There didn't appear the limitless being in Another Hypostasis, but it appears in another mode of being possessed. The birth makes the divine being to be borne in a filial mode too, besides the paternal mode, or it shows the divine being as borne, from eternity, in these two modes, without which the divine being wouldn't have been a loving one. This shows the love as active within the internal life of God. God is the life. And the life is interpersonal love. And the cleanest and the fullest love and life are those communicated by the Father and by the Son to One Another." (Stăniloae 1995: 14)

"The greater mystery is God, as Trinity of supreme Persons. Each One of the Trinity's Persons, He has the infinity within Him, but He has the it in common with the Other Two Persons. If there had been only one Person, it wouldn't have existed within Him either the feeling of the infinity of the parental love, nor the feeling of the infinity of the filial love, lived in common, but especially by the Father and by the Son. They wouldn't have felt together, but differently, either the infinity of the Holy Ghost's joy for their love, the Ghost showing Them the consummation of Their love. An impersonal essence doesn't live, consciously and in the whole variety, the love, so that it actually it lacks the endless rejoicing of the love. Living the limitless love, consciously and in the whole complexity, it is, at its turn, an infinity. No solitary person lives the infinity's complexity and the rich forms of feeling the infinity, but it potentially remains in a much-depleted infinity. In each Person is given the potential depth of the whole being. But this is lives and manifested endlessly, in its always active richness, in the relation between person and person. This is for only in this interpersonal relation it concretely exists the being, showing its richness by birth, proceeding, love, and live into joyfulness." (Stăniloae 1995: 19-20)

"God has actualized His being, infinite consummately in its manifestations forms, in the Three Persons." (Stăniloae 1995: 20)

"All the hypostases have not only the power of being born, but they also have the power of working upon something, namely they have not only the power to communicate their being through birth, but they also have the power of doing something upon something external to them, and they maintain themselves in connection with all the universe's things, and without being confounded to them. The animals have this power through involuntary power. The plant too, they irradiate out of themselves an involuntary power. But the human being works willingly, upon others, whilst having too, an unwilling influence upon them. God, by being consummate, free, and almighty, he only works willingly; God can, through His work, not only to organize and to modify the existing things, but he also can create a universe out of nothing. In the power of creating, willingly, something external to Himself, it is again shown the God's character as Person; similarly, to some extent, the human being has the possibility of willingly creation too. Thus, if it is characteristic to the hypostasis to give birth, it is characteristic too, to him, to do something. At the human being, as conscious existence, in the work intervenes the will – it is likewise, to some extent, in the birth too. This shows the man as hypostasis-person. God shows Himself, through an exclusively wanted birth and work, as consummate Person; and in the work of creating an existence out of nothing, God shows Himself as almighty Person. The emanation, by not being a birth, neither a willing making, but by being a movement of an essence that doesn't really exist by itself, it proves to be a simple imagining of the pantheistic philosophies.” (Stăniloae 1995: 26-27)

“By the fact that each person is given its own time in a differently, in order him to advance towards consummation through an increasingly greater likeness to the existence consummated through himself, it results the fact that the human person is created as temporal existence by a supra-temporal existence. And, if the persons' number is a limited one, then the time will be limited too. In this is again shown a connection of the time with the supra-temporal God – but a God-Person – in relation with a number of human persons. In the people's quality as persons, and in the fact that the people tend towards a consummation as persons, in common, it is shown that the people are created by a supra-personal existence, in communion, towards a maximum likeness Himself. But the existence of the supreme communion of Persons, it is shown not only by creating the human persons as aspiring towards likeness to Him, but that Supreme Existence is also the communion of Persons Who help the people to advance towards that supreme communion of Persons, by exercising their responsibility on that purpose, during the time the human persons have been given with; and that supreme communion is shown even as a communion paying attention to each created person. This is for the responsibility of each person for his/her fellow humans, it is upheld within the human being by the responsibility in front of the supreme communion of Persons Who pay attention to each human person, and by this imposing to each human person his own responsibility according to the requirements imposed by the time that each person has been given with.” (Stăniloae 1995: 43)

“Let's analyze the human person as a whole component of the universe. The human person is a unitary and unrepeatable whole, from biological and spiritual perspective, who preexists in the parents' seed, the parents seen as other wholes, and the human person gathers within himself/herself other component parts, and he/she imprints those component parts with his/her unitary seal that is unrepeatable in any other person.

The human person is biological and spiritual unity, in a continuous internal movement, combined out of the many movements of the parts, or of the person's organs and of the organs' subdivisions, a movement upholding the whole person's specificity, and that is manifested too, in the external many kinds of movements. And the person's biological movement, as a whole, within space, it is wholly imprinted by a unitary rationality, combined out of the extremely complex rationalities of all the person's parts." (Stăniloae 1995: 47-48)

"Only the person speaks, and the person only speaks to another person, for only the persons are aware of their own rationality and they are aware of everybody's rationality. But this is also for only the persons live in union amongst themselves as necessity of the loving and emotional communion, but which, through freedom, it also can become as non-loving. The communion amongst persons it has its basis in God as supreme and consummate communion of Persons, and as unconfounded communication of Theirs. This communion isn't prolonged existentially, but by being willingly reflected and worked within the rational and emotional whole of the human persons, but also in their need for communicating to one another the universe as a whole, and partially of-one-being with them." (Stăniloae 1995: 49)

"We want to love and to be loved increasingly more, tending towards an absolute and endless love. And we cannot find this except in the relation with an infinite and absolute Person, a conscious Person, if we are to use a pleonasm. We tend to discover and to realize an increasingly greater beauty, to know an increasingly profound reality, to advance in a continuous novelty. We tend towards this infinite for we are a person. But we cannot find all these aspects of an infinite reality, except in an infinite Person or, better said, in a communion of Persons infinite in Their Being, in love, and in beauty. Out of the increasingly greater communion with that Person, are projected within us and through us upon all the aspects of the world, new and new rays of reality, of beauty, of novelty, and are being opened other and other dimensions of the reality." (Stăniloae 1995: 14-15)

"The communion with the Person or the communion with the infinite Persons, it becomes to the people the means for advancing endlessly in love, in knowledge." (Stăniloae 1995: 15)

"Even if the individual human self-awareness of the people, it will follow one after another, by replacing each other, and it would transmit the existence's meaning they achieved, the meaning of the self-existence of each of them, by not being carried in eternity in order to be deepened infinitely, it will appear as not having a real meaning to us." (Stăniloae 1995: 15)

“Through all the things we do, we manifest directly or indirectly an eternal purpose or we aim to maintain ourselves like eternal purpose. (...) we must therefore to see the purpose of our being as projected beyond our terrestrial, passing life, because if death it had definitively ended our life, we wouldn’t have been a purpose in itself, but a means in an unconscious process of the nature. In this case, the whole meaning of our life and all the things would become meaningless.” (Stăniloae 1995: 15)

“(...) all the things are for us, and we are to ourselves a goal in itself and the endless purpose of all the things from the world.” (Stăniloae 1995: 15)

“The man is a purpose in itself for eternity. He is made for eternity, by having in himself some kind of absolute character, namely an imperishable value, which never ends to enrich itself. The man is opened to some superior meanings and through him so is the world too.” (Stăniloae 1995: 16)

“We tend towards a line from beyond us, but being on a line resembling to our personal existence, and not towards being confounded on an impersonal plan which is for a while at our disposal, and then to disappear in that plan. The man tends towards an infinite personal reality, which is superior to him, out of which to be him able to nourish himself infinitely, without being able to dispose of it, given his limited possibilities, but also without disappearing later within it.” (Stăniloae 1995: 17)

“(...) the man accomplishes his meaning in union with the godlike Person Who is infinite in His spiritual life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 17-18)

“Only a higher person, and in ultimate analysis, only a supreme Person can be conscious about the meaning of the whole existence (...)” (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

“But the supreme Person doesn’t project this total meaning upon the man, without the man appropriating this meaning consciously; but the supreme Person communicates this meaning to the man, as to another person, who consciously appropriate this meaning and by doing so he enriches his conscience and the whole his being, by finding his own meaning just in this enriching. By doing so the supreme Being promotes the character of conscious and free person of our being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

“Our being cannot find its fulfillment as person except in the communion with a superior personal being, who cannot unveil his richness and who cannot fulfill our being in a connection with our being’s inferior stages, or by reducing our being to unconscious state characteristic to a passive object, but only in a relationship within which the man himself, in a continuous novelty, he freely and consciously appropriates to himself the infinite spiritual richness of the supreme Person.” (Stăniloae 1995: 19)

“(...) the supreme Person (is, E. l. t.’s n.) the final target of the rational creature (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 26)

“(...) the acts of the supra-natural Revelation do not suppress the human nature as personal nature, but they elevate it from that state is in, of weakness and corruption of its integrity, on the plan of becoming eternal in the consummation the human person aspires towards.” (Stăniloae 2003: 30)

“The attitude God as Person has it regarding us it sometimes is shown also in his refusal to answer us. Maybe the weakening of the evidence of the presence and work of God through nature and through the man’s conscience, it is also due to His refusal to answer to the ones who don’t call Him with the whole their heart.” (Stăniloae 2003: 33)

“(...) through the supra-natural revelation, God makes to occur in the conscience of the believer, in a direct manner, His words, or words making His person obvious (...) through a speaking and through an action making clearer the presence of His Person in leading the man towards the union with His Person as the man’s final target.” (Stăniloae 2003: 34)

“(...) Christ represents the peak of the supra-natural Revelation and the full confirmation and clarification of the meaning of our existence by fulfilling this existence in Him, in Who is accomplished our maximum union with God and, through this, our consummation. But concomitantly to this, it is shown the fact that the absolute we aspire towards, it hasn’t an impersonal character, but is Person. We are called to become an absolute according to the grace, by participating to the Absolute Who is personal by nature. The personal Absolute by nature, he wants to share the human person of His absolute character, because He makes Himself a man. The conscious person is already by creation, a virtual absolute, by certain participation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 40)

“Our person doesn’t participate to absolute by being overcome, but it remains man and is confirmed in this quality. The Embodiment of God like man it brings to consummation our absolute aspiration, through participation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 40)

“Through the resurrected body of Christ, it irradiates unimpeded the power of the One Who has made this body incorruptible, leading thus, all the ones who will be imparted with Him, to resurrection and to incorruptibility, and even leading the whole creation to incorruptibility and transience, namely to the maximum transfiguration and communicability amongst persons, through the Ghost, and to a total personalization of the cosmos, in Christ and within people; this is for there exists an ontological continuity between the body's matter and the cosmos's matter." (Stăniloae 2006: 75)

"Baptism means our renewal, our getting out of the monotonous repetition. But this renewal isn't only an unchangeable given, but it is the life in a continuous novelty and in a ceaseless joyfulness which is not ceased by its novelty in other and other form of manifestation of our kindness and love. This is for the person is always new by his responsible freedom, but his interminable love, always inventing something new to do for God and for his fellow humans, unlike the former man who remains always in this state of oldness, subservient to the same passions and to the same egotism, which have nothing new to say or to show to others. You have disrobed yourselves of the former man together with his deeds, and you have dressed yourselves up in the new man, who is being renewed towards the full knowledge, in the image of the One Who have created you (Col. 3: 9-10). The new man advances towards the plenitude of knowing God, of knowing his fellow humans, and of knowing himself, through the love for God and for his fellow humans, towards the plenitude which Christ is at." (Stăniloae 1997: 36)

"The very special experience that we have while facing a man like a second person, it is that he does not stay any more like an object in front of us, but like something who demands us, who claims us, and not like a physical entity, but a spiritual one. Everything that surrounds us it seems to us like being laid down around us, at our disposition, it belongs to a world of objects in which we do not see any intention directed against our will, but staying or moving indifferently to our existence, put in there in purpose to be used, to be embedded in ego's domains. Nothing rises against us in the way that our self it rises against them. There are, of course, mountains, rivers, beasts, which have a force superior to ours, and they seemingly dominate us. Some of them have even an aggression force, not only a resistance one. But we do not see in any of them the intention to rise against us. We are feeling ourselves as being above everything, if not necessarily through physical power, so that through our conscience as subject. This last thing we can experience in the contact with another human who meets us as having the quality of a second person. We have met here a subject. The experience of this subject, it is different from that of our subject. The other's subject does not produce to us the experience that we are masters over him, but he opposes our conscience that we are the single center of the things; we are feeling this time that we are somehow reduced from the status of a master, of center, and we are feeling above us, as limiting us, a stranger subject²¹⁸. We do not have this experience, however,

218 LOUIS LAVELLE, De L'acte, p. 407: "Mais, ni la résistance de l'objet, ni celle de l'idée, n'épuisent la notion de résistance. Aucune d'elles n'est une résistance impossible à surmonter... Par contre, il y a une on each time we are facing a man like a second person. Often, we do not let him even to speak, but we only command him, and even when he is speaking to us, we indulge ourselves to watch him from above, by disdainning him, or by contemplating the possibilities that resides in him to satisfying our demands, our plans to extend our power or our cravings. Then we do not see in that man anything essential which makes him different from the objects' world. We do not experience him like a you, like a second person. The fact that he stays in front of us is not yet a proof that we entered with him a me-you report - because of how many things and animals do not stay in front of us without getting out from the category of the ones without subject. When we do not experience man's character as a subject in report with us, even if he stays in front of us, it seems that he stays backwards to us, not forwards, like the entire world of objects it appears to us as staying. In order to experience the character as subject from another man towards us, we have to restrain the massive flux of selfish impulses and to pay him attention. Not only by watching him, because this is not enough. His person puts us in the situation to contemplate a world on which we are framing into the ego's domain. When we watch a person, if we are only watching him, we will do it for ourselves, in order to find out if we like him or not. We have to pay him attention by listening to what he is tells us. The word is the main pointer of our fellow subject. Not a word through which it is expressed a logical impersonal sense, like the one which the teacher develops through, a theory, or he describes the constitutive parts of an insect. That word can be followed detached by the concrete person, and then its own meaning becomes an object of thinking, of our subject. Only the word which unveils the will of our co-inhabiting it unveils us directly his subject. But we can let even the sound of this word to pass by our ears, if we are not available to restrain our selfishness, if it is overwhelming in ourselves the thinking at ours plans, cravings, and interests. And this peril stalks us especially when in the others word, we do not sniff but an egocentric willingness, an intention of dominating us, and to use us. Then it produces in us the reaction of our own selfishness, which makes us impervious to the experience of others subject." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Since through this kind of restraint and attention, or through this kind of faith, we have found ourselves in front of other's subject, his reality, though résistance que je ne surmonterai jamais, c'est celle qui m'oppose une autre liberté, c'est à dire un être qui n'est pas moi et qui fonde son indépendance sur une activité dont lui-même dispose... Il ne sert de rien d'ailleurs de prétendre que cette volonté, je puis agir sur elle, la plier et la fléchir de quelque manière. Nous savons bien que nous n'agissons alors que sur les sentiments et sur le corps, c'est-à-dire sur toute la passivité qui lui est associée. Mais au moment où elle donne son adhésion, c'est elle qui la donne, par un acte qui ne peut venir que d'elle, puisque c'est lui que la fait être. Et, en ce sens, quand une autre volonté me cède, elle me résiste autant qu'elle me cède, puisque cet acte même par lequel elle me cède, s'il n'est pas un simulacre, est encore le sien".

beyond and of other category than the reality of objects, it imposes itself to us with a bigger force than theirs. But with a force whose reception is continuously depending on our liberty, and on our will to believe. To the conscience waked up at its duties, by the calling of the neighbor, the reality of this one overwhelms the entire objects' world. We perceive other's subject like a limit, like a power which forces us, and which claims us, as long as the objects' world appears to us, with all the blind resistance of some of them, like a domain over which the possession of the ego it can extend limitless. And, because of the degree of reality which it shows itself to our conscience with, the objects world depends on their resistance to our arbitrary, the reality of your subject, though accessible through faith, it appears to my conscience with an intensity superior to that of objects world's reality.

Let's remember this result, adding it to the ones told at the beginning of the study about the reality which claims in front of the conscience the objects of the faith, even more than the knowledge's objects, for which, also, we have no other criteria that they are real, except the conscience's testimony. It is a new proof that we are not entitled to attribute to the knowledge's objects, more reality than to the objects of the faith." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The object is only a passive representation of me. And when it resists me, it unveils a limit of mine, but one which I can defeat or which I can move away indefinitely, as my force grows up. My loneliness is by no means annihilated in both cases. On this way, in front of objects, ideas, and laws, not being but me affirming myself, inside me, I can ask myself which is the value of this affirmation? I feel the need of a confirmation through somebody else, in order to have the surety of my real existence. My subjectivity must be objectified, without losing from its character. I feel the need to be affirmed by somebody, like I am affirming myself, through his liberty and spontaneity, to be thought, desired, and loved, and not to be a simple subjective dream. And it is remarkable that through the fact that I am affirmed by a human being, which has free will, as I do too, I do not lose from my character of subject, but only then I increase in experiencing my intimacy. So, through my affirmation by others, through their cogitation, will, and love, I earn a density and a profoundness of existence, like I cannot have otherwise. Only the experience of a person who cares about me and to whom I care of, it causes in me the development of all the endeavors to raising, and to perfecting myself for being worthy of his confidence and his love²¹⁹." (Stăniloae 1993)

²¹⁹ I have edited in this passage almost literally some admirable rows from Louis Lavelle, De l'Acte, p. 528 – 30: "On peut prétendre que j'ai besoin de l'objet qui me résiste et sur lequel je m'appuie pour me confirmer moi-même dans l'existence. Mais cet objet n'est d'abord pour moi qu'une représentation... Quand cet objet me résiste il me révèle une limite de mon action, mais que je puis indéfiniment reculer à mesure que ma force

“God fully fulfills the character as Person, not only because He is the supreme existence and sovereignty, but also because He is love. But, while the love to the man being bound to his insufficiency, due to the created character of his, the man’s love is experienced like a necessity, like a fulfillment; unlike that, God does not experience it like covering an insufficiency He would have. The divine Persons are living, of course, into an absolute reference to each-other and everyone gives all He has, and Himself too, to the other One, but still remaining the most consummate giving, or being a subject just because of that. But They do not feel except the love to give.

Though everyone, by giving everything, He also receives everything, They do not have - like the man has - the sentiment of a lack which will be fulfilled through the love of the other person. The plenitude of existence (the divine being) is so un-separated from everyone, so that the giving is simultaneously a receiving too. The intentionality for communion at the Holy Trinity’s Persons it mustn’t be understood like being started from a lack like at the man, but at Them the love must be understood like the most pristine impulse, like the manifestation of the fullest existence possessed in unity.

The unity of being doesn’t do anything but expressing the fact that every person possesses continuously the entire existence. On the peaks of love the giving and the receiving are no longer noticed, but there is only the joy of a common possession. Although, in the doctrine about God it is highlighted not only the unity but also the trinity, being showed that even to God the joy is an expression of communion.

s'accroît. Ni dans l'un cas ni dans l'autre cas, ma solitude n'est rompue. Pourtant, si c'est par le dedans que je suis capable de m'affirmer moi-même ou si, en d'autres termes, in n'y a que moi qui puisse me poser, je puis me demander quelle est la valeur de cet acte même par lequel je m'affirme et je me pose moi-même. Suffit-il à m'inscrire dans le monde, à élever jusqu'à l'objectivité ma propre subjectivité ?... je possède en effet une existence qui, si elle n'est pas un rêve subjectif, doit pouvoir être affirmée, c'est-à-dire pensée, voulue, aimée, par autre conscience qui soit elle-même un foyer original de vie personnelle afin d'une part, de franchir moi-même les bornes de ma propre intimité subjective... et afin d'autre part, de pouvoir affirmer dans l'être ma subjectivité propre par la reconnaissance même dont elle est l'objet... Chose admirable, c'est à partir du moment où s'établissent des relations entre ma propre conscience et la conscience d'un autre que j'ai seulement le droit de prononcer le mot intimité, comme si je ne pouvais découvrir et prouver ma propre intimité que dans une intimité avec autrui. Si on peut considérer l'acte constitutif de notre vie spirituelle l'acte par lequel, nous détournons le spectacle du monde, nous découvrons notre subjectivité propre, on peut dire que son l'acte le plus émouvant et qui aussitôt lui donne une profondeur et un horizon sans limites, c'est l'acte par lequel nous reconnaissons que cette subjectivité elle-même retient l'attention et l'intérêt d'une autre conscience et acquiert ainsi tout à coup une significations universelle et ontologique qui la dépasse comme existant par un autre et a laquelle elle n'osait pas prétendre... Se sentir aimé, c'est sentir que l'on est voulu comme existant par un autre, c'est s'attribuer à soi-même une densité d'être qui était restée en doute jusque-là, ou que l'on avait pu se refuser à soi-même par humilité, c'est vouloir se montrer digne de cet amour dont on est l'objet, c'est craindre de n'être jamais à son niveau, c'est découvrir les puissances mêmes qui sont en soi et mettre tout son zèle à le exercer.”

Though every person is the plenitude of the existence, the happiness it doesn't stay into the lonely possession of it, but into the commune possession. Though God has - into the infinity of His existence - the source and the reason of a boundless happiness, through the Christian teaching it is removed from this happiness any selfish feature. The joy and the happiness cannot exist but together with the generosity, and with the affirmation of the other.

All doctrines about God, which want to argue that unlike the people, He can have in Himself the happiness of an infinite self-contemplation, to that He doesn't need anything else, they are surpassed by Christianity, the only one which has removed the selfishness from this happiness, the only one which doesn't miss the essential element of the generosity, without being necessary for this the affirmation of the principle that the world was created from ever. And at God, the happiness is created not only by the possession of the existence, but also by the communion of the subjects²²⁰.

The personal character of God it implies the multi- personality, because of person without the joy of communion and of the love, that person is not fulfilled. And how to God won't ever miss the happiness and the joy, He neither misses the character as Person, a Trinitarian character. The theory of Iacob Böhme and of the other anterior German mystics, according to whom the personality, respectively the three-personality of God, it is a later stage in God's evolution, sprung from a deitas, it has also at its basis an unfinished abyss²²¹, and it doesn't correspond to the Christian way. In the East, in contrast with the West where has been always manifested a philosophical and pantheist unifying tendency in order to deduct the personal and Trinitarian character of God from an impersonal substance, it was affirmed the eternal coexistence of the unity and trinity of God. The personal and Trinitarian character of God is not less essential, and it is not a derivate from His being, but it always comes out of the eternity without begin, out of the supreme reality having a personal a Trinitarian character, and being in the same time a unity in the most complete sense of the word²²²." (Stăniloae 1993)

²²⁰ Saint Maxim the Confessor, P. G. 90, 892, says: "The Judaic conception, limiting the unique principle at one person and this existing without the Word and the Holy Ghost, it makes it narrow and un- consummated and almost un-subsisting, like one devoid of word and life. This way they fall from reasons contrary to pagans into the same evil of the atheism."

²²¹ ALEXANDER KOYRÖ, W. c. p. 225-261.

²²² The Saint Maxim the Confessor, w. c.: "The Trinity in oneness and the oneness in Trinity. Not one into the other one. Because the Trinity isn't in oneness like a being accident. Neither the oneness in Trinity, because isn't a (simple) quality. But, is neither one from the other one. Because doesn't come the Trinity from oneness like its product, because It isn't became, and auto-reveals". But neither the oneness isn't a synthesis of the three persons or something more appropriate watched only with the mind in those three ones.

“I have insisted in another chapter on the fact that the subject is intentionality oriented towards other subjects. Isn’t there really a contradiction between this definition and the ones told into this chapter about the person? The contradiction is nowhere to be found, for in this chapter it hasn’t been said what the subject is, but it has only been shown the subject character of the hypostasis, after it has been highlighted that this degree of existence grows up from the nature itself through its rounding into a whole that stands by itself. It has been shown that the hypostasis is subject, namely a stage director of nature’s powers, but it hasn’t been determined in greater details the sense, the meaning of the subject.

This sense seems to be, mainly, precisely the intentionality towards communion, so this is a closer determination of the subject of the hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Of course, the unveiling of the subject it does not stay in its “seeing”. The subject does not impart himself to the senses. The noticing of the subject has a spiritual-ethical character. In general, we are noticing the subject of the others as we become ourselves subjects, the faith contributing to this in a great measure, by allowing to sound in our ethical depth the reality of the other like a claim, like a commandment, and not like a thing which stays at our disposition. The subject of God unveils Himself to us in Jesus, like an overwhelming claim, like an absolute Master of us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Pleasure - Pain

“By putting bridle and measure to the pleasure for the material things, there is accomplished a transfer of the bodily affection’s energy of our being, in spirit’s favor, increasing the pleasure for the spiritual goods. The biological pleasure, by the measure we impose to it, it becomes innocent; and the great plus which has been stopped from manifesting on physiological plan it has been transfigured on spiritual plan. So, than instead of saying that these affects cease to exist at our passing from this world, and we may better say that their energy is totally transferred in the favor of the spirit. And this might explain their apparition in the nature after the falling into sin, as a transfer of the spiritual energy on the inferior biological plan. Our being’s pleasure for the connection with something else it turned then from God and from our fellow human’s souls, towards world, and to it caused to grow up the pleasures related to the world. For it is hard to conceive that the force of these affects came from somewhere outside.” (Stăniloae 1992: 64)

“For the tendency of the man is directed towards the sensitive things, it has been stirred up within his body the pleasure of them. This has been done in the detriment of the mental activity, which has been considerably reduced together with the pleasure related to it. The man has placed the whole his energy towards the pleasure related to the things submitted to senses, by giving the pleasure related to them the highest intensity. Once stirred up, the affection of the sensitiveness it cannot be totally removed from man during his life on earth. But it can be limited, and it can be partially kept oriented towards the spirit’s goods and towards the eternal good. Just through a part of it, through pain – which always follows to the pleasure –, the man can always learn to resist the pleasure. Unfortunately, the man does the opposite: the pain that follows to the pleasure, instead of determining the man to avoid the pleasure as source of it (what unitary the tree of experiencing the good and the bad is like!) it pushes the man again in pleasure in order to get rid of pain, and the man become increasingly more enchained in this vicious circle.” (Stăniloae 1992: 65)

“We have said that the world has attracted the feeling too, and through feeling the world has attracted the mind too, through its sensitive, sweet promises. This is because of the feeling in the meaning of work of perception of the senses it is always accompanied by a sensation of pleasure or of pain, which are more or less intense, in noticing the world’s things. The senses’ work, of perceiving, it is even capable of noticing in advance the pleasures and the pains which the things can provide. Besides, seeing the things is in itself accompanied by a pleasure or by a pain, even before possessing them.” (Stăniloae 1992: 66-67)

“Consequently, the feeling has a twofold content and a twofold meaning: one is gnoseological and another is affective. This feeling’s quality of noticing, through perception, the pleasure which the things can or of experiencing in perceiving the things a sensation of pleasure, it makes the feeling dangerous to the man. Or, by this quality of the feeling, the world becomes dangerous, because of being obvious that, between pleasure and pain, if let on his own, without being led by rationality, the feeling will always choose the pleasure. And in pleasure it stays the feeling’s force, a force making often the rationality, as force of judgment, to concede, and the mind as knowledge function, to put itself in the service of the feeling.” (Stăniloae 1992: 67)

“The pleasures joined with what each limb necessarily does, they aren’t guilty. But are guilty the pleasures searched for through unnecessary deeds. It is guilty the plus or the senses’ deviation in order to search for the pleasure at all costs. Just because of that, the passions lead the nature to disorder, to the body’s weakening and decomposition, due to the weakening of the spirit that was keeping it in order. And the feeling of the weakening drives the man increasingly further, in his impulse of restoring his power out of a source that is incapable of strengthening him. Truly, what drives the man to rolling down on the passions’ slope it is a hidden fear of death. The boredom following to each pleasure it is like a void foretelling about death. Even more than that, God has tied right on the pleasure, a pain, in order the man when experiencing this pain to no longer search for pleasure. But the man, reached in pain, and carries away by the fear of the death announced to him by that pain, as a punishment for the pleasures which he will be searching for, he throws himself in new pleasures, leading his nature towards death. (...) The tight connection between pleasure and pain it can be explained by the fact that the tension which the nerves are put in when feeling the pleasure, it is followed by a weakening, by an exhaustion. And by repeating the voluptuousness states quickens the body’s death. By wrongly searching through passion a strengthening of the body’s nature, the man rather weakens it, driving it to death even quicker.” (Stăniloae 1992: 68-69)

“It is graver the soul’s death caused by passionately oscillating and advancing in the vicious circle formed by pleasure and pain. And we encounter here another contradiction of the passions. This is because they are an alternation, if not an intertwining of addiction and platitude, of effervescence and boredom, of tension and dryness; they are the tormenting death, the living death, and not the death giving the resting to the being. The man’s life of platitude and of banal superficiality, which the spirit has succumbed in, it seems not coming to an end in this life, and it is endless in the future life, actually, providing the man some sort of infinity which he didn’t desired, but an infinity in platitudes.” (Stăniloae 1992: 69)

“Our self-throwing upon pleasure it no longer is only the result of pleasure’s attraction but it is a fear of pain too. To the fearful of pain man and who is used to search for refuge in the pain’s contrary, in pleasure, not only the pain but even the absence of the pleasure is a pain or a state which he runs away from, fearlessly. And the one who is slave to fear, that one whit his nature weakened, it is at the opposite pole than the one having a strong nature. The man who has a fearful nature of who is weakened, he is carried unwillingly, by the world’s natural elements and by the impulses caused by everything that fall under senses; he is no longer a person but he is an object easily to be carried away by any wind. The man having a strong nature, by self-controlling himself, he is the free man, in whom the nature from within himself and from around himself it is dominated by spirit. So, the restraint from pleasure and the enduring of the pain, far from being something negative-passive and of weakening the nature, they rather strengthen the nature, and this strengthening means spiritualization or the placing of the spirit in the position of leading us. After all, both the pleasure and the pain affect the bodily side of the body. And the one who has made the spirit to be overwhelming upon his body, he has brought his body to a state which his body no longer vibrates so much in, or with so much sensitiveness to pleasure and pain.” (Stăniloae 1992: 139-140)

“The fact itself that the man is always trying to escape pain, it shows that, actually, the man isn’t made for death. But this is shown also by the fact that the pleasure doesn’t last ceaselessly. That shows that the man isn’t made only for this life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 108)

“It isn’t easy to get rid of the temptation of the pleasures and of the fear for pains, but it will be done if the man accustoms himself not to give a major value to pleasures, or to satisfying his pleasures in a pride manner, or to give a major importance to the pains caused to him, while living in the material universe, and if the human being accustoms himself to see the passing character of the pleasures and of the pains, and thus the human being will exceed in his body’s life and in his relation with the material universe, what the pleasures can provide him and by restraining the narrow feeling of the contact with them. If that is the case, the human being won’t run any longer after pleasures at any cost, and for the things which can cause him those pleasures, and the human being will endure with strength the troubles coming upon himself, by considering them as connected to the passing life in the material universe. The human being will see thus, the life from here, not as a “steadfast stronghold”, but as a road towards the eternal life from beyond. This doesn’t mean despising the material universe, but it means understanding it rightly, as a transparent environment and as an occasion of the communication with the plan superior of the material universe, or by understanding the material universe as a market where the human being buys, with his passing deeds, the eternal life. Like the people from the market, they know that the market-day is going to soon come to an end, and they constantly think at the benefit they will have after, at home, due to the bought things, if they are substantial, likewise will be the people living within the material universe, if they see the present life as a passing occasion for gaining the eternal life and if they bear the toils during this trip, with manhood. Only this relativization of the material universe seen as road, as means, and as transparent environment, and not as ultimate reality, it can escape people from the so-frequent today despair, a despair leading the people to grave nervous disorders; only this can escape people from their discontented selves, which are upheld by so many false values.” (Stăniloae 1995: 96)

Power / Strength

“In the Eastern Church it has been considered the spiritual power as a greater and a more direct power of God than the physical or the worldly power. The spiritual power is accompanied by a kenosis in what regards the external power. Saint Apostle Paul says: “The Lord told me: “It is enough to you My grace, for My power is made perfect in weakness”. Therefore, I will very joyfully praise myself especially in my helplessness, in order the power of Christ to dwell within me” (2 Cor. 12: 9). The spiritual power is so great in comparison to the physical one, so that it can overwhelm the physical power, and it can produce effects which cannot be produced by the physical power, for the spiritual power is, directly, godlike power. That’s why the wonders this power produces are simply called “powers”, as effects of a superior power, or of the direct power of God, the physical power being only a result of the spiritual power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 231)

“In the future life, this spiritual power, or a power in good, or of love, a power that isn’t so much of the man as it is of God, a power that has filled up the man who ascended towards God through the said stages, this power will totally overwhelm the physical power and it will abolish the worldly power, which often adopted attitudes contrary to God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 232)

“By the fact itself that God brings to existence diverse hypostatized substances, God give them also a power of theirs. Like all the substances are connected in a unity amongst themselves, and with God – by having their origin in the divine essence -, likewise their powers are connected too, and with the divine power, by having their origin in the essence of the divine power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 232)

“In order to relate these virtues to the manifestation of the godlike power, we are mentioning here that this power is being shown in the fact that the sufferings and the affects of anger and lust are kept, by the one who in humble, through patience, always in the will’s bridle, in which the person is fully activated. They never escape from under the will’s power. Thus, the humbleness and the gentleness, if they aren’t the expression of a full consolidation of freedom, they still are, anyway, a steadfast road to freedom. Christ, by fully developing the human nature as Person, He escaped the human nature from under the domination of the impulses of the anger and of the lust, which manifest themselves as automatic impulses. He has shown, by this, the fact that the human nature can escape from under the domination of this necessity. He descended to the human things, but He descended by will, and He endured the human sufferings by will, by His godlike will, but also by His human will strengthened by His godlike will. Properly said, the suffering which enslaves, it is a falling off human nature. Through the clean suffering willingly accepted, the man is restored in his authentic nature, which it has been created for freedom.” (Stăniloae 2006: 33)

Prayer of Jesus
/ Prayer of the Heart

“We reckon that the “Centuria” of Kallistos and Ignatius it was right to place at the beginning of the spiritual ascension, the faith as gift from the grace, and the remembrance the name of Jesus Christ too. “The beginning of any pleasant to God work, it is the calling, with faith, of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, since Himself told us: “Without Me you cannot do anything” (Jn. 14: 9). That’s why, all the great teachers of the asceticism taught that before any other good work or preoccupation, everybody, and especially the ones wanting to enter the stage of the deifying quietude, they must consecrate themselves to God and they must ask for His mercy without doubting: and the all-holy and all-sweet His name, let them have it like a non-missing object of working and of meditating, and let them bear it ceaselessly in their heart and in their mind and on their lips, and let them breathe with it, and live with it, and sleep with it, and take vigil with it, and to move with it, and to eat with it.” (The Greek Philokalia, Second Edition, vol. II, p. 352.)” (Stăniloae 1992: 96-97)

“Of course, one cannot reach, suddenly, such a continuous remembrance of God, especially of the name of Jesus. Neither is good, to somebody, to reach too soon to it, because in such a case the remembrance would be done too automatically. It is good that this remembrance of Jesus to gradually become more often, on the measure that the soul gets accustomed to focusing its thought on God, and on the measure that the soul grows up in faith in, and in love for God. But it is good that just from the beginning somebody remembers God more often, by using a certain name (“Lord”, “Jesus”), or even only by focusing his thought on such a name, in a moment of narrowing, or of resting, while being on road or at work.” (Stăniloae 1992: 96-97)

“The mental prayer, or uninterrupted, or internal, or of the heart.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 32)

“The heart’s prayer is called the prayer done by mind within heart, a prayer helping to be strengthened within heart the permanent thought at Jesus Christ and which cleans and sanctifies through this thought all the cogitations and all the senses and it directs the whole activity towards fulfilling the commandments given by Christ. The mind is liturgizing, and the heart is the altar on which the mind brings, to God, the mysterious sacrifice of the prayer, as so nicely said Paisie Velecichovschij.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 33)

“The intention in the heart’s prayer is that of gathering the mind within heart, in order the mind to raise from there uninterruptedly, at the beginning words, and later only according to the meaning, the short prayer dedicated to the name of Jesus: Lord Jesus Christ, You Son of God, have mercy on me, the sinner.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 33)

“In order to be the gathering of the mind within heart possible (during the Heart’s Prayer, E. l. t.’s n.), it was used a method that had many variants in what concerned the details.

1. There is, in the first place, the variant claimed as belonging to Saint John Chrysostom. The author is unknown. Kallistos and Ignatius, who wrote, before the middle of the XIV Century, their ascetic treaty in one hundred chapters, they quoted from this small writing and they attributed it to Saint John Chrysostom. This writing is in the Greek corpus Manuscript Vatican 658, a manuscript dating, at the latest, from the beginning of the XII Century, and which probably belonged to the end of the XI Century. In comparison to the Method bearing the name of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, also present in the mentioned manuscript, the writing of Pseudo John Chrysostom, it remains in more general considerations, and we think that that shows us that it is an older writing. One could thus establish the newest term which it could have appeared, as being the beginning of the XI Century, because at the end of this Century it must have some oldness also the method existing under the name of Simeon the New Theologian, to which composition it was used the writing of Pseudo John Chrysostom. But who could establish more exactly the time which this method appeared at, or at least the data which the writing cannot be older than?

In the Greek Patrology this writing is called as Epistle towards Monks of All Use and Vigil.

In Codex Vatican 568 f. 101 r – 102 v., where it follows immediately after the method of Simeon the New Theologian, it is entitled: From the Word of Saint John Chrysostom, Another Method of Vigil.

Its content is the following:

“The godlike Apostle says: “Pray, ceaselessly, without anger and without thoughts” (I Tess. 5: 17, and I Tim. 2: 8). And the Saint was right: without thoughts; because, any thought, by separating the mind from God, even it seems as a good thought, it is the whole devil, not to say: of the devil. But the whole endeavor of the devil this is: to take the mind far and to distract the mind from God, and to attracts the mind to the worldly worries and pleasures; and inside the heart to suggest commandments and satisfactions and other good or bad ideas which one mustn’t pay attention to. This is because the whole struggle of the soul, it is that not to be the mind separated from God, and not to let the mind to be carried to joining and to agree the unclean cogitations, neither the mind to pay attention to the images brought in the heart by the all-unclean and old painter, namely by the devil. Sometimes the evil one forms images and colors, and some other times it shows persons. And the poor man, staying in a place, he believed that he is somewhere else, and thus he is taken in wandering, and it seem to him that he sees somebody and that he speaks with persons and he arranges things, and this is from the devil's deceit.

We must, therefore, to ensure and to restrain the mind, to keep the mind and to hit every thought and every work of the evil one, by calling the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. And where the body is, there must the mind stay, in order not to be found between God and our heart anything as a separation wall, which to darken the heart and to separate the heart from God...

Be you, therefore, always free, and persevere at our Lord God, until he will dwell within you. And do not ask for anything else, but only ask for the mercy from the Lord of the glory. And while asking for the mercy, ask for it with a humble and broken heart, and shout out from morning to evening, and if possible, even during the night: Lord Jesus Christ, You Son of God, have mercy on us. And force your mind to this, until death. Because this thing requires much endeavor... So, I urge you not to separate your hearts from God, but to persevere and to guard your heart by always thinking at our Lord Jesus Christ, until the name of the Lord will be planted without your heart. And do not think at anything else, except Christ to be glorified within you. Therefore, I urge you not ever leave this canon of prayer, either you are eating, or you are drinking, either you are traveling, or you are doing anything else. Ceaselessly shout out: Lord Jesus Christ, You Son of God, have mercy on us. For this remembering of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to awake you to combat the enemy... The thinking at our Lord Jesus Christ shakes the whole enemy's power from within heart, and it defeat that power, and it uproots that power, gradually. By descending the part of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in the depth of the heart, it defeats the dragon which dominates the heart's stretches, and it saves the soul and it makes the soul alive.

So, shout out ceaselessly, in your heart, the name of Lord Jesus, for the heart to comprise the Lord and the Lord to comprise the heart and the two to become one. This thing cannot be done in a day or two, but it requires a long time, and it is necessary much endeavor and torment until the enemy will be cast out and the Lord will come and dwell our heart. There are not necessary - as it is said - many words, for you get tired and the devil comes and he steals your thought. By saying a few words, your mind will remain focused and it prays with much vigil. Learn from Anna, the Samuel's mother, who was praying continuously, but her voice wasn't heard praying (I Samuel²²³ 1: 9-13).

You shout out and say: Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me - even without moving your lips, but by shouting out in your thought; for God hears also the silent ones... While doing this, you must keep your heart under the full guard, least not to leave the thought at God..., but through a ceaseless and clean remembrance, to be the thought at God imprinted as a seal on your souls.”

²²³ In KJB we have: I-II Samuel and I-II Kings; in ROB we have: I-IV Kings (E. l. t.'s n.).

2. A more detailed method, which recommends - in addition to the ceaseless uttering, with or without voicing the words, of the short prayer addressed to the name of Jesus – also a certain position of the body, it is mostly known under the name of Simeon the New Theologian. The methods described by Nicephorus the Monk and by Gregory of Sinai, are very similar to this method, but all the scholars, even those not recognizing the paternity of Simeon the New Theologian, they agree that the method bearing his name it is the oldest method of all, because the Nicephorus’s method it visibly is related to this one, and Gregory of Sinai directly quotes Simeon as the method’s author.

This writing, entitled as The Method of the Holy Prayer and Attention was edited, for the first time, by I. Hausherr in the year 1927. Before that, it was only printed a neo-Greek paraphrasis in the Greek Philokalia, from where it was reproduced in the Greek Patrology 120, col. 701-710.

The true prayer, it is said in this writing, it presupposes obedience to God and to the spiritual father. This obedience liberates the monk from the evil connections of the present age, of worries, and of passions, and it makes the monk constant and determined in following the good. Once supposed these “the true and the untold attention and prayer consists of the fact that the mind while praying it guards the mind and it continuously moves within heart, and in the depths of the heart it aims its requests towards the Lord. The mind, by tasting the Lord there, and by seeing that the Lord is good, it no longer allows to be brought out from heart. The mind says, at its turn, together with the Apostle: “Good is to us, to be here” (Matthew 17: 4). By inspecting those inward places all the time, it banishes away the thought seeded by the enemy. To the ones who do not know, this kind of life seems to be harsh and unpleasant and chocking and tormenting, and not only to the uninitiated ones, but also to the ones who have experienced it, but who haven’t received yet the pleasure in the depths of their heart. But the ones who have tasted the pleasure and who have felt the pleasure in the throat of their heart, they shout out, together with Paul: “Who will separate us from the love of Christ?” (Rom. 8: 35).

The method of this prayer is the following: “Sitting down in a quiet monastic cell, alone, in a corner, do what I say: close the door and elevate your mind from everything that is vain or perishable. Then, by leaning your chin on your chest and by directing your sensitive eye with the whole your mind towards the center of your belly, namely toward your belly button, you compress the breathing of the air crossing through your nostrils in order to not breath easily and search with your mind the inside of your organs in order to find out the place of your heart, where usually are all the soul’s powers. Firstly, you will find out a darkness and a thick unpassable layer, but by persevering and by

